Matthew T. McGuire, of the District of Columbia, to be U.S. Executive Director of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development for a term of two years
Gentry O. Smith, of North Carolina, to be Director of the Office of Foreign Missions, and to have the rank of Ambassador

The committee met, pursuant to notice, at 2:31 p.m., in room SD-419, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Hon. David Perdue, presiding.

Present: Senators Perdue, Gardner, and Kaine.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. DAVID PERDUE, U.S. SENATOR FROM GEORGIA

Senator PERDUE. This hearing of the Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee on State Department Management will come to order.

Thank you all for being here today to hear from the nominees to very important positions that will allow these Americans to proudly represent the United States abroad. We have nominees for Ambassador to two countries, Costa Rica and Finland, both of which we share strong diplomatic ties. Our nominee for U.S. Executive Director for the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and Director of Office of Foreign Missions, which remains very important as we seek to secure our diplomatic facilities abroad and the Americans working there.

I understand most of you have already been through this process and are coming back for a second go-round. It is Cory's and my first. So you will be patient with us today. Will you not? [Laughter.]

However, I was not here last Congress. So I appreciate your forbearance today, and we will move right through this as expeditiously as we can.

With that, I would like to recognize Senator—I am sorry. We will move right through this since he is not here.

Our first nominee—I am just going to highlight this just briefly and apologize for this, but I want to go through this.

Our first nominee, Mr. Stafford Fitzgerald Haney, who is nominated to be Ambassador to Costa Rica. Mr. Haney currently serves as Director of Business Development and Client Services at Pzena Investment Management, has served in positions with Pepsico and Citibank in some major Latin American countries such as Brazil, Mexico, and Puerto Rico. He graduated from Georgetown University School of Foreign Service with a masters and bachelors degree.

Our second nominee today is Mr. Matthew T. McGuire, who is nominated to be U.S. Executive Director of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development for a term of 2 years. Mr. McGuire has held multiple positions in the Department of the Treasury and Commerce and prior to that, he had a very successful career in the finance industry. Mr. McGuire is a graduate of Brown University and has degrees from the University of London and Harvard.

Our third nominee is Mr. Gentry O. Smith, who is nominated to be Director of the Office of Foreign Missions with the rank of Ambassador. Mr. Smith is a career Foreign Service officer who started with the State Department in 1987. He has served in many posts overseas, including Cairo, Tokyo, and Burma, as well as the Secretary of State's protective detail. He also served as Deputy Assistant Secretary and Assistant Director for Countermeasures. Mr. Smith is a graduate of North Carolina State University.

Our fourth nominee is Mr. Charles C. Adams, Jr., who is nominated to be the U.S. Ambassador to the Republic of Finland. Mr. Adams is currently senior counsel at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, LLP. He has led a successful career, spending much of his time living in Geneva, Switzerland, as a managing partner for various law firms. He is a graduate of Dartmouth College and the University of Virginia School of law.

Thank you all for being here today and sharing your thoughts and viewpoints with us today.

We would remind you all that your full statements will be included in the record, as it was the last time you were here, without objection. So if you could please keep your remarks to no more than 5 minutes or so, we appreciate that so members of the committee can engage with you on these matters. And we will move as expeditiously as we can.

With that, we will take statements, starting with Mr. Haney first, please.

STATEMENT OF STAFFORD FITZGERALD HANEY, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO COSTA RICA

Mr. HANEY. Chairman Perdue, Senator Gardner, thank you. It is an honor to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to serve as the next U.S. Ambassador to Costa Rica.

I am profoundly humbled by this opportunity to serve and thank the President and the Secretary of State for the confidence they have placed in me. If confirmed, I look forward to working with you and your colleagues in Congress to protect U.S. citizens in Costa Rica, deepen the bonds that unite our countries, and advance U.S. interests in Central America.

With the chairman's permission, I would like to acknowledge friends and family without whose support I would not be here today, starting with my wife, Rabbi Andrea Haney, and my children, Asher, Nava, Eden, and Shaia, who are at home watching hopefully. If I am confirmed, my wife and our four children will be joining me in San Jose, and it is only through their love and support that I am here today.

I would also like to mention my mother, father, and brother—may they rest in peace—who are here today with us in our hearts. My mother, Sandra Haney, was and still is my hero. She is also a link in a long line of family that has in various ways served our country proudly. From a fifth great-granduncle who fought in the Revolutionary War to my brother who served both overseas and at home to my great uncle who recently received an honorary doctorate in public service and was recognized by the Tennessee State legislature to my mother's marches and sit-ins to protest what she saw as injustices not compatible with the America we aspire to be, we have a long and proud tradition of serving our Nation. It is in my mother's honor and in her memory that I hope, if I am confirmed, to dedicate my service.

Costa Rica is an important ally in a region of critical strategic importance to the United States. It is the most stable democracy in Central America and its long-held traditions of protecting human rights and freedom of expression are a model for the region. Its strong commitment to investing in education and health has helped Costa Rica achieve literacy, life expectancy, infant mortality, and income levels that are significantly better than elsewhere in Central America. It is no surprise that these positive attributes have attracted significant numbers of Americans to the country. Today, approximately 100,000 U.S. citizens call Costa Rica home and more than 1 million visit annually. If confirmed, their safety and well-being will be my top priority.

Despite its successes, Costa Rica, like its neighbors, confronts many challenges, including security challenges, as international drug trafficking organizations and organized crime increasingly penetrate Central America. The United States and Costa Rica enjoy an excellent partnership in security cooperation. If confirmed, I will continue to work with the Government of Costa Rica to ensure that organized crime does not undermine the country's economy and democratic institutions.

Another of my highest priorities will be promoting greater Central American integration. As outlined in the Strategy for U.S. Engagement in Central America, the region will not prosper without better regional cooperation on trade, infrastructure development, strengthened democratic institutions, energy integration, and investment.

Given its ability and relative prosperity, Costa Rica can and should play a critical role in advancing our strategy in Central America. It can and should lead in working to create conditions in Central America that are conducive to reducing poverty and violence and creating jobs and opportunity, and it should serve as an example of what is possible in the region. President Solis has committed to working to promote regional integration and prosperity, and if confirmed, I will support him in those efforts.

I have many years experience living and working in international business in Mexico, Central America, the Caribbean, and Brazil. I understand the region and the challenges it faces. As President Solis made clear during his first year in office, Costa Rica is serious about improving its business climate and attracting additional foreign investment. If confirmed, my private sector experience will be an asset to helping Costa Rica achieve those goals. It would also serve me in working to advocate for stronger intellectual property protection, promote entrepreneurship, and public-private partnerships, and ensure that U.S. companies and investors encounter a fair and level playing field for doing business in Costa Rica.

If confirmed, I will work closely with Costa Rica to advance the many other policy objectives and priorities the United States and Costa Rica share. Costa Rica shares our commitment to protecting democratic freedoms and human rights and is vigilantly resisting any attempts to weaken the inter-American human rights system. This support for basic human rights, democracy, and freedom has never been more important in the region than today. Costa Rica is an international leader with important initiatives to mitigate and adapt to climate change and promote renewable energy use and sustainable development. I believe Costa Rica can become a regional hub of innovation and has the potential to assume a leadership role in advancing good governance and prosperity throughout Central America.

As our dedicated team at Embassy San Jose states, a safe, prosperous, and green Costa Rica not only benefits the citizens of both of our nations, but also the entirety of Central America.

Mr. Chairman, committee members, I thank you again for your consideration of my nomination to serve as Ambassador to Costa Rica, and I welcome your questions.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Haney follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF STAFFORD FITZGERALD HANEY

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, it is an honor to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to serve as the next United States Ambassador to Costa Rica.

I am profoundly humbled by this opportunity to serve and thank the President and the Secretary of State for the confidence they have placed in me. If confirmed, I look forward to working with you and your colleagues in Congress to protect U.S. citizens in Costa Rica, deepen the bonds that unite our countries, and advance U.S. interests in Central America.

With the chairman's permission, I would like to acknowledge friends and family without whose support I would not be here today—starting with my wife, Rabbi Andrea Haney, and my children Asher, Nava, Eden, and Shaia. If I am confirmed, my wife and our four children will be joining me in San Jose and it is only through their love and support that I am here today. I would also like to acknowledge my mother-in-law, Betsy Dobrick, my brothers and sisters-in-law Adam and Allison Dobrick and Jeremy Dobrick and Tamara Hoover, and various close friends, whose support means so much to me and my family.

Finally, I would also like to mention my mother, father, and brother, may they rest in peace, who are here today with us in our hearts. My mother, Sandra Haney, was, and still is, my hero. As a young widow with two young children, she left home and family to provide my brother and me with the best education and opportunities she could. Working during the day and going to school at night, she showed us, by her example, that the United States is truly the land of opportunity for those who work hard on a level playing field. She did not have it easy as a single African-American woman raising two children alone in the 1970s, but she never gave up and she knew her sacrifices would allow her children to have a better life. It was her firmly held belief; one which she passed on, that America's core values should serve as an example throughout the world. She also was a link in a long line of family that has in various ways served our Nation proudly. From a 5th great-grand-uncle who fought in the Revolutionary War to my brother who served both overseas and at home to my greatuncle who recently received an honorary doctorate in public service and was recognized by the Tennessee State legislature to my mother's marches and sit-ins to protest what she saw as injustices not compatible with the America we aspire to be—we have a long and proud tradition of serving our Nation. It is in my mother's honor and in her memory that I hope, if I am confirmed, to dedicate my service.

Costa Rica is an important ally in a region of critical strategic importance to the United States. It is the most stable democracy in Central America, and its long-held traditions of protecting human rights and freedom of expression are a model for the region. Its strong commitment to investing in education and health has helped Costa Rica achieve high literacy, life expectancy, and income levels and a low infant mortality rate. It is no surprise that these positive attributes have attracted significant numbers of Americans to the country. Today, approximately 100,000 U.S. citizens call Costa Rica home and more than 1 million visit annually. If confirmed, their safety and well-being will be my top priority.

Despite its successes, Costa Rica confronts many challenges, including security challenges, as international drug trafficking organizations and organized crime increasingly penetrate Central America. The United States and Costa Rica enjoy an excellent partnership in security cooperation. If confirmed, I will continue to work with the Government of Costa Rica to ensure that organized crime does not undermine the country's economy and democratic institutions.

If confirmed, another of my highest priorities will be promoting greater Central American integration. As outlined in the Strategy for U.S. Engagement in Central America, the region will not prosper without better regional cooperation on trade, infrastructure development, strengthened democratic institutions, energy integration, and investment. Greater integration has long been an aspiration in Central America, but effective mechanisms for achieving that goal have remained elusive. The United States can play a constructive role in helping Central America create jobs and economic opportunities for its 43 million people, by helping the region improve infrastructure, integrate markets, reduce nontariff barriers, and benefit more from its free trade agreement.

Given its stability and relative prosperity, Costa Rica can help play a critical role in advancing our strategy in Central America. It can help lead in working to create conditions in Central America that are conducive to further reducing poverty and violence and creating jobs and opportunity and it can serve as an example of what is possible in the region. President Solis has stated a commitment to working to promote regional integration and prosperity, and, if confirmed, I will support him in those efforts. I will also work to create stronger linkages between the American Chambers of Commerce in Central America, so that the private sector is fully incorporated into the process of seeking solutions to the region's development challenges.

I have many years' experience living and working in international business in Mexico, Central America, the Caribbean, and Brazil. I understand the region and the challenges it faces. As President Solis made clear during his first year in office; Costa Rica is serious about improving its business climate, and attracting foreign investment. If confirmed, my private sector experience will be an asset in helping Costa Rica advance in those areas. It will also serve me in working to advocate for stronger intellectual property protection, promote entrepreneurship and public-private partnerships, and ensure that U.S. companies and investors encounter a fair and level playing field for doing business in Costa Rica.

If confirmed, I will work closely with Costa Rica to advance the many other policy objectives and priorities the United States and Costa Rica share. Costa Rica shares our commitment to protecting democratic freedoms and human rights, and is vigilantly resisting any attempts to weaken the Inter-American Human Rights System. This support for basic human rights, democracy and freedom has never been more important in the region than today. Costa Rica is an international leader with important initiatives to mitigate and adapt to climate change and promote renewable energy use and sustainable development. I believe Costa Rica can become a regional hub of innovation and has the potential to assume a leadership role in advancing good governance and prosperity throughout Central America.

As our dedicated team at Embassy San Jose states: a safe, prosperous, and green Costa Rica not only benefits the citizens of both of our nations, but also the entirety of Central America.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you, Mr. Haney.
Mr. McGuire.

STATEMENT OF MATTHEW T. MCGUIRE, PH.D., NOMINATED TO BE U.S. EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF THE INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Dr. MCGUIRE. Thank you, Chairman Perdue, and thank you for convening us today and chairing this session. Thank you also to Senator Kaine for presiding today. And, Senator Gardner, thank you for coming. It seems appropriate that I congratulate Senator Perdue and Senator Gardner for your recent victories and for joining the Senate. It is quite an honor, and it is always good to have fresh thinking and fresh blood up here.

I would also like to just thank my mother, who is here today, Georgiana McGuire. I was noting earlier with a few people that the last time I did this, I had aunts and uncles and in-laws and all sorts of people. You do it a second time, you get Mom. [Laughter.]

I am thrilled to have her, but it is a lesson to everybody here.

It is an honor and a privilege, of course, to be here as President Obama's nominee as Executive Director for the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, otherwise known as the World Bank.

Rather than read the full statement I sent over for the formal record, I would like to briefly discuss my career to date and then frame how I would approach the role of Executive Director, if I were to be confirmed.

So with that, I would just say that during the first part of my career, I taught and was focused on issues related to economic and development policy both in the United States and abroad. I got a Ph.D. in anthropology from Harvard, finishing in 1988, and my dissertation was on the redevelopment of public housing in Chicago. During that time, I also spent several months in Ethiopia and Eritrea researching the relationship between those countries shortly after the end of their 30-year-long war. And when I finished my Ph.D., I ran a welfare-to-work job training program in New York before joining a firm that helped U.S. cities redevelop public housing projects into mixed-income communities.

In 2003, I moved into the financial services industry, and I spent the next 8 years working for several mutual fund and hedge fund companies raising capital and serving as a senior executive in three entrepreneurial and dynamic firms. During that time, I began to more fully understand the role that financial markets play in our economy and how interconnected the global economy is as a result of the ease with which capital moves across national borders, industry sectors, and asset classes. In an era where CEO's and investors can deploy each dollar or euro or real almost anywhere in the world at almost at a moment's notice, it is increasingly important that countries like ours play close attention to their financial positions and that they strive to maintain and strengthen the integrity of their capital markets.

That view has been strengthened by my experience and my time over the last 4 years at the Department of Commerce and at the Department of the Treasury where I have worked closely with U.S.

businesses on a range of issues, including many related to international trade.

Should this committee and the full Senate confirm me, I will strive to be a sound steward of our country's capital at the bank at all times. I will work to ensure that each dollar we commit is used to support the values that have proven so durable since America's founding, that open societies are the strongest societies, that transparent systems are the most successful systems, and that those countries which endeavor to give all of their citizens a fair shot at becoming educated, being healthy, and achieving economic independence are the countries that will succeed no matter where they happen to be located. Those are just a few of the values I have watched President Obama champion for many years now, and I would be honored to carry them forward on his behalf, on the country's behalf as the Executive Director of the bank.

[The prepared statement of Mr. McGuire follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF MATTHEW T. MCGUIRE

Thank you, Chairman Perdue and Senator Kaine, for presiding over today's hearing. I would also like to thank Chairman Corker, Ranking Member Menendez, and the distinguished members of the committee. It is an honor and a privilege to be here, as President Obama's nominee for Executive Director of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. I have enjoyed meeting some of you and your staff during the confirmation process, and I look forward to answering any questions you might have.

My mother was part of the first Peace Corps group ever to go overseas, "Ghana I," back in 1961. She was the first person in her family to go to college, having worked her way through, and when she graduated she heard President Kennedy's call to reach out beyond America's shores and to make a difference however small or however large it might be. She taught English in a small town in Ghana called Tema, and many years later a student of hers from the Tema Secondary School became one of my professors at Brown University. As you might imagine, I grew up hearing many stories about those sorts of connections, and I grew up hearing about the importance of America's role in the world, especially through its uniquely American institutions, such as the Peace Corps. My father, who died when I was 6 years old, also served in the Peace Corps, in what was then East Pakistan and is now Bangladesh. He spent most of his career working on international affairs as well, and his influence on me has been considerable even in his absence.

I also grew up working at my family's business here in Washington, DC, The McGuire Funeral Service. My great-grandfather, Robert Grayson McGuire, founded the funeral home in 1912, and when I was old enough I began spending my summers and my weekends there, washing cars, arranging flowers, shoveling snow off the driveway, and even acting as a pallbearer when a family was in need of another set of hands. And I will always remember that my mother and my uncle paid me minimum wage and no more, punching a time clock like everyone else, for every hour and every minute that I worked there.

Through the course of watching my grandfather, my mother, my aunt and my uncle, run the funeral home, I learned numerous things. I learned about how important it is to have a bank that provides credit in bad times as well as good; about how having economic independence makes it easier to engage with political issues of the day, like the civil rights movement, which my family was deeply involved in; and about the pride and responsibility that comes from being able to hire more people as your company grows. These are simple, yet powerful things that I carry with me to this day.

The first part of my career was squarely focused on issues of economic equality, and how public policies can increase the possibilities of ordinary citizens to raise their incomes and have a shot at realizing their dreams. I got a Ph.D. in Anthropology from Harvard, finishing in 1998, and my dissertation was on the redevelopment of public housing in Chicago. During that time I also spent several months in Ethiopia and Eritrea, researching the relationship between those countries shortly after the end of their 30 year-long war. And when I finished my Ph.D., I ran a welfare-to-work job training program in New York before joining a firm that helped U.S. cities redevelop public housing projects into mixed-income communities.

In 2003, I moved into the financial services industry, and I spent the next 8 years working for several mutual fund and hedge fund companies, raising capital and serving as a senior executive in three entrepreneurial and dynamic firms. During that time I began to more fully understand the role that financial markets play in our economy, and how interconnected the global economy is as a result of the ease with which capital moves across national borders, industry sectors, and asset classes. In an era where CEOs and investors can deploy each next dollar, or euro, or real, almost anywhere in the world at almost a moment's notice, it is increasingly important that countries like ours pay close attention to their financial positions, and that they strive to maintain and strengthen the integrity of their capital markets.

And that is what I would like to close with. If confirmed, you can be sure that I will undertake the role of Executive Director with that very sensibility in mind at all times. I will strive to be a sound steward of our country's capital at the Bank, and I will work to ensure that each dollar we commit is used to support the values that have proven so durable since America's founding: that open societies are the strongest societies; that transparent systems are the most successful systems; and that those countries which endeavor to give all of their citizens a fair shot at becoming educated, being healthy, and achieving economic independence, are the countries that will succeed no matter where they happen to be located. Those are just a few of the values I have watched President Obama champion for many years now, and I would be honored to carry them forward on his behalf, and on the country's behalf, as Executive Director of the Bank.

I look forward to answering any questions you have, and I thank you again for allowing me to come before you today.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you, Mr. McGuire.
Mr. Smith.

STATEMENT OF GENTRY O. SMITH, NOMINATED TO BE DIRECTOR OF THE OFFICE OF FOREIGN MISSIONS

Mr. SMITH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Senator Kaine. I am honored to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to be the next Director of the Office of Foreign Missions, OFM. I am profoundly grateful for the confidence that the President and Secretary Kerry have demonstrated in nominating me for this unique and important position.

My entire professional life has been dedicated to public service, beginning with my first career as a police officer in Raleigh, NC, to my assignments at embassies in Tokyo, Rangoon, and Cairo, and my most recent as the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Countermeasures for the Bureau of Diplomatic Security. I have strived in each to improve the conditions in which our colleagues live and work. I believe my dedication and commitment in this regard will serve me well, if given the opportunity to lead the Office of Foreign Missions.

As an organization, its primary goals being to use reciprocity to ensure the equitable treatment of U.S. diplomatic and consular missions and personnel abroad, regulating the activities of foreign missions in the United States to protect our foreign policy and national security interests, protecting our U.S. public against abuses of privileges and immunities by foreign missions operating here in the United States, and providing services and assistance to foreign missions that are located here on a reciprocal basis.

As you are aware, OFM was established in 1982 under the Foreign Missions Act. In passing the act, Congress made it clear that the operations of foreign missions in the United States are a proper subject for the exercise of Federal jurisdiction.

For more than 30 years, the act guided the Department's management and extension of foreign missions in the United States for its privileges and benefits associated with acquiring real property, motor vehicle and driving services, for tax exemptions, customs clearances, domestic travel courtesies and restrictions.

The committee is well aware of the Department's ongoing efforts to ensure that our personnel abroad work in facilities that are safe and secure and functional. I can authoritatively attest that the relocation of an American Embassy is a complex and challenging task. To accomplish this job, the United States must have the interest and support of the host governments. In many countries, such support is there for the asking. In countries where the support is lacking, OFM plays a critical role in assisting with the resolution of impasses we sometimes face with foreign governments during our attempts to acquire real property in those countries and relocating and constructing our facilities.

When a country has an interest in improving or relocating one of its missions in the United States, the Office of Foreign Missions uses its ability to regulate the acquisition and the use of real property by foreign missions as a leverage to achieve the Department's own property-related needs in that country. Without OFM and its authorities under the Foreign Missions Act, we may not have been able to build a U.S. Embassy in Beijing or a new annex that is currently under construction there. This and more was achieved as a result of reciprocity and the Foreign Missions Act.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I am honored to have the opportunity to address you and the esteemed members of the committee. And if confirmed, I will do all that I can to further the important objectives that Congress has set out under the Foreign Missions Act. I look forward to continuing to work with you and to ensure the proper treatment of our foreign personnel serving abroad and, as importantly, the foreign missions that are here, that they continue to react as good neighbors.

Thank you for the opportunity and your consideration for my nomination, and I respectfully ask that my full statement be entered into the record.

Senator PERDUE. Without objection, it certainly will.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Smith follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF GENTRY O. SMITH

Mr. Chairman and distinguished members of the committee, I am honored to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to be the next Director of the Office of Foreign Missions (OFM). I am profoundly grateful for the confidence the President and Secretary Kerry have demonstrated in nominating me for this unique and important position.

My entire professional life has been dedicated to public service. Beginning with my first career as a police officer in Raleigh, NC, to my assignments at our Embassies in Tokyo, Rangoon, and Cairo, and to my most recent role as the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Countermeasures in the Bureau of Diplomatic Security, I have strived to improve the conditions in which my colleagues live and work. I believe my dedication and commitment in this regard will serve me well if given the opportunity to lead the Office of Foreign Missions, an organization whose primary goals are:

- ◆ Using reciprocity to ensure equitable treatment for United States diplomatic and consular missions abroad and their personnel;
- ◆ Regulating the activities of foreign missions in the United States to protect our foreign policy and national security interests;
- ◆ Protecting the U.S. public from abuses of privileges and immunities by members of the foreign missions; and

- ♦ The provision of service and assistance to the foreign mission community in the United States on a reciprocal basis.

As you are aware, OFM was established in 1982 as a requirement of the Foreign Missions Act. In passing the act, Congress made it clear that the operations of foreign missions in the United States are a proper subject for the exercise of Federal jurisdiction.

For more than 30 years, the act has guided the Department's management and extension to foreign missions in the United States, privileges and benefits associated with the acquisition and use of real property, motor vehicle and driving services, tax exemptions, customs clearances, and domestic travel courtesies and restrictions.

In my estimation, the Foreign Missions Act is a landmark piece of legislation which has positively influenced and conditioned the environment in which U.S. diplomatic and consular missions abroad operate.

This committee is well aware of the Department's ongoing efforts to ensure that our personnel abroad work in facilities that are safe, secure, and functional. I can authoritatively attest that the relocation of an American Embassy is a complex and challenging task. To accomplish this job, the United States must have the interest and support of the host government. In many countries, such support and assistance are there for the asking. In countries where support is lacking, OFM plays a critical role in assisting with the resolution of impasses we sometimes face with foreign governments during our attempts to acquire real property in their countries for the relocation and construction of our facilities.

When a country has an interest in improving or relocating one of its missions in the United States, OFM uses its ability to regulate the acquisition and use of real property by foreign missions as leverage to achieve the Department's own property-related needs in that country. Without OFM and the authorities it has under the Foreign Missions Act, we may not have been able to build the new U.S. Embassy in Beijing, or the new annex building under construction there. This and more was achieved as a result of reciprocity and the Foreign Missions Act.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I am honored to have the opportunity to address you and the esteemed members of the committee. If confirmed, I will do all that I can to further the important objectives Congress set out in the Foreign Missions Act, and I look forward to continuing to work with you to ensure proper treatment of our Foreign Service personnel abroad, and that foreign missions are good neighbors here at home.

Thank you for this opportunity and your consideration of my nomination. I respectfully request that my full statement be entered into the record, and I will be happy to answer your questions.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you, Mr. Smith.

Mr. Adams.

STATEMENT OF CHARLES C. ADAMS, JR., NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF FINLAND

Mr. ADAMS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Chairman, Senator Kaine, it is a renewed pleasure to have the opportunity of appearing today before this committee. It is a tremendous honor to have been renominated by the President for this post, and I thank both the President and Secretary Kerry for the confidence that they have shown in me. If confirmed, I very much look forward to working with you and with your colleagues in Congress to further U.S. interests in Finland.

Mr. Chairman, with your kind permission, I would like to say a few words—to repeat a few words actually that I said on a previous occasion with respect to the reasons why for me, if confirmed, the privilege of serving as an Ambassador of the United States has deep personal significance.

My late father, Charles C. Adams, dedicated the entirety of his professional career to representing the United States as an officer of the Foreign Service, supported throughout by my late mother, Florence Schneider Adams. They, and what came over time to be a family of six children, spent many years in posts around the world with stints in between back home here in Washington, principally in Europe and Africa. And so I had the opportunity as a Foreign Service brat to witness firsthand from the perspective of a kid at the time the enormous skill and savvy and dedication and personal courage that my parents brought to their service to their country, as did also all of the other men and women of the Foreign Service with whom they were privileged to serve. And I saw also the burdens and the sacrifices that they were prepared to endure in serving their country.

Now, after my own service in the Peace Corps in East Africa from 1968 to 1970, I chose to go into the private sector, and I spent more than 40 years in the practice of international law and policy at high levels. But throughout this time, I have always had very close to my heart the idea that as a salute to the memory of my mom and dad and to the magnificent men and women of the Foreign Service with whom they served that I, in turn, might some day be afforded the profound privilege of serving my country as an ambassador of the United States.

And I have to say that in the 6 months of a holding pattern, in effect, since I last had the privilege of appearing before this committee, the sentiment on my part, far from having in any way been diluted or diminished, has in fact, been reinforced. And so I do thank you very much, indeed, for the opportunity of reappearing before this committee today.

I am very excited that the President should have asked me to represent the United States in Finland. Finland is a very close partner of the United States. It has been a member of the European Union since 1995, has developed an innovation-led economy, has worked very closely with the United States as a partner in the Partnership for Peace of NATO, and has supported the United States in Afghanistan and elsewhere in promoting human rights and security around the globe.

As to the matter of shared security, ever since 1950 Finland has been a very dedicated participant in U.N. peacekeeping missions around the world, and although not a member of NATO, it is, as I have mentioned, a participant in NATO's Partnership for Peace program. And Finland maintains a very high level of cooperation and interoperability with the NATO alliance. It regularly participates in joint training missions with the United States and its allies, including joint air training later this very month with Sweden and Estonia and the United States Air Forces.

And Finland is one of the largest contributors to the OSCE special monitoring mission in Ukraine with 19 observers on the ground currently and very substantial contributions as well to the observation force in respect of the Ukraine elections last year.

The Finnish Government has also contributed troops to the Resolute Support mission in Afghanistan, has suffered fatalities, along with others of our allies, and it has pledged $1 billion a year from 2015 through 2017 in further support of the Afghan National Security Forces. Finland has also taken the lead on the implementation of U.N. Security Council Resolution 1325 in respect of women's rights and participation of women in Afghan civil society.

Secondly, the United States and Finland share the vision of a strong, robust transatlantic economy that delivers benefits for all of our citizens. That is why, if confirmed, one of my very top priorities will be increasing economic cooperation between our two countries through expanded bilateral trade and investment. The United States is currently Finland's fourth-largest customer and sixth-largest supplier with bilateral trade valued in excess of $7 billion. I believe that we can do still more and enhance the position of the United States as a principal valued trading partner of Finland.

I will work closely also with the Finns on the increasing importance of the Arctic region. As you know, the United States is about to take over, on April 25, the chairmanship of the Arctic Council, and the Finns will have the next succeeding chairmanship of the Arctic Council in 2018 to 2019.

As to our shared values, the United States and Finland have a relationship which continues to thrive because of the strong people-to-people ties between our two nations. And these relationships are the lifeblood of our partnership. I can recall having had, as a college student at Dartmouth, a summer job as an escort interpreter with the Department of State, and I had the occasion to participate in the international visitors program as an interpreter with delegations from abroad. And it happens that Finland, in participating in these IVP programs over the years, now has as alumni many senior members of the Finnish Government, including President Niinisto, Prime Minister Stubb, and other important figures in Finland's Government who came to see the United States as young students at the time.

Senator PERDUE. I apologize for interrupting. Could we move to a conclusion so we can move this along? I apologize. I am trying to keep us on schedule here. Thank you.

Mr. ADAMS. Well, I thank you for your attention.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF CHARLES C. ADAMS, JR.

Mr. Chairman and honorable members of the committee, it is a privilege to appear before you today as the President's nominee to be Ambassador to the Republic of Finland. It is a tremendous honor to be asked to serve in this post, and I would like to thank President Obama and Secretary Kerry for their confidence in me. If confirmed, I look forward to working with you and your colleagues in Congress to further U.S. interests in Finland.

With your kind permission, I would like to say a few words about my personal background and why this makes the privilege to serve as an ambassador so meaningful, if confirmed by the Senate.

My late father, Charles C. Adams, dedicated the entirety of his professional career to representing the United States as a Foreign Service officer, supported throughout by my late mother, Florence Schneider Adams. They, and what came over time to be a family of six children, spent many years in posts all over the world, principally in Europe and Africa, between assignments back home here in the United States. I had the opportunity to witness at first hand, through the eyes of the "Foreign Service brat" that I was, the enormous skill, savvy, dedication, and courage that my parents, and all other professionals of the Foreign Service, brought to their service to their country, and the burdens and sacrifices they were prepared to endure.

After service in the Peace Corps in East Africa in 1968–1970, I chose to enter the private sector, and have practiced international law and policy at high levels for now over 40 years. But I have always had close to my heart the idea that, as a salute to the memory of my mom and dad, and to the magnificent men and women of the Foreign Service with whom they served, I might someday be afforded the extraordinary privilege of serving my country as a United States Ambassador.

My feelings in this regard have in no way diminished; rather they have intensified in the 6 months since having first shared these remarks with this distinguished committee.

I am very excited that the President asked me to represent the United States in Finland. Finland is a close U.S. partner. It has been a member of the European Union since 1995, has developed an innovation-led economy, engages closely with us as a NATO partner, including in Afghanistan, and leads in promoting human rights around the globe.

Finland and its EU partners have stood with the U.S. in implementing sanctions against Russia, sharing our belief that Russia must be held accountable for its actions in Ukraine and abide by its commitments under the Minsk Agreement.

Participation in multilateral fora is a core component of Finland's foreign policy and this is demonstrated through its partnership with the U.S. in international organizations like the United Nations and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe.

If confirmed, I will work to sustain and advance the strong U.S.-Finland bilateral relationship. I will work to do so by championing U.S. national interests across three areas: our shared security, shared prosperity, and shared values.

First, on our shared security: ever since the 1950s, Finland has been a dedicated participant in U.N. peacekeeping missions around the world. At the 2014 NATO summit in Wales, Finland became an Enhanced Partner of the alliance. Finland has been a participant in NATO's Partnership for Peace program for years and maintains a high level of cooperation and interoperability with the alliance. Finland regularly participates in joint training missions with the U.S. and our allies, including joint air training later this month, and is one of the largest contributors to the OSCE Special Monitoring Mission (SMM) in Ukraine, contributing 19 SMM observers.

The Finnish Government has contributed troops to the Resolute Support Mission in Afghanistan, and has pledged $8 million per year from 2015 to 2017 in support for the Afghan National Security Forces. Finland has taken the lead on implementation of UNSCR 1325, the Resolution for Women, Peace and Security, which seeks to protect women's rights and participation in Afghan society.

Finland also played a critical role in addressing the crisis in Syria through its participation in the mission to transport and destroy Syrian chemical weapons and in 2014 provided over $14 million in humanitarian assistance to the Syrian people.

Finland has demonstrated a commitment to combating violent extremism in partnership with the United States, having implemented enhanced antiterrorism legislation in January and participating in the Foreign Terrorist Fighters Working Group.

Second, the United States and Finland share the vision of a strong, robust transatlantic economy that delivers benefits for all our citizens. That is why, if confirmed, one of my top priorities will be increasing economic cooperation between our two countries, through expanded bilateral trade and investment. Finland strongly supports a Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (T-TIP), which, if successfully negotiated, could further increase bilateral economic ties and strengthen the overall U.S.-EU economic relationship. I will also work closely with the Finns on the increasingly important Arctic region. Finland is eager to work with us on our upcoming chairmanship of the Arctic Council, and will take over the chairmanship after us in 2017.

Finally, on our shared values, the U.S.-Finnish relationship continues to thrive because of the strong people-to-people ties between our two nations. These relationships are the lifeblood of our partnership. If confirmed, I will travel throughout the country meeting with students, media, local officials and civil society listening to their priorities and concerns and speaking to the enduring value of our cooperation.

Finland has played an active role in advancing our shared security, economic, and social values. If confirmed, I look forward to representing my country in advancing a still deeper connection between the United States and Finland.

I am grateful for the opportunity to have addressed you today, and am at your disposal to answer any questions you may have. Thank you.

Senator PERDUE. No. They are very eloquent remarks. I apologize for closing that off.

It must be easier the second time, guys. You did very well.

As we said in the opening remarks, this is the second time you have been here. I appreciate your forbearance.

I have a couple questions of my own here for the record, and then we will move to the ranking member, Senator Kaine, for his remarks and questions as well. I will try to be brief. I appreciate your forbearance today. And I am glad your mom is here, Mr. McGuire.

Dr. MCGUIRE. Thank you, sir.

Senator PERDUE. Mr. Haney, as Ambassador to Costa Rica, what would your top policy priorities be as you approach that country? It is one of the shining stars, as you said, in Central America, indeed Latin America. And what can we do to raise our cooperation together to the next level?

Mr. HANEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the question.

I think the broad policy objectives that I would have in Costa Rica very much mirror—align with the broader objectives we have within Central America as they were recently outlined in the Strategy for U.S. Engagement in Central America.

So specifically one would be promoting prosperity and economic integration from a regional perspective, enhancing security, as well as promoting improved governance. And I think Costa Rica can both benefit from our focus on these areas, as well as help us do some of the heavy lifting that we need in the region.

So, for example, on the prosperity and regional integration, Costa Rica has done fairly well relatively. As you said, it is a shining star within the region and within Latin America. It is 40 percent of the trade of the CAFTA-DR, the free trade agreement within the region. But there are still other areas that they can take advantage of within this trade intraregionally, and to do that, they need to address things such as the high cost of power, as well as the transportation infrastructure and facilitating trade on an intraregional basis. I think that is an overlapping priority that we have with the Solis government and that is something that we could work on with them.

As far as enhancing security goes, Costa Rica has done an excellent job. Coming from the private sector, I always look at return on investment. So what does the U.S. taxpayer get for the investment we are making in our partner countries? And Costa Rica, by far, has probably done one of the best jobs in the region on security cooperation. Last year, they seized more cocaine than any other country in Central America, and it was 30 percent more than the previous year. In the last 4 years, it has continued to grow up. So I think we can continue to work on security with the Costa Ricans.

And then I think very much and very importantly for Costa Rica and for the United States is that our relationship is at a different level now. It has matured to the point where we look at Costa Rica as an asymmetrical partner in helping us address some of the key issues in the region. And so I would hope to be able to help the Costa Ricans, perhaps do some of the initiative-building activity that they can do to take some of their experience in promoting human rights and democracy, education, as well as economic development and transport that to the rest of the region as well.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you.

Mr. McGuire, what is your impression of the coordination between the World Bank and the regional development banks? More broadly, in light of the request of the general capital increases from these institutions, what do you see as the division of labor between these institutions, and how should Congress think about and prioritize those requests?

Dr. MCGUIRE. Sure. So on the first of those questions, the coordination there—it is ongoing. It is consistent. The World Bank, obviously, is considerably larger than the others, the African Development Bank, the Inter-American, the Asian Development Bank, the European Development Bank. And so there is always a discussion back and forth, and as many people have explained it to me, people often take the World Bank's lead. So the practices and the policies of the bank are quite consequential in terms of the practices of some of the others.

Certainly, were I to be confirmed, I already know some of the other executive directors, at least the executive director at the Inter-American Development Bank. I know the woman who has been nominated for the African Development Bank. I certainly look forward to maintaining and strengthening those relationships and then making sure that staff are talking where and how it is appropriate as well. So that is the first piece.

In terms of the division of labor, the World Bank has extraordinary expertise in any number of countries around the world. That said, one can always get even more expertise from those who are on the ground who are focusing just on a particular region. And so certainly I would expect for an intellectual exchange.

In terms of projects themselves, I think that is a discussion that should be an ongoing one, and there are certain banks which have greater expertise in certain areas, let us say, on financial reform or education. The bank has a particularly strong team thinking about infrastructure and public health, and I think we ought to play to our strengths and make sure that we are not just overlapping all the time but that we are complementary in how projects fit with one another.

And then there are instances where there are particular projects that are larger, perhaps a little riskier, where we actually do want to be alongside one another to spread out some of that risk and to make sure that we are really utilizing the U.S.'s contributions to all the banks most effectively.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you very much.

Mr. Smith, what do you consider to be the OFM's highest priorities, and how do you perceive your potential role in achieving them. You have served in the State Department as Deputy Assistant Secretary and Assistant Director for Countermeasures in the Bureau of Diplomatic Security, since 2009 I think.

Mr. SMITH. That is correct.

Senator PERDUE. How do you perceive your role in achieving those priorities?

Mr. SMITH. Senator, as I stated during my previous testimony here, my highest priority will be ensuring the equitable treatment of our personnel who serve in facilities abroad by the host governments under which they operate and also make sure that our national interests and foreign policy interests here in the United States are protected by regulating the activities of those foreign missions that are located here in the United States.

How I will do that is by remaining engaged with the various regional bureaus at the State Department, along with their regional executive directors, who have day-to-day interaction with our embassies and consulates that are around the world to make sure that any issues that come up that we can address from a perspective of reciprocity that we can do that.

I will also, of course, stay in close contact with the Under Secretary for Management and the chiefs of missions at those embassies so that if I personally have to be engaged in any of those activities to bring about resolution, that I can do that as well.

And as I stated during my last testimony, of course, I will remain engaged with the Congress, with the members here, and with your committees if there are specific issues of interest that we can resolve as well.

Senator PERDUE. Great. Thank you.

My time has expired. In the second round, I have one more question for Mr. Adams, but the ranking member—we are going to waive the time constraint on this since he has not had a chance for his opening remarks.

So, Senator Kaine.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Mr. Chair. And thanks to all the witnesses.

I have voted for you once already. So I am not going to ask questions and make you think I am trying to satisfy myself of whether I made a mistake or not. I very much support you. I congratulate you on the renomination.

I also want to say, Mr. Adams, your story about your own family's personal history is a very touching one. But it really does call to mind the tremendous sacrifice that our Foreign Service professionals make. The three of you, I guess, will have the title of Ambassador, and then, Mr. McGuire, you will be Executive Director. But you are all Ambassadors, but you also will be working with some fantastic small A ambassadors.

As I travel to do CODEL's as part of this committee, when I am in another country, I almost always will meet with first- and second-tour Foreign Service officers, the newcomers to the State Department family to ask them about their lives and their perceptions and to answer their questions. I always come back—Senator Cornyn and I were in Latin America 3 weeks ago. I always come back with a high degree of real inspiration for the service. I think we do a good job of thanking our military who serve in harm's way these days, but an awful lot of our nonmilitary personnel who serve overseas who get sent to places that may not be their first choice, sometimes to places where they cannot bring family, sometimes to places where there is physical danger—it is really important work. And so you will be working with wonderful colleagues, and I know that you will express that appreciation to them every day that you serve.

To just maybe go left to right, Mr. Adams, I want to ask you about—we had a hearing this morning about Russia and the Ukraine. We have had a lot of hearings about Russia in the months since you were here and about what is happening. Talk a little bit about the Finland-Russia relationship now and, in particular, whether the sanctions that the United States and NATO have imposed on Russia are having an effect on the economy of Finland.

Mr. ADAMS. Thank you, Senator. Let me address the second part of your question first, if I may.

Finland, as you know, is a very strong proponent of the sanctions regime against Russia and has implemented those sanctions forcefully. Even though, inasmuch as Finland has a very active trading relationship with Russia, it is Finland which, among the EU countries, has probably paid the highest price in terms of the impact on its economy. Finland's exports to Russia in 2014 were down by 13 percent in respect of 2013, largely as a result of the direct sanctions and of the reduced value of the ruble which impeded Russian purchasing power in respect to Finnish goods and services. Finland has stepped up and has made it clear that it is prepared not only to enforce existing sanctions but to advocate for enhanced and stronger sanctions to the extent that the crisis in Ukraine is not rapidly brought to a satisfactory close.

The relationship between Finland and Russia is ancestral. As you know, Finland spent over a century as a grand duchy of the czar of Russia from 1809 to December 6th of 1917. There had been dealings before. There have been dealings after, including armed conflict, as you know. In the course of the Second World War, Finland on two separate occasions staved off the assaults of the Red Army, incurring the admiration of the world in so doing.

It is a delicate relationship. Finland is very firmly anchored with the West in terms of its values, in terms of its liberal political system, its democracy, in terms of also of its sense of oneness with its neighbors to the west and to the south, even as Finland has sought to maintain a relationship with Russia that is based on shared respect and a concern for good neighborly proximity, and Finland has succeeded admirably in so doing.

The crisis in the Ukraine has brought focus on Finland as an interlocutor and bearer of messages to Russia which are heeded and paid close attention to by Russia because of the privileged posture of Finland and the respect with which Finland is held by Russia due to this relationship of several centuries standing. And if confirmed, I would look forward to working closely with the Finnish Government in continuing to strive for a satisfactory and prompt resolution of the crisis in Ukraine to which Finland is uniquely positioned to contribute.

Senator KAINE. Thank you very much, Mr. Adams.

Mr. Smith, the issue of the reciprocal treatment of U.S. Embassy and consular personnel in nations where they serve and then our treatment of their personnel here—there have been some newsworthy instances in the last couple years, most notably in some back and forth between the United States and India with respect to treatment of Indian Embassy and consular personnel in New York and then actions taken in India that challenged some of the rights of our Embassy personnel.

But one that is ongoing right now that I am just kind of curious about—I just returned from Latin America with Senator Cornyn, and when we were in Colombia, there was an escalating tension with the neighboring country of Venezuela. And my understanding is that Venezuela has sort of directed us to reduce our number of Embassy and consular personnel from—I do not know—about 100 down to 17. There are about 80 Venezuelan consular personnel in the United States. I am just curious if you have any insight that you can share in an opening setting as to how we are trying to work through that particular challenge to the credentials to our Embassy and consular personnel in Venezuela.

Mr. SMITH. Well, as you stated, Senator, as much as we can talk about it in open session, which is rather limited, but I agree with you. We got the number that we needed to reduce down to 17. We are looking at the situation now because, as you stated, there are more than 17 diplomats from Venezuela that are currently operating in the United States. And so we will continue in negotiations and discussions with the Government of Venezuela to come to a much more honest recognition of how many personnel they have here and hopefully be able to respond in a reciprocal way so that we can keep our numbers pretty much equal to what their numbers are. So it is still a situation that is developing. It is one that is still very much under study with the Department and one in which we remain engaged with the Venezuelans on this particular issue.

Senator KAINE. Great. Thank you, Mr. Smith, for that.

Mr. McGuire, I want to ask you about the activities of the IBRD in the Americas. The President currently has a budget proposal in that is Plan Central America. It is with respect to the Northern Triangle countries in Central America, Honduras, Guatemala, and El Salvador. The dramatic escalation in the number of unaccompanied minors coming to the United States, an average of about 20,000 to 35,000 in 2013, nearly 70,000 in 2014, drew a lot of attention to these three countries that have three of the worst murder rates in the world, huge amounts of poverty. And the President's proposal deals with kind of an all-encompassing strategy to help them deal with security challenges, fight narcotrafficking, and also do the kind of economic development and justice reforms that will enable the people to want to stay rather than to have to leave their countries due to poverty and violence.

Talk a little bit about the IBRD kind of portfolio. It looks to be about a third of activity is in the Americas. How can the IBRD be an asset to this need to hopefully upgrade the security and economic situation in Central America so we do not see the push of unaccompanied minors coming to our country.

Dr. MCGUIRE. Sure. I appreciate it. And I was actually in Colombia just last summer on a trade mission with the Commerce Department, and so I thought about a number of these issues from a regional perspective myself recently.

I would say the first place I would start is importantly to your point, realizing that there is an all-in strategy here in the sense that on certain matters it will be the State Department which is able to take the lead and help the Northern Triangle countries in particular. In certain instances, it is USAID on the bilateral side. It is worth noting that 11 of the 21 countries with which the United States has free trade agreements are in this hemisphere. All three of the Northern Triangle countries we have free trade agreements with. So there is an existing strong base there for increasing commerce, which leads to increasing stability.

That is really the part and parcel of what the World Bank is about, is stabilizing economies, growing economies so that a lot of other problems often can fade away so long as you are paying attention to them a little more directly like security and some of the things that you are addressing. So I think that is important to realize. There is a larger context here and this is an ongoing set of challenges that we are dealing with.

In terms of the IBRD, you are right. I believe it is closer to a quarter of the overall portfolio is within Latin America. So that is pretty significant. I would note that the two large economies within the region, the largest, Brazil and Mexico, are number one and number two in terms of total portfolio exposure, if you will, at the bank. So there is consistent and ongoing work. And I think the challenge for the bank is to continue to look at where it can have the greatest impact.

One example I will use—and please take it not as a recommendation to bank staff where they ought to go. But when I was in Colombia, one of the things I heard an awful lot about is the great potential that the eastern region had for developing agriculture. It is very fertile land. One of the big challenges that they have is, should that be fully developed, there are not enough roads and rail to get to market in the more densely populated regions to the west but also for export. And so these sorts of infrastructure projects could be something that would make a difference. Again, I am not making recommendations but saying these are the kind of things that the bank and its expert staff continue looking at to say how do we grow the economy, how do we diversify the economy, how do we give people multiple options so perhaps they are not drawn into some of the other activities that are going on down there.

And then finally, I would say, getting back to my original point, it is working in conjunction with all the other U.S. Government entities to make sure that we are working hand in hand and not at cross purposes so we can be most effective in trying to stabilize the region and help it to continue to grow.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you, Mr. McGuire.

And finally, Mr. Haney, I want to congratulate you. On this CODEL I was talking about, we spent about 35 minutes in the airport in Costa Rica, and the mere knowledge that we were there caused Embassy officials to drive and meet with us in our layover and ask us penetrating questions about when Fitz Haney was going to be confirmed by the Senate of the United States. And I thought if they drove all the way out to the airport about an hour from downtown knowing we would have 5 minutes to talk on your behalf, that speaks well for the team that you will be working with.

Costa Rica, a fascinating country; 120,000 American citizens, approximately, live there and more than 1 million Americans visit Costa Rica every year.

As we are grappling with some of the issues I asked Mr. McGuire about some of the security challenges in Central America, really two things. What can we do to help Costa Rica share some of its expertise, civil justice system, for example, in Honduras—I am very familiar with Honduras, having lived there. One out of 100 murders leads to a conviction. So there is almost complete impunity for the most serious crime there is, and that means people do not cooperate with the courts or police. Why be a witness? Why tell somebody what you saw if there is not going to be a conviction anyway? And that is a fairly common thing in Honduras, El Salvador, Guatemala. Costa Rica has a different tradition. I am interested in what you might be able to do to help sort of share that tradition in the region because of the cultural similarities.

But also, I am curious. Is Costa Rica seeing any up-tick in criminal activity? There is a little bit of a squeezing the balloon phenomenon. The better we do in Colombia, the more we push some criminal activity elsewhere. When we invest in Plan Merida in Mexico, we push some criminal activity elsewhere. Is Costa Rica seeing any escalation, especially in narcotraffic, and what might the United States do to help them deal with that issue?

Mr. HANEY. Thank you, Senator. And thanks to the team in Embassy San Jose who drove out to advocate on my behalf. I hope to be down there soon.

Let me start with the second part of your question. I do think that is the importance of the entire approach, both from the U.S. Government perspective, as well as the strategic perspective that we have to address this on a regional basis. Because of the success we have had in Colombia and success we have had in Mexico, being a business person, my belief is that as people develop distribution channels, they are going to ship through whatever they think they can make money on. And so the countries in the middle, so all of Central America, have been squeezed and have all experienced an up-tick or increase in violence. And Costa Rica has not been spared that up-tick. Last year, the murder rate went back up in Costa Rica, and it was most directly related to narcotrafficking.

So I think the fact that the country has, like I said, seized more drugs last year than any other country in the region—and that was a 30-percent increase over the previous year, and it has been 4 years in a row—tells, I think, one of two things. One is that the Costa Ricans are a very willing and capable partner, and we need to continue to partner with them on initiatives around security. And two, probably other countries are not doing as well as they should do if Costa Rica is number one in this. So I think they are exposed, and we can do everything we can to continue to support their democratic institutions so that they cannot become as tainted or as fragile as the Northern Triangle institutions are.

Now, what can Costa Rica do? I do think that Costa Rica, given its strong traditions and given its relative success on democracy and human rights, can serve to help institution-build within the region. And so I think our engagement—you know, we have not had an ambassador in Costa Rica now for almost 2 years, and I think our high-level engagement with the Government of Costa Rica will help them really to move to the next level. It is a natural impulse, I think, of the Solis government. President Solis has said that Costa Rica cannot prosper if the rest of the region is not prospering as well. And I think that is a shift in mindset that the Costa Ricans have come to as of late, but I think that we need to do everything we can to help them continue on that path.

And so one of my priorities will be engaging both the Costa Rican Government, as well as broader civil society really, because Costa Rica has a very deep and broad civil society, and see how can we bring training and other things, from a judicial standpoint, some of the things that we have helped, actually Costa Rica with, through some of the CARSI funding we have done over the last 5 years to really export that expertise to the Northern Triangle to really help and help the Costa Ricans continue to realize that helping the Northern Triangle is actually helping them as well.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Mr. Chair. I have no further questions, and thanks to all the witnesses.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you.

I just have a quick question, Mr. Adams, for the record. As you think about taking on this responsibility—and let me echo the ranking member's comment about your story. That is very touching.

As you think about, though, taking on this responsibility, how do you see the priorities? What will be your main focus as you take on this responsibility?

Mr. ADAMS. Senator Perdue, I think that the first priority for any United States Ambassador has to be the safety and the security of embassy personnel and of U.S. citizens at large in the particular country. And certainly this is something that, if confirmed, I will have foremost in my mind every day of my service in Finland.

Second, there is the matter that Senator Kaine addressed just now, the resolution of the crisis in Ukraine and the role that can be played by Finland in a constructive sense, working with the United States and with the European Union to communicate to the Russians the absolute necessity of finding a satisfactory resolution to this crisis quickly in order that the sanctions regime can gradually be diminished rather than strengthened still further.

Thirdly is the matter of the expansion of the bilateral trade relationship between Finland and the United States where, as I indicated, I believe that the United States can move up in the rankings both as a customer of Finland and as a supplier of goods and services to that country.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you very much.

Gentlemen, thank you for your comments today and for your forbearance and for being here today. Your testimony is in the record, and I am very impressed.

Just so you know, we are going to keep the record open in case Senator Gardner or any other members of the committee have any last-minute questions. I do not know that there will be any. But we ask that you respond to those if you get those in the next few days.

Again, I really want to thank you for your willingness to serve our country. I am very encouraged when I meet high-quality people with backgrounds like yours willing to serve. So thank you very much.

With the thanks of this committee, unless the ranking member has anything else, we will stand adjourned. Thank you very much. [Whereupon, at 3:20 p.m., the hearing was adjourned.]

ADDITIONAL MATERIAL SUBMITTED FOR THE RECORD

RESPONSES OF MATTHEW T. MCGUIRE, NOMINATED TO BE U.S. EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF THE INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT, TO A QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

DIRECTOR-DESIGNATE MCGUIRE'S RESPONSES
TO A QUESTION FROM SENATOR CORKER

Question. The World Bank Board in the next few months will be reviewing staff recommendations to improve the procurement practices of the Bank. While a number of very positive steps are being proposed, it is my understanding that, currently, the staff does not appear to be planning to propose changes to the bid price preference margins that are granted to domestic bidders on bank projects (15 percent preference on goods and 7.5 percent on works). Such preferences raise questions about compatibility with efficient procurement and fair bid competition. In fact, the impact of this practice can affect issues that go beyond Bank procurement. For example, the Bank's policy sometimes serves as an imprimatur for many developing countries to follow this practice in their own procurement, all of which is to the detriment of U.S. based bidders.

Answer. Yes.

TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR BARRASSO

Question. I appreciate that in your testimony, you committed to "be a sound steward of our country's capital at the Bank." It is critically important that U.S. resources are used in a responsible and effective manner.

♦ Do you believe requiring borrowers to accept higher cost energy projects is a responsible use of taxpayer dollars when affordable and reliable alternatives are readily available?

Answer. The World Bank should support expansion of low-cost, reliable energy access in developing countries, and should do so taking into account full lifecycle costs, including environmental and social costs. In some instances, this may lead to higher costs up front, but should not lead to higher costs for the life of the project. The World Bank has an important role to play in increasing the commercial viability and promoting the expansion of renewable, clean, and efficient energy sources and technologies.

Question. If confirmed, what criteria would you use to determine whether you will vote in support of energy development projects at the World Bank?

Answer. As I evaluate energy projects, I will look to see that the project meets the country's energy needs, has considered all relevant alternative approaches, and is as sustainable (both financially and environmentally) as possible. Of course, there are a variety of issues to consider in any project, including existing laws and policies, and these will apply to energy projects as well.

Question. Will you vote in support of energy development projects that include oil, coal, and natural gas at the World Bank?

Answer. I will vote in favor of projects that are consistent with U.S. law and policies and the World Bank's own operating guidelines. Consistent with its own Energy Sector Directions Paper, the World Bank should work to increase the commercial viability and promote the expansion of renewable, clean, and efficient energy sources and technologies. Global energy needs are vast, and there are instances where fossil fuels like gas and oil can play a role in the transition to such sources. Both the administration's Climate Action Plan and the World Bank's Energy Sector Directions Paper recognize the important bridging role that natural gas can have in moving toward more sustainable sources of energy supply.

Question. What are the current energy policies, rules, and restrictions at the World Bank that impact financing of energy development projects dealing with fossil fuels?

Answer. In July 2013, the World Bank adopted a new approach to its engagement in the energy sector. The approach recognizes the importance of increasing access to modern energy services through an integrated approach that addresses both energy supply and demand issues, including energy efficiency, tariff pricing, and reducing technical losses. The approach notes that the World Bank Group will "only in rare circumstances" support new greenfield coal power generation projects, such as meeting basic energy needs in countries with no feasible alternatives. The paper also says that the World Bank will scale up its work helping countries develop national and regional markets for natural gas.

Question. The World Bank approved a total of $1.6 billion in new projects in China through its nonconcessional window in fiscal year 2014. In fiscal year 2014, China was the third-largest recipient of financial assistance from International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, after Brazil and India. In 2014, China participated in the creation of two separate development banks called the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank and the New Development Bank.

- ♦ Why is the World Bank continuing to lend substantial resources to China, when China can more than meet their financing needs in the international capital market and started creating their own international lending institutions?

Answer. China's per capita income ($6,550) remains below the threshold ($7,185) at which point World Bank management is supposed to initiate discussions about graduation.

If confirmed, I will encourage the World Bank to begin discussions to transition China away from World Bank lending as it crosses the graduation threshold and to move toward other vehicles, such as reimbursable technical assistance and analytical and advisory assistance, to meet its development needs.

Question. What is your view of the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank and the New Development Bank? What kind of duplication will these new development banks have with existing multilateral and regional institutions?

Answer. I believe that there is a pressing need to enhance infrastructure investment around the world and that any new institutions should be designed to complement the existing institutions. I also believe that any new multilateral institution should incorporate the high standards that the international community has collectively built at the World Bank and the regional development banks.

Question. Do you believe that lending substantial resources to dynamic emerging market economies with access to international capital markets diverts capital away from countries with greater needs and lack of financial options?

Answer. No. The World Bank's sovereign lending is split between two different windows specifically to address this issue. Countries with greater needs and a lack of financial options receive concessional financing (grants or highly concessional loans) through the World Bank's concessional window—the International Development Association (IDA). As a country's per capita income increases and it gains access to international credit markets, it graduates from IDA to the World Bank's nonconcessional window—the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD).

The allocation of the IBRD's financial resources depends on a variety of factors, including the size of the borrower's population, economy, and its credit ratings. This method of allocating resources helps the IBRD to maintain its AAA credit rating and limits the need for frequent infusions of capital by its shareholders. Given differing credit profiles, reducing lending to upper middle-income countries will not result in a dollar-for-dollar increase in capital available for IBRD lending to lower middle-income countries. The IBRD must be able to provide adequate resources to lower middle-income countries as they graduate from IDA, but the IBRD has taken a number of steps to ensure that it has adequate capital resources to do so over the medium-term.

Question. What specific policies do you propose for graduating middle-income countries at the World Bank?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to urge World Bank management to apply the World Bank's existing graduation policy in a more consistent fashion. According to World Bank policy, countries remain eligible to borrow from the IBRD until they are able to sustain long-term development without further recourse to World Bank financing and until they have reached a sufficiently advanced level of development. The World Bank uses a per capita income threshold (currently $7,185) as a trigger for discussions on graduation. I believe that the World Bank should be having serious discussions with more borrowers about graduation. As countries approach the threshold for graduation, I will also encourage the World Bank to be more selective about which sectors it supports in those countries, with a focus on those that have the greatest impact on poverty reduction and have a global or regional public good aspect associated with them.

RESPONSES OF CHARLES C. ADAMS, JR., NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF FINLAND, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE ADAMS'S RESPONSES TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR SHAHEEN

Question. If confirmed as the next Ambassador to the Republic of Finland, will you commit to making the issue of gender equality and the particular challenge in Finland of gender-based violence a priority for this bilateral relationship?

Answer. If confirmed as the next Ambassador to the Republic of Finland, I commit to continuing our efforts to enhance human rights, including with regard to gender equality. With the use of important tools such as the annual Human Rights Report, and with the assistance of the State Department's Office of Global Women's Issues, I will continue to partner with Finland on eliminating gender inequality globally as well as engage with Finland on addressing gender-based violence at home. I am encouraged by our ongoing partnership with Finland, which has been the lead on U.N. Security Council Resolution 1325 implementation in Afghanistan. In this role, Finland has helped promote the importance of women in peace and security. The Finnish Government has also recognized the problem of gender-based violence domestically and adopted a 5-year, multisectoral action plan to combat violence against women. In addition, Finland recently passed legislation, effective January 1, 2015, outlining the government's assistance to and responsibility for safe houses and shelters for victims of domestic violence. If confirmed, my team and I will continue to support efforts to address the problem of gender-based violence.

NOMINATIONS

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 25, 2015

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, DC.

Paul A. Folmsbee, of Oklahoma, to be Ambassador of the United States of America to the Republic of Mali
Mary Catherine Phee, of Illinois, to be Ambassador of the United States of America to the Republic of South Sudan
Cassandra Q. Butts, of the District of Columbia, to be Ambassador of the United States of America to the Commonwealth of the Bahamas
Katherine Simonds Dhanani, of Florida, to be Ambassador of the United States of America to the Federal Republic of Somalia

The committee met, pursuant to notice, at 2:16 p.m., in room SD-419, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Hon. Jeff Flake presiding.
Present: Senators Flake and Markey.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. JEFF FLAKE, U.S. SENATOR FROM ARIZONA

Senator FLAKE. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee will come to order. I would like to welcome all of you here, both the nominees and family members.

We have talked and been able to meet all of you in my office. Thank you for coming by.

As you know, I have long had an interest in Africa, having spent some time there. Last week, Ed and I presided over a hearing, a subcommittee hearing examining the economic policies or the promises that exist on the continent, particularly after the summit we had, the Leader summit last August. That was our first hearing in the Congress, and we will have many more.

But today, we are going to hear from nominees to Mali, South Sudan, and Somalia, and we will look at some of sub-Saharan Africa's most serious challenges. We also have the nominee for the Bahamas as well. I am grateful that she is here.

After seeing positive developments in 2013, Mali's security and governance climate has continued to deteriorate. And despite international pressure and ongoing mediation efforts, the conflict of South Sudan has continued for over a year, costing more than 10,000 lives, displacing more than 2 million people, causing millions more to require humanitarian assistance.

The administration's decision to nominate an Ambassador in Somalia offers at least a glimmer of hope for movement on the security and governance front. I look forward to hearing more about the potential for progress, as well as the hurdles that exist, when we establish a presence in Mogadishu.

We are also considering a nominee, as I mentioned, for the Bahamas. It is an important regional neighbor, and I look forward to thoughts on economic progress and partnership with us here.

Thank you all for your time and for your expertise. I look forward to your testimony.

With that, I recognize Senator Markey.

STATEMENT OF HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY,
U.S. SENATOR FROM MASSACHUSETTS

Senator MARKEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, so much, and I very much appreciate you holding this very important hearing.

Three of the nominees that we are going to be talking about, and to, today, and hoping to be confirmed as U.S. Ambassadors, are looking at three of the most challenging countries in sub-Saharan Government: Mali, South Sudan, and Somalia. The fourth is seeking confirmation to the Bahamas, a place that most likely conjures up thoughts of vacation, but in truth it is a critical country on the United States third border in the Caribbean.

All four of our nominees have distinguished records of public service that will continue as U.S. Ambassadors when they are confirmed.

And I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for having this hearing.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you, Senator Markey. Our first nominee is Paul Folmsbee. Mr. Folmsbee is a career member of the Senior Foreign Service. He currently serves as executive director of the State Department's Bureau of African Affairs. Previously, Mr. Folmsbee served in a number of challenging assignments, including senior civilian representative for the Regional Command East Afghanistan; principal officer at the U.S. consulate in Mumbai, India; the Provincial Reconstruction team leader in Baghdad; and the director of international narcotics in law enforcement affairs at our Embassy in Pakistan.

Mr. Folmsbee has also served in a number of Africa assignments, including Gabon, Tanzania, Kenya. Mr. Folmsbee earned a B.A. in political science from Tabor College in Hillsboro, Kansas, and an M.A. in social anthropology from the University of Oklahoma in Norman, OK.

Our second nominee is Mary Catherine Phee. Ms. Phee is a career member of the Senior Foreign Service, currently serves as chief of staff in the Office of the Special Envoy for Sudan and South Sudan. From 2011 to 2014, Ms. Phee served as deputy chief of staff in Ethiopia. She was previously director for Iraq at the National Security Council, the regional affairs coordinator at the U.S. Embassy in Rome, and counselor for political affairs at the U.S. mission at the U.N. in New York.

Ms. Phee has held multiple positions focusing on Iraq and other countries in the Middle East. And before joining the Foreign Service, Ms. Phee also worked at Development Alternatives, a Bethesda, MD, company, and as deputy press secretary for Senator

Daniel Patrick Moynihan. Ms. Phee earned a B.A. at Indiana University and a master's degree from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy.

Our third nominee is Cassandra Butts. Ms. Butts is currently a senior adviser to the CEO at the Millennium Challenge Corporation. Previously, she served at the White House as deputy counsel to the President, general counsel in the Office of the President Elect, and general counsel for the Obama transition project. Prior to these nominations, Ms. Butts was the senior vice president for domestic policy at the Center for American Progress, and counsel and policy director for Representative Richard Gephardt in the United States House of Representatives.

She earned a B.A. from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, NC, and a J.D. from Harvard Law School.

Our fourth nominee is Katherine Simonds Dhanani. Ms. Dhanani is a career Foreign Service officer and currently serves as director of the Office of Regional and Security Affairs in the State Department's Bureau of African Affairs. Previously, Ms. Dhanani served as consul general at the U.S. consulate in India. She has held numerous assignments in Africa, including deputy chief of mission at the U.S. Embassy in Harare, Zimbabwe, and at the U.S. Embassy in Gabon. Prior to Gabon, she was political and economic section chief at the U.S. Embassy in Zambia, and economic section chief in the DRC.

Ms. Dhanani earned a B.A. from Kenyon College in Gambier, OH, and an M.A. from MIT.

So thank you all for being here. Thank you for sharing your thoughts and viewpoints. I am sure you will want to introduce family members as well, and we appreciate them for the sacrifice that they make as well as you serve.

We would appreciate it if you could keep your testimony to about 5 minutes, and then we can have time for questions to be asked.

So we will recognize Mr. Folmsbee first, and thank you again for being here.

STATEMENT OF PAUL A. FOLMSBEE, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF MALI

Mr. FOLMSBEE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Markey, and distinguished members of the committee. I am honored to come before you as President Obama's nominee to be the next United States Ambassador to Mali. I deeply appreciate the confidence and trust the President and Secretary of State have shown in nominating me for this position.

I am supported here today by my friends and colleagues from the State Department's Bureau of African Affairs, as well as my friends from USAID. In fact, my former PRT deputy leader from Baghdad is actually sitting behind me, Jeff Bakken. He is a good man.

My wife, Angie Chin, is also a U.S. diplomat and is probably watching us from Bangkok, Thailand, right about now. Unfortunately, she could not be here today.

My career in the Foreign Service began in 1987 and has led to me to assignments all over the world. The bulk of my assignments have been in developing countries, including Kenya, Haiti, Gabon, and Tanzania. In Iraq in 2007, I embedded with the 2/82nd Airborne, and ran a Provincial Reconstruction Team in Sadr City and Adhamiyah in downtown Baghdad. In Afghanistan in 2011, I embedded with the 1st Cavalry as a senior civilian rep for Regional Command East, where we worked on expanding governance and economic development programs.

If confirmed, I would draw upon these experiences and many others to deepen U.S.-Mali ties, as we continue to work toward our mutual goals of combating extremism, strengthening democratic governance, and fostering inclusive economic growth.

Mali continues to emerge from the most serious security, political, and development crisis it has faced since independence. It is rebuilding its social, economic, and governance institutions following the March 2012 coup d'état and subsequent takeover of parts of northern Mali by extremists.

Poverty both exacerbates Mali's conflicts and underscores its capacity challenges. Mali is ranked 176th of the 187 nations in the United Nations 2014 Human Development Index. In addition, the recent coup and the events that followed revealed the fragility of Mali's government institutions.

Despite these challenges, Mali peacefully elected a President and National Assembly in 2013. The new government has made national reconciliation a top priority, and donors are now engaging with the country. It is within this context U.S. engagement will be critical as we foster democratic values, promote good governance, and engender peace and security.

U.S. assistance programs will continue to increase access to education and health services, improve nutrition and sanitation, strengthen Malian food security, and facilitate inclusive economic growth. One of the key strategies for deepening economic growth is expanding the resiliency of poor communities so they will not be vulnerable to the shocks of extreme weather and conflict.

Security and stability remain a major challenge. The United Nations Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission, which is quite a mouthful, we call it MINUSMA, was established by the Security Council Resolution 2100 in April of 2013 to support the stabilization of the country and to carry out a number of security-related tasks.

Our government continues to fully support that effort by providing training, equipment, and intelligence. The success of this mission is critical to the long-term stability of the country.

Another key objective is to aid in the reformation of the Malian security sector by supporting institutions that can manage internal and external security threats, contribute to national and regional stability while adhering to civilian authority and respect international law and human rights norms.

While there are a number of areas in the security sector that require investment, the near-to-medium-term priority for U.S. assistance are those activities that will refine the national strategy, repair civilian-military relations, improve access to justice in the north, and encourage the legislature and civil society stakeholders to hold security services accountable.

The government has engaged in internationally supported efforts to advance peace talks with the northern armed groups. These talks are ongoing, and their positive outcome is far from ensured.

The U.S. Government will continue to participate in these negotiations as an observer and will also continue to look for opportunities to support a balanced and peaceful way forward.

The outbreak of the Ebola virus in West Africa, and the threat it represented to Mali, punctuated the need for urgent cooperation on health matters. Early containment of the outbreak was a major priority for the Government of Mali, international partners, and the United States. Fortunately, the threat was successfully contained, aided in part by direct U.S. assistance from the State Department, the National Institutes of Health, CDC, and USAID.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, if confirmed, I will look to you for counsel and support to ensure that our bilateral relationship remains firmly rooted in our shared vision of a democratic and prosperous Mali.

Thank you for inviting me to appear before you today. I would be pleased to answer any questions you may have.

STATEMENT OF MARY CATHERINE PHEE, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF SOUTH SUDAN

Ms. PHEE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Markey, distinguished members of the committee. I am honored to appear before you today as the President's nominee to be the United States Ambassador to the Republic of South Sudan.

I would like to thank President Obama and Secretary Kerry for the confidence they have placed in me. If confirmed, I will look forward to working with this committee.

I would also like to thank my family, friends, and colleagues who have generously shared encouragement, support, and laughter throughout my career. I could not undertake these challenges without them. And I would like to draw special attention to my sister, Amy, who is here today.

I am deeply proud of the opportunity to serve our Nation and to apply my experience in tough situations to advance American interests and values.

Mr. Chairman, I know you and the members of the committee share in the profound disappointment many of us experienced in December 2013 when the political process in South Sudan broke down, and the country's leaders resorted to violence to resolve their disputes. And as you noted, this has resulted in a significant loss of life and nearly 2 million people have been displaced inside and outside of South Sudan. More than 4 million people now need emergency humanitarian assistance, and the country's fledgling economy is at a standstill.

Our disappointment is rooted in the special relationship that we in the United States, including Congress, successive administrations, and the American people, forged with the people of South Sudan during their long civil wars and struggle for self-determination. We had high hopes that the 2005 Comprehensive Peace Agreement, which led to independence in 2011, offered a permanent end to war. But we were not blind to the challenges of overcoming decades of inadequate government, security, and development, and, with our international partners, sought to avert a breakdown of the fragile political order.

Then and now, our core interests remain strengthening this young democratic state and promoting internal stability and regional peace.

In collaboration with our Troika partners, which are the United Kingdom and Norway, we are backing negotiations to convince President Salva Kiir and former Vice President Riek Machar to commit to a durable cease-fire and to agree to a transitional government of national unity. The negotiating effort has been led by the group of countries neighboring South Sudan known as the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, or, more easily, IGAD. To the frustration of all, to date, the parties have resisted compromise.

The current IGAD chairman, Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn, announced March 6 that he would reform the peace process to formally include the African Union, the Troika, the United Nations, the EU, and China. We support this approach.

To be sustainable, we believe the final peace agreement must respect the desire of the people of South Sudan for justice and accountability, as well as reconciliation and healing.

We have called for the prompt release of the official report from the African Union's Commission of Inquiry, which was charged with investigating human rights violations and other abuses during the armed conflict. To advance the peace process, the U.N. Security Council on March 3 unanimously adopted a resolution we introduced that established a targeted sanctions regime and proposed an arms embargo that could be imposed should the South Sudanese leaders fail to respond to the mediation.

To address the humanitarian impact, we have provided more than $994 million in emergency humanitarian assistance, including help for internally displaced persons and refugees in neighboring countries. This assistance has helped stave off famine and provided lifesaving services such as water, sanitation, and health care.

Mr. Chairman, if confirmed, I will work with the leaders and the people of South Sudan to help end the conflict and begin the rebuilding. I will provide vigorous support to the ongoing effort to improve the humanitarian situation.

Through our partnership, we can help South Sudan begin to recover from this devastating setback, and regain the opportunities present at independence.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I assure you that, if confirmed, I will be proud to carry on the diplomatic tradition of ensuring the safety and security of American citizens abroad while focusing on the welfare of the American and South Sudanese staff of Embassy Juba.

Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Markey, I thank you for the honor to appear before you today, and I welcome your questions.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF MARY CATHERINE PHEE

Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Markey, members of the committee, I am honored to appear before you as the President's nominee to be the United States Ambassador to the Republic of South Sudan. I would like to thank President Obama and Secretary Kerry for the confidence they have placed in me. If confirmed, I will look forward to working with this committee. Mr. Chairman, I know you and the members of the committee share in the profound disappointment many of us experienced in December 2013 when the political process in South Sudan broke down and the country's leaders resorted to violence to resolve their disputes. This breakdown has generated a senseless conflict. There has been a significant loss of life and nearly 2 million people have been displaced inside and outside of South Sudan. More than 4 million people now need emergency humanitarian assistance and the country's fledgling economy is at a standstill.

Our disappointment is rooted in the special relationship that we in the United States—including Congress, successive administrations, and the American people—forged with the people of South Sudan during their long civil wars and struggle for self-determination. To advance the peace process, the U.N. STATEMENT OF CASSANDRA Q. BUTTS, NOMINATED TO BE
AMBASSADOR TO THE COMMONWEALTH OF THE BAHAMAS

Ms. BUTTS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Ranking Member. I appreciate the opportunity to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to be our next Ambassador to the Commonwealth of the Bahamas.

I am profoundly grateful for the honor the President has bestowed upon me, and for the confidence shown in me by Secretary Kerry, as I look to assume this new assignment, if confirmed.

I would like to take the opportunity to introduce my sister, Deidra Abbott, who is here today, representing my family. My family has been a wellspring of support for me, and I would not be here today but for their support, their love, and their belief in me.

I believe my experience as a lawyer and a policy adviser, and my service to my country in the executive and legislative branches, have well-prepared me for the duties of Ambassador to the Commonwealth of the Bahamas. Having worked on some of the major legal policy issues of our time, including my most recent experience in international development at the Millennium Challenge Corporation, I have always sought solutions consistent with the values of our great Nation. I understand that leading with our values is a basis for finding lasting policy solutions and building strong partnerships at home and abroad.

If the Senate confirms me, I would bring those experiences grounded in my strong belief in equality, justice, and compassion to the post of the Ambassador to the Commonwealth of the Bahamas.

Through close political and economic and cultural ties, the United States and the Bahamas have forged a strong bilateral relationship that has served both countries quite well. Bahamians regularly travel to the United States to visit friends and family and to conduct business, and approximately 6 million U.S. citizens travel to the Bahamas annually.

The proximity of the Bahamas to the United States inextricably links our country's national security. Together, we are confronting shared challenges, such as illicit trafficking, including narcotics, arms, and people, as well as bolstering the rule of law.

If confirmed, my first and foremost priority will be to ensure the safety and security of U.S. citizens living in or visiting the Bahamas, as well as the Turks and Caicos Islands, which are included among Embassy Nassau's consular oversight.

I will work closely with the Bahamian authorities, community groups, and the entire U.S. mission, including the U.S. law enforcement officials, under Chief of Mission Authority, to promote innovative, effective, and whole-of-government-based efforts to reduce crime rates and other illegal activities. I will also continue to promote greater economic ties and growth, including exploring ways to make the Bahamas a more attractive place in which to invest and do business through the development and enforcement of stable and transparent regulations, as well as procurement and investment procedures.

If confirmed, I will work to assist the Bahamas in protecting and preserving for future generations the incredible natural beauty that makes it the vacation destination of choice for so many people, including by expanding marine protected areas. As part of the same effort, I will encourage the Bahamas to adopt cleaner technologies and build strong and resilient energy markets, which will not only provide a more secure and sustainable clean energy future in economic growth, but also limit the effects of greenhouse gas emissions.

I also will make working with our Bahamian partners on human rights issues a priority by seeking to further gender equality; to expand opportunities for disenfranchised youth; and to encourage Bahamian officials to adopt fair, humane, and transparent practices related to irregular migrants, including improved access to refugee status determinations.

Expanding educational exchanges is one of the best ways to deepen the already existing cultural and historic ties between the United States and the Bahamas. At present, approximately 1,700 students from the Bahamas study in the United States, and more than 750 students from the United States study in the Bahamas. If confirmed, I will seek to increase levels of educational exchange between our two countries, including through enhancing existing partnerships and building new ones.

While geography and history have forged strong bonds between our countries, the Bahamas also maintains close economic ties with many other nations. As the world economy continues to rebound, the Bahamas key tourism and hospitality sectors have seen increases in Asian investment. We do not see foreign economic and commercial links to the Bahamas as a threat to U.S. interests. We strongly believe that the American companies can successfully compete with anybody in the world when transparent regulations and practices with steadfast respect for the rule of law prevail.

The United States has not had an ambassador in Nassau for over 4 years, but we have strong leadership and staff at U.S. Embassy the Bahamas continuing the important work of the mission. Still, the value of having a confirmed U.S. Ambassador to advance U.S. interests cannot be overstated.

If confirmed, I will strive to further the good work of our Nassau mission and strengthen the close and productive bilateral relationship.

In closing, I am confident that I have the experience and imagination and the energy to lead our bilateral relationship with the people and the Government of the Commonwealth of the Bahamas. I thank you, again, Mr. Chairman, and Mr. Ranking Member Markey, and I look forward to answering any questions you may have.

If confirmed, I

pledge to uphold the tradition and high standards of public service expected of a U.S. ambassador. I look forward to the opportunity to continue to serve my country.

STATEMENT OF KATHERINE SIMONDS DHANANI, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF SOMALIA

Ms. DHANANI. Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Markey, I am honored to appear before you today to be considered for the position of United States Ambassador to the Federal Republic of Somalia.

I am deeply grateful to President Obama and Secretary Kerry for the confidence in me they have shown with this nomination.

If confirmed, I pledge to work with you to advance our interests by promoting a unified and peaceful Somalia with a stable and representative government that can defend its territory, foster economic development, and defend human rights.

Mr. Chairman, please allow me at this time to introduce my husband, Azim Dhanani. His support has meant everything to me as he accompanied me to assignments around the globe. And if confirmed, I will continue to rely on him as I take up my new responsibilities.

This is a critical time in our engagement with Somalia. Decades of conflict, famine, and oppression led many to label Somalia a failed state. Today, Somalis are proving those pessimists wrong. There is progress in Somalia, measured, but real progress on security, on economic development, and on the establishment of representative government.

Just over 2 years ago, the United States officially recognized the Federal Government of Somalia. Since that time, we have been working closely with the Somalis as they rebuild their state and lay a foundation for the future.

The decision to nominate the first U.S. Ambassador to Somalia in over 2 decades was taken in recognition of our deepening relationship and our conviction that Somalia is on a path that will bring better times. Establishment of a permanent diplomatic presence in Mogadishu will represent the culmination of this recognition process, but there is no fixed timeline for achieving this objective.

If confirmed, I will carefully monitor the security environment in Somalia, as I seek to advance our diplomatic objectives with no higher priority than my responsibility for the security of personnel under my charge. U.S. interests in Somalia are clear, just as the collapse of Somalia was a strain on the region, stability, prosperity, and peace in Somalia will bolster positive trends in economic and democratic development in Africa.

Violent extremists exploited the past failure of governance in Somalia to our and Somali's detriment.

We have a strong humanitarian interest in easing the suffering of 2 million refugees and internally displaced persons, in reducing the food insecurity that leaves Somalia vulnerable to famine, and in addressing the failures that place Somalia at the bottom of the list on so many human development indicators.

If confirmed, I will keep these U.S. interests firmly in mind as I lead U.S. engagement with the Somali Government, the Somali people, and the international partners who share our commitment to seeing Somalia succeed.

Mr. Chairman, in my written statement, I outlined the U.S. strategy on Somalia, which was submitted to Congress last summer. In the interests of time, I will not repeat that, but in sum, U.S. policy revolves around three elements: security, the political process, and development. Gains in each reinforce and must keep pace with the others.

Mr. Chairman, Somalia is moving in the right direction but more progress is needed. Somali leaders must pull together to build their institutions, protect their citizens, and unite their country. Somalia's neighbors and friends must assist in that effort.

I can assure you today that, if confirmed, it will be my honor to restore U.S. Mission Somalia, advance U.S. interests, and strengthen our relationship with Somalia. And I look forward to the opportunity to work with the committee to achieve those goals.

I also look forward to answering any questions you may have.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Dhanani follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF KATHERINE S. DHANANI

Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Markey, and members of the committee, I am honored to appear before you today to be considered for the position of United States Ambassador to the Federal Republic of Somalia. I am deeply grateful to President Obama and Secretary Kerry for the confidence in me they have shown through this nomination. If confirmed, I pledge to work with you to advance our interests by promoting a unified and peaceful Somalia, with a stable and representative government, that can defend its territory, foster economic development, and defend human rights.

Mr. Chairman, please allow me at this time to introduce my husband, Azim Dhanani. His support has meant everything to me as he accompanied me to assignments around the globe, and, if confirmed, I will continue to rely on him as I take up my new responsibilities.

This is a critical time in our engagement with Somalia. Decades of conflict, famine, and oppression led many to label Somalia a "failed state." Today, Somalis are proving those pessimists wrong. There is progress in Somalia—measured but real progress—on security, on economic development, and on the establishment of representative government. Just over 2 years ago, the United States officially recognized the Federal Government of Somalia. Since that time, we have been working closely with the Somalis as they rebuild their state and lay a foundation for the future. The decision to nominate the first U.S. Ambassador to Somalia in over two decades was taken in recognition of our deepening relationship and our conviction that Somalia is on a path that will bring better times. Establishment of a permanent diplomatic presence in Mogadishu will represent the culmination of this recognition process, but there is no fixed timeline for achieving this objective. If confirmed, I will carefully monitor the security environment in Somalia as I seek to advance our diplomatic objectives, with no higher priority than my responsibility for the security of personnel under my charge.

U.S. interests in Somalia are clear. Just as the collapse of Somalia was a strain on the region, stability, prosperity, and peace in Somalia will bolster positive trends in economic and democratic development in Africa. Violent extremists exploited the past failure of governance in Somalia, to our and Somalis' detriment. We have a strong humanitarian interest in easing the suffering of 2 million refugees and internally displaced Somalis, in reducing the food insecurity that leaves Somalia vulnerable to famine, and in addressing the failures that place Somalia at the bottom of the list on so many human development indicators. If confirmed, I will keep these U.S. interests firmly in mind as I lead U.S. engagement with the Somali Government, the Somali people, and the international partners who share our commitment to seeing Somalia succeed.

Mr. Chairman, as referenced in the U.S. Strategy on Somalia that the State Department submitted to Congress last summer, and the subsequent January update, U.S. policy revolves around three elements: security, the political process, and development. On the security front, our top priority is degrading al-Shabaab, which has links to al-Qaeda. Driving al-Shabaab from its remaining strongholds and neutralizing it as a destabilizing force are critical to open up space for legitimate governance and development opportunities. If confirmed as Chief of Mission, it will be my priority to continue our efforts to help our African partners to degrade al-Shabaab. I will continue to support the African Union Mission in Somalia—or AMISOM as it is most commonly known—until Somalis are ready and able to assume full responsibility for their own security. To that end, building the capacity of the Somali National Security Forces will be a top priority.

In Somalia, political and security gains must reinforce and keep pace with one another. The Federal Government has made progress establishing government institutions, negotiating relationships with regional authorities, and supporting community stabilization. However, the Somali Government's institutional capacity and reach remain extremely limited. If confirmed, I will ensure that the United States, in very close coordination with our international partners, continues to support the Somali Government as it implements "Vision 2016"—the Somali-led state-building agenda for completing a federal state-formation process, holding a constitutional referendum, and preparing for democratic elections.

As we focus on the long-term goals of establishing a sustainable federal system of governance, we must keep in focus the immediate needs of the Somali people. Tragically, Somalis continue to face a multitude of natural and man-made threats to their livelihoods and their lives. Those imperiled by al-Shabaab risk losing their land, their livestock, and their lives; those freed from al-Shabaab may still be in danger from an overall lack of security, including gender-based violence and interclan rivalry. Last year alone, conflict forced more than 80,000 Somalis from their homes. The food security situation continues to teeter on the brink of crisis with a million or more Somalis at risk. If I am confirmed, U.S. efforts to help address these urgent needs will remain at the forefront of our engagement.

Mr. Chairman, Somalia is moving in the right direction, but more progress is needed. Somali leaders must pull together to build their institutions, protect their citizens, and unite their country. Somalia's neighbors and friends must assist in that effort. I can assure you today that, if confirmed, it will be my honor to restore U.S. Mission Somalia, advance U.S. interests, and strengthen our relationship with Somalia, and I look forward to the opportunity to work with the committee to achieve those goals.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you, Ms. Dhanani. I want to apologize. I put an "L" in your name at the beginning.

Well, thank you for your testimony, all of you, and thank you again to the family members who are here and watching from afar, as well.

Mr. Folmsbee, with regard to Mali, what is the biggest U.S. commercial interest that we have there?

Mr. FOLMSBEE. You know, Senator, to be honest with you, Mali is fighting for last place in a human index factor put out by the United Nations. Its economy is at a low point after the 2012 coup, and so it is very modest.

Any kind of economic development issue, I am sure we could dig up some U.S. sales and that sort of thing, but it is going to be very limited. In reality, it is going to be development assistance at this point.

Senator FLAKE. So commercial development not for a while, mostly development?

Mr. FOLMSBEE. If we can hook some U.S. companies out there, I promise you I will personally get on it and help get them out there.

Senator FLAKE. It is a good place to start, in that regard.

Mr. FOLMSBEE. Absolutely.

Senator FLAKE. Well, great.

Ms. Phee, just yesterday it was reported that the legislature or the lawmakers in South Sudan voted to extend the President's term for another 3 years. I guess they are trying to confer legitimacy where they can. What role is President Kiir playing at present, in your view? What can he do to help the situation at this point?

Ms. PHEE. Thank you, Senator. We believe the best approach remains a peace agreement, a peace agreement that would end the conflict and establish a transitional government of national unity. And one of the key tasks of that transitional government would be to hold elections, permanent elections. That would be the best way to renew legitimacy.

The President's Special Envoy, Ambassador Donald Booth, was in Juba yesterday meeting with President Kiir to continue to push him to make the compromises necessary to reach that peace agreement.

Senator FLAKE. We have a long way to go, though, it is safe to assume.

Ms. PHEE. It is a challenging task ahead of all of us. One good sign is the fact that so many are unified in wanting to see an end to this conflict. The neighbors, the African Union, the United Nations, China is supporting us in this effort. So, hopefully, if we continue to speak with a collective voice, we will be able to make an impact.

And in that regard, Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the Congress for its efforts. Its statements, its meetings, its calls, have helped reinforce that message to the South Sudanese leaders that it is time to make compromise.

Senator FLAKE. The countries in the region are playing a role through the regional organization, but Uganda has kind of played an outsized role there. Has that been negative or positive or both? I know there have been some issues with some of the troops.

Ms. PHEE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. IGAD has had a tough time, but I think it is important to recognize that any peace agreement that is reached will need the support of its neighbors to be fully effective. So we continue to engage with them to work closely with them to try and help them reach the shared goal that we all have of seeing an end to the conflict.

Senator FLAKE. You mentioned one of your roles, as it is for every Ambassador, to protect U.S. citizens who happen to be traveling there. To what extent do we have U.S. citizens—I am assuming it is mostly those in the Sudanese diaspora. What kind of visits are they on right now? I mean, are there other many visits going on?

Ms. PHEE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for raising that point. The State Department last issued a travel warning for South Sudan advising American citizens not to travel there because of the current conflict. We did that in January of this year. So you are absolutely correct. The primary set of visitors from the United States are members of the diaspora, who, like us, care very deeply about this situation and are trying to support a positive resolution.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

Ms. Butts, when we spoke in my office, you were talking about the pretty robust presence that we have there given our interest in all the travel, 6,000 visits a year. Can you describe how many State Department employees, roughly, and how many folks from Customs and other agencies of government there are there?

Ms. BUTTS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Nassau is distinct as a post in that there are actually fewer State Department employees in Nassau than there are Homeland Security employees. Actually, there is more of a Homeland Security presence there from Customs and Border Protection, and a lot of the work that we do around immigration and trying to deter irregular migration. There is a significant Coast Guard presence in Nassau. So in total, we have a little over 200 staff with about 20-plus on the State Department side, and about 70 for Homeland Security, and then other agencies are also included. We have a few from DOJ. We have, of course, have a military attaché at post.

And as you appreciate, it is an archipelago, so there are a number of islands. So in Freeport, for example, there is a significant Customs and Border Protection presence, because of preclearance for flights that go between the United States and between the Bahamas.

So it is a distinct post in both the size and the composition of the staff at post.

Senator FLAKE. A lot of your function will be coordinating then, I assume?

Ms. BUTTS. It will, and that is actually one of the challenges of the post. Things have been working very well. The Chargé there, Lisa Johnson, is actually with us today and has done a great job waiting for an ambassador.

But the coordination is a significant part. Fortunately, the agencies work very well together, and we have a very, very robust coordinated effort in dealing with illicit trafficking and dealing with irregular migration.

Senator FLAKE. Well, thank you.

Ms. Dhanani, can you describe the security situation currently in-country? My understanding is that you will not be stationed in the country, initially. You will operate from Nairobi. We have a secured facility at the airport, I guess.

Can you kind of describe the challenges that we have there, and what the timetable might be for you to actually be in-country for more than a few days at a time, I should say?

Ms. DHANANI. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and you have identified one of the major issues that will be preoccupying me.

I go to Nairobi with a mission of reestablishing a permanent diplomatic presence in Mogadishu, but that will depend on improvements in the security circumstances on the ground. We have adopted a policy that involves continual monitoring of the security environment and phased reengagement. The phase that we currently stand at allows us to have members of the U.S. Government team enter Mogadishu for periods of up to 2 weeks, to stay for periods as long as 2 weeks. But we can only have a limited presence in Mogadishu at any given time.

And at the moment, our assessment of the security situation does not permit us to move beyond the airport. Clearly, we need to see improvement in the security situation what will allow us to have greater access to all of Mogadishu, as well as have greater numbers of people on the ground at the airport. So there are limitations today, but it is an enormously improved situation to what it was as little as 2 years ago.

During the last year, the team in the Somalia unit and the U.S. Government employees made 161 trips into Somalia. They visited Mogadishu. They visited many of the regional capitals. They have really had an opportunity to substantially expand their engagement.

As I am there, I will be engaged in constant risk monitoring, risk mitigation, and risk management as we seek to take advantage of improved security to move further and engage further in the pursuit of the objectives that we have in Somalia.

Senator FLAKE. A little more complicated than finding a real estate agent and looking for a residence then, I assume. Well, thank you.

Mr. Markey.

Senator MARKEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, very much.

Ms. Phee, could you talk about a year later after the United States announced sanctions against South Sudan, in terms of the cooperation we are getting from the EU in ensuring the effectiveness of our policy?

Ms. PHEE. Thank you very much for that question.

The resolution that was adopted earlier this month in the Security Council was a unanimous resolution that established a framework to impose international targeted sanctions. That unanimous resolution follows individual steps by the United States, where the President has used his Executive authority, as well as action by the EU to impose EU's targeted sanctions. So we are now ready to use the forum in the Security Council as a tool to support the peace negotiations.

I think, in sum, I would characterize the EU posture as complementary to our own and adding to the collective pressure to reach an end to the conflict.

Senator MARKEY. Ms. Dhanani, how would you characterize al-Shabaab's relationship with al-Qaeda in all of its manifestations? And how would you describe al-Shabaab's ability to recruit outside of its region, to further destabilize the area?

Ms. DHANANI. Senator Markey, al-Shabaab has formally affiliated with al-Qaeda, so when we engage or consider engagement regarding al-Shabaab, we treat al-Shabaab as we would al-Qaeda.

A very worrying aspect of the crisis in Somalia in recent years has been the effect that it has had on Somalia's neighbors. Certainly, in Kenya, in the Westgate mall attack last year, but also throughout the region in Uganda, Djibouti, and elsewhere, there have been incidents. There have been attacks—some successful, some unsuccessful—that have their roots in al-Shabaab.

And it is for that reason that Somalia's neighbors have formed the bulk of the force that we are supporting as they seek to reverse the gains of al-Shabaab.

Senator MARKEY. What is al-Shabaab's largest source of revenue today?

Ms. DHANANI. My understanding, sir, Ranking Member Markey, is that al-Shabaab continues to rely on charcoal trade, taxes that they achieve through the charcoal trade, and also through extortion.

They no longer control cities. They no longer control large areas. But they are present in various places in the country. Their resources are much more limited than they were when they controlled a large part of the country, but they still have access in a number of places.

Senator MARKEY. Okay, thank you.

Mr. Folmsbee, can you talk a little bit about the French presence in Mali, its military there, what role it is playing, what success it is enjoying or not enjoying? Just give us a little bit of an overview of the French role right now in that country.

Mr. FOLMSBEE. Well, thank you for that question, Senator.

The French role has been critical. The French went into Mali in 2013 and drove al-Qaeda out of the Northern areas. We have heavily supported that activity, mostly in logistics, but the French have done a lot of good work there. Also with training and setting up MINUSMA, they have also played a key role, although they are also assisting directly with the Malian Army as well, where there have been some difficulties. So they played a very key role.

Senator MARKEY. What is it going to take for the rebels to agree to a peace deal, in your opinion?

Mr. FOLMSBEE. Well, that is a good question. You know, I think the fundamental issue is going to come down to the government and the northern groups, led in part by MNLA, to agree to some terminologies relating to the devolution of authority and power.

I do not know if I see the end of that just yet, but I am hopeful that we will get there. So I think we can hope that will come.

Senator MARKEY. Okay, great, thank you.

Ms. Butts, who I have known for 20 years, can you talk a little bit about the immigration policy in the Bahamas and the questions that are being raised about the barriers that are being erected to being able to gain citizenship and not living in a stateless status? Could you give your overview of what that situation looks like today?

Ms. BUTTS. Yes, absolutely. Thank you, Ranking Member Markey.

We work in a coordinated effort with the Bahamians to patrol both sea and surface patrols to deter irregular migration in the region, but also to interdict irregular migration when we have the opportunity to do so. It is my understanding that migrants coming through the area are principally Haitian and Cuban migrants who stop off in the Bahamas, and ultimately want to make their way to the United States.

If I am confirmed, one of the things that I will urge the Bahamian Government is to ensure that they are following international standards in how they are managing irregular migration with the support of the United States as we have supported them in the past.

There are significant pockets of migrants in the Bahamas. There is a large Bahamian-Haitian community in the Bahamas. As you are probably aware, Senator Markey, there has been a change in the policy of the Bahamian Government. It actually went into effect in November 2014. It now requires that migrants who are in the country actually have passports of their countries of nationality, and they also have documentation that they can legally be in the Bahamas.

There have been concerns that have been raised by the Bahamian-Haitian community and by human rights advocates that the implementation of the policy has unfairly targeted Haitian communities, and that the Haitians or that the detainees who are being detained as a result of the policy in the detention facility are not being treated to international standards.

I will, certainly, urge while I am there, if I am confirmed, that the Bahamians follow international standards in how they are implementing their immigrant policy and also how they are maintaining the detention facilities.

As you are aware, Senator Markey, I have worked for a number of years on issues related to migration. These are things that I care about, I understand, and I look forward to having the opportunity, if confirmed, to engage on the issue.

I am very confident, though, that the Bahamians have robust democratic institutions, and they will be able to address these concerns with the help of the U.S. Government and also the international community, and I look forward to engaging.

Senator MARKEY. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

We will do one more round, if that is all right.

Mr. Folmsbee, do we know who is responsible for the latest attacks on the MINUSMA forces?

Mr. FOLMSBEE. In the north, yes, I believe there is very good intel on that. This is an open session, and I do not know if it is out in the public yet. But there is good intel on that.

There were also attacks in Bamako, and al-Mourabitoun actually has claimed responsibility for those attacks.

Senator Flake. Do we know what is leading to this increase in attacks?

Mr. FOLMSBEE. Well, it is very clear that some of the Tuareg extremists groups are looking to put pressure on the government as it relates to the peace talks. I think there is little doubt about that.

But I also think that they will be thwarted. I think there is a lot of pressure back against them.

Senator FLAKE. As far as the U.S. Government is concerned, do we have the right mix in civilian and military tools for you in the country?

Mr. FOLMSBEE. I think we do, but I will also say, if confirmed, I am, certainly, going to be looking at that, because that is a fair question. The key issue is going to ultimately be what is the north—the opportunity for the government is really to make inroads to the north. There have to be paved roads up there. There have to be jobs up there. There have to be hospitals up there.

So if the government does not swing around with that, our actions will not matter that much. So we have to make sure that the government takes that on.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

Ms. Phee, you mentioned in your testimony, the U.N. Security Council on March 3 resolution established a targeted sanctions regime, even proposed an arms embargo that could be imposed, should these South Sudanese officials not respond to mediation. What effect do you believe that would have, particularly the arms embargo that is talked about?

Ms. PHEE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The objective of the resolution was to send sort of an unequivocal signal to the parties that they were at a crossroads, that it is really time. This conflict has gone on too long. The humanitarian consequences are devastating. And it is time to reach an end and find a way forward.

So it was an effort to provide the negotiators with a tool to convince both sides that there is no self-interest in sustaining the conflict. That is the objective of the resolution. It is tied very closely to the progress of the negotiations, particularly, as I mentioned, this new effort by IGAD to reformulate the negotiating process, and, frankly, to provide a more direct role for outsiders such as ourselves to be engaged and hopefully bring this over the finish line.

Senator FLAKE. All right, well, thank you.

Ms. Butts, we have cooperation with the government with regard to drug interdiction, with the Bahamian Government. Can that be improved, or is that considered good? How would you characterize it?

Ms. BUTTS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. We have made tremendous progress in that area. As you are aware, during the 1980s there was very robust trafficking, a lane through the Bahamas. And at that point in the 1980s, about 80 percent of the cocaine that came to the United States actually came through the Bahamas.

Since then, we have actually established a very robust partnership that is focused on our OPBAT task force. As recently as 2011, actually 10 percent of the cocaine coming to the United States actually came through the Bahamas, and so we have had tremendous success in that regard.

Unfortunately, over the past couple of years, Mr. Chairman, we have seen a bit of an uptick in what was 10 percent in 2011, has now become about 14 percent. So we are doing well. We can, certainly, do better. We could, certainly, use additional resources to fight illicit narcotics coming through. But we have a very strong partnership with the Bahamians on that area.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

Ms. Dhanani, what do you think the prospects are for elections that are scheduled to be held next year? And given a very complicated arrangement with the government appointed, as opposed to elected, how credible will that be seen around the country, if these elections are actually held?

Ms. DHANANI. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I think you have touched on an extremely important factor. We need a Government of Somalia that is a representative government, that the people feel is answerable to them, and that is representative to all the regions of the country in order to have stability going forward.

The existing Federal Government of Somalia was selected. Elders selected the Parliament, and the Parliament nominated the President, and there is a degree of representivity, but not to the extent that we require.

That government, however, has defined and outlined a detailed roadmap toward representative government. "Vision 2016" is the name of this roadmap. It is a roadmap that we and the rest of the international community are supporting.

It includes a number of steps on which the deadlines have already been missed, quite frankly. We are currently focused on urging the Somalis to make progress toward restoring that schedule, making progress toward establishing a constitution.

Creating a federal system is a very complicated task. When we think of what our Founding Fathers achieved and the stability of the United States, it is quite remarkable. This is the challenge that faces Somalis today. And we are supporting the vision that they have outlined, and we are urging, along with our friends and throughout the international community, that they stick to this plan that they have defined for themselves.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

Mr. Markey.

Senator MARKEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Each of you is extremely well-qualified. Life's work has prepared you for the jobs which you are being nominated to take on for our country. What I would like you to, perhaps, give us is, in each one of your own words, your hopes for what you will be remembered for in your ambassadorship, what achievement you want to have left behind when your service has been completed. I am going to ask each one of you to give me a sense of what it is that you would like to have left as your legacy.

We will begin with you, Mr. Folmsbee.

Mr. FOLMSBEE. This is really a great opportunity to talk about that, so thank you for that question.

I think the key element and concern I have for Mali is the divide where the Niger River runs across the country. Everybody to the north has never really been connected to everyone to the south. So you have this cycle of conflict that has been going on for 50 years and probably much longer, actually.

I think the opportunity for all of us in the diplomatic community and the government is to help connect that. That is going to be through education and other areas, as well as in security.

So I hope that is the legacy that someone like myself and our whole team can leave behind, making that connection. That is going to make a big difference that will help stabilize that country.

That is what I am going to do, if confirmed.

Senator Markey. Thank you, sir.

Ms. Phee.

Ms. PHEE. Thank you, Ranking Member Markey, for your support. If I were to be confirmed, I would be the second U.S. Ambassador to the Republic of South Sudan, so that raises a question: Who wants to be second, right? Generally speaking, second is not a positive space.

But in this instance, I think second is very important and very special, because I would symbolize United States commitment to the people of South Sudan. We are there in the tough times, as well as the more fun times, as was experienced in 2011 when the new state was established.

So, moreover, I would also follow, I think, in the footsteps of so many Americans, students, church groups, activists, Members of Congress, members of so many administrations who have cared for so long for the people of South Sudan and all the suffering they have experienced.

So I would be proud to stand second behind all those folks, and represent U.S. commitment to helping get this right.

Senator MARKEY. Thank you.

Ms. Butts.

Ms. BUTTS. Thank you, Ranking Member Markey.

There is so much that I want to do. If I had to boil it down, I would say, just overall strengthening the bilateral relationship, furthering social and economic justice in the country. Certainly, building on and enforcing and supporting human rights for all the people of the Bahamas, and just more within the mission, within post, strengthening management, improving morale, showing that the people who work at post are valued and all of their efforts are appreciated.

So I hope that my legacy is both inside appreciating the people who work at post, and outside reflecting the best of U.S. values and the best that we have to offer in America.

Senator MARKEY. Thank you.

Ms. Dhanani.

Ms. DHANANI. Thank you, Senator Markey.

I think I have a small advantage here. Unlike my colleague nominated for South Sudan, I will be the first in sometime, and therefore, I have that advantage in a sense.

You know, the step of deciding to nominate someone to serve as Ambassador to Somalia represented the progress that was the result of a lot of hard work that many people, including many of my colleagues in the U.S. Government, put in over the last few years. So in a sense, my nomination is a tribute to the efforts that they made.

Similarly, I would hope the efforts that I and my team make will take us to that next step, the step of establishing a permanent diplomatic presence in Mogadishu. I think that step will be important in itself, but it will be even more important because it will be a sign that so many things have continued to move in a favorable direction, and that Somalia is getting closer and closer to being the kind of peaceful, secure, unified, stable place that we would all like to see it become.

Senator MARKEY. Thank you.

Well, you are an extraordinary group, and we thank you for your willingness to serve our country.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

I want to note the presence of the Deputy Chief of Mission, Chet Neymour, from the Bahamas here.

I want to thank all of you for your testimony and for being here. Thank you for your service. And hearing your remarks and looking at your resumes, it is apparent that you have all been at this awhile. And I know that sometimes our diplomatic efforts are overlooked by the general populace. You are not given the opportunity to board an airplane first or things like that sometimes that another branch of our government seems to get noticed for. But I want you to know that we here appreciate what you do, and we are grateful for your sacrifice and for the sacrifice of your families. The risks, we know that the risks out there that you expose yourselves to as well, and they are not insignificant, particularly with many of these assignments.

So thank you for what you do. Thank you for being here.

For the information of members, the record will remain open until the close of business on Friday, March 27. This will include time for members to submit questions for the record. We would ask you to respond to these questions quickly. Your responses will be made part of the record as well.

Senator FLAKE. With the thanks to the committee, this hearing is now adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 3:12 p.m., the hearing was adjourned.]

ADDITIONAL MATERIAL SUBMITTED FOR THE RECORD

RESPONSES OF PAUL A. FOLMSBEE, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF MALI, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE FOLMSBEE'S REPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CORKER

Question. What further influence will the United States utilize through your offices or other means to compel greater compromise and collaboration in seeking sustainable peace, especially by the long-standing intransigent government and officials in the southern portion of the country? How will you work with the Government of Mali in addressing marginalization in the north?

Answer. The United States is engaged in robust diplomatic outreach to urge all parties in Mali to commit immediately to the March 1, 2015, peace agreement. We are working closely with the Government of Mali to support improved service delivery to northern Mali and are considering ways we could support a final peace agreement.

Right now, the United States is supporting a variety of efforts designed to promote peace and reconciliation in northern Mali, including translating, printing, and disseminating 30,000 copies of the peace agreement in local languages; empowering grassroots civil society peace campaigns through hundreds of local forums and discussions; promulgating radio and television programming and targeted SMS text messages reaching millions of Malians; and strengthening national-level institutions charged with resolving the crisis, such as through creating a communications cell in the Ministry of National Reconciliation and improving the capability of justice and civilian security institutions to provide vital services in the north.

Question. What are the positions of the United States, France, and neighboring states on the prospect of federalism or autonomy for northern Mali? How such reorganization affect U.S. policy in Mali?

Answer. The United States, together with France and other key international partners, strongly supports the June 2013 Ouagadougou Accord. This framework agreement, signed by both the Government of Mali and the northern armed groups, reinforces the international community's commitment to the territorial integrity of the Malian state.

Question. MINUSMA signals a shift in the context of United Nations peacekeeping operations in which peacekeepers are combating an extremist presence. Does the United States support U.N. peacekeeping as peace enforcement?

Answer. Today, two-thirds of U.N. peacekeepers are operating in active conflict areas, many with a chapter VII mandate of peace enforcement. The United States has supported that mandate for these missions. Some of these chapter VII mandated missions involve peace enforcement in situations involving extremists. MINUSMA does not necessarily represent a shift in the chapter VII operating environment.

MINUSMA's mandate, under chapter VII authority, to protect civilians and support the Malian authorities in stabilization efforts and to take steps to deter threats and prevent the return of armed elements, is one part of a broader strategy, including political engagement, to bring stability to northern Mali.

Question. How does the lack of an AFRICOM jurisdictional boundary in the Sahel region benefit U.S. Government efforts in dealing with the instability in Mali? What benefits would State Department realize if there was a unified region under one Regional Bureau? How does State Department work through the range of regional and bilateral programming applied to counter terrorism, transborder criminal trafficking and activity, build governance and economic capacity, train, equip, advise and assist security forces, and respond to humanitarian and human rights crises?

Answer. Through the Trans-Sahara Counter Terrorism Program (TSCTP), the United States is working to address transborder issues in Mali and the Sahel. TSCTP supports programs that strengthen the Government of Mali's operational and tactical abilities to combat terrorism and programs designed to ensure that Malians remain unreceptive to extremist messages.

Programs designed to strengthen Mali's counterterrorism capabilities include:

- ◆ Antiterrorism Assistance (ATA) training for law enforcement. This program provides police with training needed to protect facilities, individuals, and infrastructure from terrorist attacks and respond to major crises such as hostage takings.
- ◆ Establishment of a Legal Advisor from Department of Justice beginning in calendar year 2014.

Programs designed to counter violent extremism include:

- ◆ Installation of community radio stations in the most remote regions of northern Mali and support for radio programming;
- ◆ Support for small scale-community infrastructure such as school rehabilitation and well projects;
- ◆ Engagement with "medersas," which in Mali are Islamic versions of parochial schools that teach secular subjects and are very different from "madrasas" or Koranic schools;
- ◆ Publishing and distribution of 56,600 Arabic-language civics textbooks to medersas for the 2011–2012 school year;
- ◆ Cultural and educational exchange programs and the preservation of ancient Islamic manuscripts;
- ◆ Capacity-building for local government officials and institutions to support decentralization and democratic governance; and
- ◆ Skills training for youth, including a just launched USAID/Mali Out-of-School Youth Project (Projet d'Appui aux Jeunes Entrepreneurs) that provides out-of-school youth, ages 14–25, with low literacy skills nonformal basic education instruction, technical and work readiness training, as well as training in entrepreneurship and leadership.

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE FOLMSBEE'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR MENENDEZ

Question. What are the most important actions you have taken in your career to date to promote human rights and democracy? What is the impact of your actions? Why were your actions significant?

Answer. As the Senior Civilian Representative embedded with Regional Command East in Afghanistan from 2011 to 2012 and as Provincial Reconstruction Team Leader embedded with the 2/82 Airborne in Sadr City and Adhamiya, Baghdad, Iraq from 2007 to 2008, I am proud of the work I did to promote stability, strengthen democracy and protect human rights in two dangerous but vitally important places. If confirmed, I will draw on my experiences in Iraq and Afghanistan, among others, to emphasize the importance of protecting human rights and promoting justice as we work to support the national reconciliation process in Mali.

Question. What are the most pressing human rights issues in Mali? What are the most important steps you expect to take—if confirmed—to promote human rights and democracy in Mali? What do you hope to accomplish through these actions?

Answer. The 2013 inauguration of President Keita and the establishment of a new National Assembly through free and fair elections ended a 16-month transitional period following the 2012 military coup, armed rebellion, and terrorist occupation of the north. The restoration of a democratic government and the arrest of coup leader Amadou Sanogo restored some civilian control over the military. The 2013 international military intervention helped to eradicate terrorists and the resumption of peace talks with armed groups has decreased armed conflict.

However, problems exist in some areas. These include ineffective civilian control over security forces and impunity toward the military; acts of sexual violence, summary execution, torture, and use of child soldiers by armed groups; killing of civilians and military forces including peacekeepers by violent extremists; trafficking in persons and exploitative labor, including child labor; and judicial inefficiency, poor prison conditions, arbitrary arrest and detention, lengthy pretrial detention prolonged trial delays, and lack of access to justice in the North.

If confirmed, I will continue Embassy Bamako's extensive diplomatic outreach and programming in support of the peace process and a national reconciliation process that will provide justice and accountability.

Question. If confirmed, what are the potential obstacles to addressing the specific human rights issues you have identified in your previous response? What challenges will you face in Mali in advancing human rights and democracy in general?

Answer. The Government of Mali took strong initial steps to advance justice and fight impunity from prosecution, most notably with the imprisonment and ongoing investigation against coup leader Amadou Sanogo and 28 other individuals implicated in extrajudicial killings and forced disappearances committed in the aftermath of the coup d'état. Judge Yaya Karambe helped drive this fight against impunity as he worked under constant threat from Sanogo's supporters to gather evidence and arrest suspects, culminating in his uncovering a mass-grave with 21 missing Red Beret soldiers in December 2013.

These efforts are laudable, but I am concerned about the lack of progress in pursuing justice for victims of terrorism or human rights abuses that occurred during the occupation of northern Mali. Human rights abuses committed in northern Mali on all sides of the conflict have not been addressed and remain a sticking point in the reconciliation process. The capacity of the justice sector is significantly limited in the north, as judicial officials have been slow to return over continued fears of insecurity. Human rights organizations documented various abuses committed during and after the conflict, including northern armed groups which killed, raped, and abused soldiers and civilians during the 2012 invasion, and Malian Armed Forces which committed summary executions, torture, and forced disappearances upon retaking territory in early 2013.

Question. Are you committed to meeting with human rights and other nongovernmental organizations in the United States and with local human rights NGOs in Mali?

Answer. If confirmed, I look forward to working closely with nongovernmental organizations in both the United States and Mali to solidify Mali's democratic transition and promote human rights.

Question. If confirmed, please describe steps that you will take to enhance effective implementation of Section 620M of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, commonly known as the Leahy amendment, within the Embassy in Mali as well as steps you would take to accomplish the goal of the law, namely, helping the Government of Mali end impunity for human rights violations by security forces.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work to strengthen security sector institutions in Mali by promoting accountability and civilian control. Careful attention to the Leahy vetting process is critical in assuring that this assistance reaches only those individuals within Mali's security forces who are not implicated in abuses of human rights and can be credible advocates for reform and professionalization through participation in a meaningful national reconciliation process that emphasizes respect for human rights of all Malians.

Question. After days of protests in the north and a rejection of the recent peace proposal by Tuareg rebels, the Malian Government announced that it would no longer negotiate on the future of the north.

Answer. Failure of the parties to reach an agreement risks further violence and increased alienation by the northern populations. However, the agreement would be only a first step toward peace, security, and development in the polarized communities in the north. Without a peace agreement and follow-on action to resolve longstanding issues that divide Bamako and the north, violent extremists will continue to make northern Mali insecure. This insecurity has increased, with more frequent attacks against civilians, the United Nations Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in Mali (MINUSMA), and the French forces of Operation Barkhane.

Upon signing a peace agreement, the opportunity for the Government of Mali is to noticeably establish a real presence in the north with hospitals, paved roads, schools, and expanding economic development. The United States will do all it can to assist the government in that initiative.

Question. In your written testimony, you referenced the need to reform the Malian security sector. Mali is one of six partner countries for the administration's new Security Governance Initiative (SGI).

- ♦ What is the status of the development of SGI programming in Mali?
- ♦ What has been achieved through existing security sector assistance programs such as the Trans-Sahara Counterterrorism Partnership (TSCTP)?
- ♦ What lessons can be drawn from TSCTP to inform efforts under SGI?

Answer. An interagency Security Governance Initiative (SGI) team visited Mali in February to consult with Malian partners on potential areas for SGI engagement. Expert teams will reengage with Malian counterparts to develop joint country action plans and programs.

Trans-Sahara Counter Terrorism Program (TSCTP) activities in Mali remain very targeted to specific sectors and activities. We have small programs focused on law enforcement, justice sector, and corrections reform and Antiterrorism Assistance programming on crisis response and terrorist interdiction. In part this is due to the significant European Union program underway there that permits us to be more selective in our engagement. This year TSCTP supported the deployment of Law Enforcement and Resident Legal Advisors to assist in civilian security and justice sector reform. In addition, TSCTP supports several countering violent extremism (CVE) programs promoting peace building, reconciliation, and tolerance. Overall, the United States is focusing on broader security sector reform and political reconciliation before committing to the same kind of tactical training and equipping of counterterrorism units.

TSCTP's experience in Mali and elsewhere in the Sahel and Maghreb provides several important lessons which may benefit SGI efforts. Our experience in Mali highlighted the importance of addressing state weakness and focusing on institutional resilience as key parts of our overall engagement strategy. Before the fall of the Toure Government, TSCTP focused on tactical-level training for various Malian units and the underlying state weaknesses were not sufficiently addressed. Consequently, when the units were deployed without adequate leadership or logistical support, they quickly collapsed. By contrast, TSCTP has intensified its focus on building more sustainable capabilities in Chad, Mauritania, and Niger and invested in defense and civilian security institutions. Capacities in those countries remain nascent in many sectors, but we have seen benefits to the approach as they have responded to threats along multiple borders from Mali, Nigeria, and Libya.

Question. Mr. Folmsbee, you alluded to the north-south divide in Mali that has contributed to cycles of conflict. The integration of Tuareg citizens into the broader society has been an ongoing challenge, not only in Mali, but elsewhere in the Sahel.

- ♦ If confirmed as Ambassador, how do you plan to work with the Malian Government, civil society organizations, and other stakeholders to work toward this goal?

Answer. National reconciliation is a top U.S. policy priority in Mali. If confirmed, I plan to continue working to promote national reconciliation through partnerships with civil society and the Malian Government and by participating in the peace talks as needed. Additionally, with USAID programming, we will promote economic growth and the health sector to help tie the north to the rest of the country.

In direct support of the peace talks, our efforts will include translating, printing, and disseminating 30,000 peace process documents in local languages; empowering grassroots civil society peace campaigns through hundreds of local forums and discussions; promulgating radio and television programming and targeted SMS text messages reaching millions of Malians; and strengthening national-level institutions charged with resolving the crisis, such as through creating a communications cell in the Ministry of National Reconciliation.

TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR FLAKE

Question. What more, if anything, can be done to stimulate economic growth and alleviate poverty in Mali? What are the most significant U.S. commercial interests in Mali? What is the environment for U.S. businesses and investors, and how might it be improved?

Answer. Mali faces formidable challenges to economic development. Its economy is heavily dependent on agriculture, which makes up 45 percent of GDP and provides income for 75 percent of the country's population.

In order to promote long-lasting food security, the United States invests in the sustainable development of agriculture through the Feed the Future (FTF) initiative. Agriculture is a driver of economic growth, employment, better health, and nutrition, and remains a sector where Mali has an underexploited comparative advantage.

With an FY 2014 budget of $18 million, FTF works to develop and reinforce the private sector by targeting opportunities in the production, processing, and trade of selected commodities in key geographic areas. USAID/Mali also recently signed a nearly $14 million dollar Development Credit Authority (DCA) microcredit facility to support small and medium-size agricultural enterprises as well as female entrepreneurs.

Question. Would you advise an expansion of U.S. security assistance? Please describe how the Security Governance Initiative will be implemented in Mali.

Answer. Rebuilding Mali's security institutions in the wake of the 2012 coup is critical to Mali's capacity to control its porous borders and vast territory, counter terrorist influences and deny Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) the ability to use northern Mali as a safe haven. In our meetings with civil society, it is clear that better security service delivery and access to justice will be a critical component to any effort to bring stability to the country. Through the Security Governance Initiative and other complementary programs, we will support the development of these critical security institutions, systems and processes to increase accountability and improve security and justice through transparent and responsive governance.

Question. What is your assessment of security trends in the Sahel? How might U.S. counterterrorism efforts in Mali and the wider Sahel best be evaluated and prioritized?

Answer. The continued presence and activities of al-Qaeda affiliates, including Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM), other armed extremists and transnational criminal groups in northern Mali, threatens both Mali and the broader Sahel region. Ensuring that Malians continue to reject extremist messages is a key focus of U.S. counterterrorism programming in Mali. Our ability to counter extremist influences depends on a skillful balance of programs designed to consolidate Malian democracy, support economic growth, deepen mutual understanding, promote moderate messages, and assist the Malian Government and local leaders to deliver basic services and counter the root causes of extremism.

Question. Who is responsible for recent attacks against MINUSMA forces, and what factors are contributing to their increase? How might U.S. interagency coordination related to regional counterterrorism be improved?

Answer. Al-Morabitun and the Movement for the Oneness and Unity of the Jihad (MUJAO), both groups with ties to Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM), have claimed responsibility for attacks against U.N. peacekeepers in Mali. Other armed extremists and transnational criminal groups, coupled with slow progress on national reconciliation between the Government of Mali and northern groups, have produced an increasingly insecure environment for the U.N. mission.

We are working closely with the U.N. Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO), the GOM, troop and police contributing countries (TCCs/PCCs) and other international partners to support the mission to better operate in this insecure environment and implement its robust mandate.

U.S. Africa Command (AFRICOM) recently sponsored an asymmetric threat assessment team that traveled throughout the MINUSMA area of operations and is providing recommendations that may reduce peacekeeper vulnerability and contribute to IED threat mitigation. We are providing mine-protected combat vehicles for MINUSMA contingents and training peacekeepers how to use them, and exploring ways to support more C-IED training for troop contributing countries (TCCs).

In close partnership with MINUSMA's U.N. Police (UNPOL) and the EU Police capacity-building mission (EUCAP), we have also conducted IED awareness seminars for the Malian National Police who work in northern Mali. Additionally, the ACOTA Program has provided Counter-IED training to TCCs trained and deploying to MINUSMA (Benin, Burkina Faso, Ghana, Niger, and Togo). During the 7-10 week battalion training, Counter-IED tasks relevant to an infantry battalion are integrated into command and staff, soldiers' skills and collective unit training.

Question. Mali's current peace process has gotten bogged down. What more can the United States do to encourage a peaceful political resolution? If another deal is struck, what will you do differently than your predecessors to ensure that this next one, unlike the previous four peace deals, will stick?

Answer. We are working, with our international partners, to encourage all parties to sign the Algiers agreement as soon as possible. We are also considering how the United States could most effectively support the implementation of this agreement by leveraging our diplomatic and development assistance resources.

Question. Do we have the mix of civilian and military tools right in Mali? How will you, as chief of mission, ensure that U.S. civilian capabilities are not overshadowed by our military?

Answer. We continue to emphasize that the only way to create a lasting peace in Mali is through a durable political agreement between the Government of Mali and the northern armed groups. Embassy Bamako's diplomatic outreach in support of the peace process is a whole-of-government effort that emphasizes the importance of solidifying Mali's democratic transition and strengthening security sector institutions. We are beginning to implement robust civilian security engagement with the police and justice sector to improve these critical elements of a stable democracy.

RESPONSES OF MARY CATHERINE PHEE, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF SOUTH SUDAN, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE PHEE'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CORKER

Question. Does the United States agree with the 2014 African Union report that neither antagonist Riek Machar or Salva Kiir should serve in South Sudan's transitional government?

Answer. The report referred to is a leaked document which the African Union disavowed in an official statement on March 16. Our view is that the two leaders need to make compromises to reach a peace agreement and form a transitional government that can accomplish essential transitional tasks such as holding elections for a permanent government and establishing a hybrid judicial body to promote accountability and justice.

Question. How will U.S. influence on South Sudan's warring parties be affected by the expansion of the IGAD peace talks beyond IGAD member states?

Answer. "IGAD Plus," as proposed by IGAD Chairman, Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalgn, envisions additional leverage on the warring parties through enhanced international participation and cooperation, bolstering the negotiation efforts of the current IGAD leadership. This includes participation by the African Union, which has selected five African heads of state for this purpose, the Troika (United States, United Kingdom, and Norway), the U.N., the EU, and China.

A reformed and reinvigorated "IGAD Plus" process would unite a number of stakeholders and members of the international community behind a common peace plan and gives international partners, including the United States, a larger role in shaping process and substance. The United States will continue to look for further opportunities to enhance the IGAD mediation process and will lead international efforts to bring additional pressure upon the parties to shift their concern toward the people of South Sudan, instead of their narrow political interests.

Question. How do you assess the relationship between UNMISS peacekeepers and humanitarian organizations in fulfilling the protection of civilians mandate?

Answer. UNMISS is mandated to protect civilians with support from its 11,669-person strong military force. This U.N. mission has four priorities: protection of civilians, monitoring and investigating human rights, creating the conditions for the delivery of humanitarian assistance, and supporting the implementation of the Cessation of Hostilities agreement.

UNMISS has established seven protection of civilian sites for internally displaced persons and is protecting nearly 113,000 IDPs in these sites. In tandem with humanitarian organizations, UNMISS is providing assistance to civilians at these sites as well as to those displaced elsewhere in the country. The partnership between UNMISS and the humanitarian organizations is vital and robust and we continue to encourage both sides to cooperate with these efforts.

Recent troop deployments from Kenya, China, and Ghana will enable UNMISS to conduct its protection tasks more effectively, including patrols and proactive community engagement. Inadequate infrastructure, difficult weather conditions, and access challenges posed by the parties in conflict hinder UNMISS' ability to fully execute its mandate.

Question. How will you ensure the United States does not enter into an agreement that perpetuates the failures of the 2005 CPA that left unresolved significant interethnic rivalries and challenges?

Answer. Recalling the scale and devastation of the Sudanese civil wars, which exacted tremendous human cost over two decades, the CPA was a critically important accomplishment that ended the fighting. Unfortunately, the parties to the CPA did not implement many of the important provisions designed to build institutions that would facilitate development and good governance throughout Sudan and what is now South Sudan. If confirmed, I will work to encourage both parties to end the current conflict in South Sudan and establish a transitional government that begins to address these longstanding challenges. The primary criticism of the CPA is that the official parties lacked diversity and inclusivity. I will seek to engage all stakeholders and encourage their participation in developing broad-based institutions and sustainable development.

TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR MENENDEZ

Question. What are the most important actions you have taken in your career to date to promote human rights and democracy? What is the impact of your actions? Why were your actions significant?

Answer. I have had the opportunity to directly advance human rights and democracy in nearly every assignment in my career and expect deep engagement in such efforts in South Sudan, if confirmed.

As a political reporting officer in Cairo, Egypt, from 1997–2000, I undertook path-breaking reporting on the government's treatment of the Coptic Christian community and relations between Copts and Muslims. I convinced USAID to transfer democracy and governance funds to the State Department and with those funds administered a small grants program that provided assistance to human rights advocates; significantly, these grants were not subject to prior approval from the Government of Egypt.

Examples of the program's beneficiaries include activists working to combat female genital mutilation and those providing legal assistance to Egyptians who had been tortured. We also used these funds to support the travel of Egyptian activists to the United States to learn about American civil society and judicial processes. Several of the program's beneficiaries were active in the 2011 Arab Spring.

While administering an occupied province of southern Iraq in 2003–2004, I arranged for the establishment of a provincial council and municipal councils with reserved seats for women and religious minorities who were elected in caucuses from their communities. In explaining the purpose of reserved seats and the function of caucuses, I was able to educate local leaders who had no prior experience with inclusive participatory governance systems and to mobilize previously oppressed communities.

Most recently, as deputy chief of mission in Addis Ababa from 2011–2014, I arranged U.S. Government financial support for journalists fleeing the country who feared persecution, as well as for victims of Wikileaks. I chaired the mission's inter-agency working group on democracy and governance, and pioneered an innovative effort to create a dialogue between prominent American academics and senior Ethiopian party leaders about one party states in agrarian-based economies in East Asia (countries whose economic transformation Ethiopia seeks to emulate) which had chosen to liberalize politically in order to illustrate that democratization can bring stability and economic progress.

Question. What are the most pressing human rights issues in South Sudan? What are the most important steps you expect to take—if confirmed—to promote human rights and democracy in South Sudan? What do you hope to accomplish through these actions?

Answer. The most pressing human rights issues are ending the war, promoting accountability and addressing the needs of those displaced by the conflict. If confirmed I intend to support efforts to hold accountable those who have committed human rights violations, abuses, and other atrocities in this conflict. We have pledged to work with the South Sudanese, the AU, regional partners, and the U.N. to promote accountability for abuses committed in this conflict.

I will also support efforts to combat gender-based violence and the recruitment of child soldiers. I will promote the expansion of civic space for alternative voices and the role of a free press. I will reach out to local government officials, professional associations, civil society organizations, youth, women, and traditional leaders to promote human rights, democracy and the rule of law.

Question. If confirmed, what are the potential obstacles to addressing the specific human rights issues you have identified in your previous response? What challenges will you face in South Sudan in advancing human rights and democracy in general?

Answer. In South Sudan there is a history of impunity for human rights abuses and violations. South Sudan also lacks strong institutions capable of enforcing the rule of law. Building local capacity and facilitating reconciliation among the people of South Sudan is a long-term challenge and will require the consistent support of the friends of the South Sudanese.

Question. Are you committed to meeting with human rights and other nongovernmental organizations in the United States and with local human rights NGOs in South Sudan?

Answer. If confirmed, I look forward to working with human rights groups and other nongovernmental organizations, both local and international. I will reinforce current U.S. engagement with civil society and other South Sudanese and international partners to promote human rights.

Question. If confirmed, please describe steps that you will take to enhance effective implementation of Section 620 M of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, commonly known as the Leahy amendment, within the Embassy in South Sudan as well as steps you would take to accomplish the goal of the law, namely, helping the Government of South Sudan end impunity for human rights violations by security forces.

Answer. All U.S. Government assistance to the defense sector was suspended shortly after the outbreak of the current conflict. We remain concerned about the conduct of both the Government of South Sudan and opposition forces.

The United States has urged the African Union Peace and Security Council to immediately release the report of the African Union's Commission of Inquiry, which was charged with developing findings regarding violations of international human rights and international humanitarian law committed during the armed conflict, and formulating recommendations on the best ways and means to ensure accountability, reconciliation, and healing. We are prepared to support mechanisms that advance these goals. When the parties achieve a lasting peace and we review the possibility of providing assistance for security sector reform, I will work to ensure that all relevant U.S. Government agencies and offices are working together and actively sharing information to ensure the Leahy law is being fully implemented.

Question. The Special Envoy for Sudan and South Sudan has the lead role in directly engaging with the Intergovernmental Authority on Development and parties to the conflict in South Sudan as part of ongoing peace negotiations.

- ♦ a. What is your role if any, in the peace process? In what ways will you work to bring an end to the civil war?
- ♦ b. In the event that the latest round of talks—reported to be scheduled for some time in April—do not result in an agreement, what next steps will the United States take to bring about an end to the conflict?
- ♦ c. How much information do ordinary citizens have about the peace process, and how are their interests being represented in negotiations?

Answer. a. If confirmed, I, in coordination with the President's Special Envoy for Sudan and South Sudan, Ambassador Donald Booth, will steadfastly engage both parties on the need to make compromises and to come to a political agreement. I will also directly engage the people of South Sudan to promote peace and provide humanitarian assistance without regard to ethnic or political affiliation.

b. The Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) is now moving ahead to prepare for a peace summit in the coming weeks, and has the critical task of engaging stakeholders and members of the international community to get behind a common peace plan. Ultimately, however, the decision to end this needless conflict lies with the warring parties. The United States will continue to look for further opportunities to enhance the mediation process and will lead international efforts to bring additional pressure upon the parties. We are in discussions with our partners in the region and the international community on how best to support upcoming talks, to increase pressure on the parties, and to widen international consensus to support the peace process if these talks fail.

c. Given the high rate of illiteracy, and minimal internet penetration and newspaper circulation in South Sudan, radio broadcast is the most effective means to disseminate information. And more of this is needed. We are working with implementing partners to expand accurate live broadcast radio coverage of the mediation and to distribute peace messaging through local partners. We have pressed IGAD to include a broad range of opposition political parties, civil society, religious leaders, women, and youth and have provided direct support to civil society participants in the process so they can advocate for the South Sudanese people.

Question. On March 24, Parliament voted to extend by 3 years President Kiir's term in office. Originally set to end on July 9, 2015, his mandate now expires in 2018.

- ◆ What was the reasoning behind the extension of President Salva Kiir's mandate, and what are the repercussions on the peace process?
- ◆ Could it affect former Vice President Riek Machar's willingness to negotiate? How transparent was the process through which the vote was debated and taken? What effects might the extension of President Kiir's mandate have on the development of democracy in South Sudan?

Answer. The Government of the Republic of South Sudan has justified the extension of its tenure to 2018 to allow more time to achieve a peaceful settlement. However, this step by the legislature sends a negative signal about the government's commitment to a transitional government and for the development of democracy in South Sudan. This action has created another political grievance for the opposition. We have been clear that the way to extend legitimacy without elections is through a negotiated peace agreement in South Sudan and the establishment of a transitional government.

Question. Administration officials, including Ambassador Booth in his testimony before the House Foreign Affairs Committee on February 26, 2014, have stated that things must not "return to business as usual" which seemed to imply that a political solution among elites at the expense of justice and accountability for crimes committed is unacceptable.

- ◆ Are there currently discussions in South Sudan about the need for accountability for violations of human rights committed during the course of the conflict?
- ◆ What grassroots efforts are underway to promote justice, accountability and reconciliation? Is the United States supporting such efforts?

Answer. Discussions about the need for accountability have taken place among those in the Government of the Republic of South Sudan, opposition forces, Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) mediators, and civil society groups. The U.S. Government has facilitated these discussions through its support for a multistakeholder peace process. The parties to the conflict have agreed on general provisions for a legal mechanism to prosecute those responsible for gross human rights abuses and violations, as well as a commission for truth, reconciliation, and healing, but no steps have been taken to put these into place absent a peace agreement. Justice and accountability are critical elements of a lasting peace.

The United States is encouraging grassroots efforts by South Sudanese groups and individuals to promote justice, accountability, and reconciliation. For example, the Department of State is in the process of funding an in-country South Sudanese civil society-led project to investigate and document human rights abuses and violations.

Question. There are reports that the Government of South Sudan is imposing burdensome bureaucratic obstacles such as arbitrary taxation, expulsion of staff, and a delay in issuing permits, that are making it difficult for nongovernmental organizations to provide humanitarian assistance. The United States has provided nearly a billion dollars in humanitarian assistance this fiscal year, and thus a strong interest in ensuring that the operating environment is conducive to efficient provision of assistance.

- ◆ Are you aware of the reports of bureaucratic obstacles imposed on organizations trying to carry out lifesaving humanitarian operations in South Sudan? What will be your role in helping to ensure they are able to carry out their work without being harassed or otherwise impeded by government?

Answer. I am aware of such concerning reports, including threats of expulsion of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), harassment, abduction, detention, and expulsion of NGO workers, delays in visas and work permits, denial of tax exemptions, import delays, and bureaucratic delays in moving cargo by road, river, and air.

If confirmed, I will engage all parties to press for immediate and unconditional access for humanitarian workers so they can deliver humanitarian assistance to all South Sudanese people in need. I will also work with other donor governments and organizations and the U.N. to help minimize the obstructions to humanitarian aid.

TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR FLAKE

Question. Does the administration view South Sudan's oil revenues as contributing to the current conflict, and, if so, are sanctions against the oil sector being considered?

Answer. We believe that the government revenues are largely being directed to security spending which makes the search for peace all the more urgent. At the same time, several factors have significantly decreased oil revenues for the government, which receives the majority of its income from oil. The conflict has caused a disruption in total oil production, which dropped from 220,000 barrels per day (bbl/d) in November 2013 to 150,000 bbl/d on average in 2014. The drop in the global price of oil has further reduced South Sudan's oil income. Production will only be restored to preconflict levels when the parties cease fighting and provide the security needed for critical repair and maintenance of oil infrastructure in South Sudan. We are not at this time considering sanctions against the oil sector.

Question. What is the extent of the Ugandan military deployment in South Sudan? Are Ugandan forces playing an active role in the fighting? How does the Obama administration view Uganda's role in the conflict?

Answer. At the request of President Salva Kiir, two brigades of Ugandan troops were deployed in December 2013 during the initial days of the conflict to protect key infrastructure and the city of Juba against opposition forces. Ugandan forces remain in South Sudan at the invitation of the government.

The Agreement on the Cessation of Hostilities that was brokered by Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) mediators in January 2014, and signed by both the Government of South Sudan and the opposition, calls for the withdrawal of foreign forces from South Sudan. The parties have subsequently rededicated themselves to the Agreement and we continue to press for its immediate implementation.

We remain continuously engaged with the Government of Uganda to promote a common strategy for pressing the parties to stop the fighting and find a negotiated rather than a military solution to the conflict.

Question. Given the role you will play in the peace process, how do you plan to maintain legitimacy with both sides involved in the conflict?

Answer. The United States, in coordination with IGAD and our Troika partners Norway and the United Kingdom, has maintained the firm position that both parties are responsible for this conflict and the failure to reach peace. If confirmed, I, in coordination with the President's Special Envoy for Sudan and South Sudan Ambassador Donald Booth, will steadfastly engage both parties on the need to make compromises and to come to a political agreement. I would also directly engage the people of South Sudan to promote peace and provide humanitarian assistance without regard to ethnic or political affiliation.

Question. In your testimony you note that the U.N. Security Council's March 3 resolution "established a targeted sanctions regime and proposed an arms embargo that could be imposed should the South Sudanese leaders fail to respond to the mediation."

- ◆ Do you think the threat of sanctions will be seen as credible by the parties and encourage them to reach a compromise?
- ◆ Are we able to identify significantly influential individuals for sanctions in both camps?
- ◆ What impact do you anticipate the arms embargo would have? How would it the power balance in the conflict?

Answer. The March 3rd U.N. Security Council's sanctions resolution allows for the imposition of asset freezes and travel bans on those who hinder the South Sudanese peace process or commit human rights violations. The resolution established a Sanctions Committee—which consists of all members of the Security Council—to review information regarding individuals and entities and designate them for sanctions. A U.N. Panel of Experts will be formed, which will help the committee gather and review information about those who may meet the sanctions designation criteria. Based on the findings of the Panel of Experts and our own findings, we will propose relevant individuals for consideration by the Sanctions Committee.

The resolution's credible threat of sanctions increases pressure on the parties to resolve the outstanding issues and begin a process that establishes the Transitional Government of National Unity. This incremental approach hones the efficacy of measures imposed and ensures continued buy-in and support from IGAD regional leaders.

Under this resolution, the Council has also committed to periodically review the situation in South Sudan and, as deemed necessary, consider additional measures, including an arms embargo. The U.S. Government believes that actions based on this resolution should be calibrated to maximize the Council's leverage to facilitate an end to the horrific violence and promote the beginning of a sustainable settlement. We believe that an arms embargo could pressure both parties to negotiate earnestly.

Question. How would you assess the capacity of U.N. peacekeepers in South Sudan to protect civilians? Do UNMISS forces currently have the capacity to go out on patrols and engage armed actors, if civilians are under imminent threat?

Answer. UNMISS is mandated to protect civilians with support from its 11,669-person strong military force. This U.N. mission has four priorities: protection of civilians, monitoring and investigating human rights, creating the conditions for the delivery of humanitarian assistance, and supporting the implementation of the Cessation of Hostilities agreement.

UNMISS has created seven protection of civilian sites for internally displaced persons and is protecting nearly 113,000 IDPs in these sites. The mission works very closely with the humanitarian community that provides assistance to the IDPs in these sites. Recent troop deployments from Kenya, China, and Ghana will enable UNMISS to conduct its protection tasks more effectively, including patrols and proactive community engagement. Inadequate infrastructure, difficult weather conditions, and access challenges posed by the armed conflict hinder UNMISS' ability to fully execute its mandate.

Question. What additional leverage would an "IGAD Plus" bring to bear?

Answer. "IGAD Plus," as proposed by IGAD Chairman, Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn, envisions additional leverage on the warring parties through enhanced international participation and cooperation, bolstering the negotiation efforts of the current IGAD leadership. This includes participation by the African Union, which has selected five African heads of state for this purpose, the Troika (United States, United Kingdom, and Norway), the U.N., the EU, and China.

IGAD leadership has worked tirelessly to broker a comprehensive peace agreement. While the two sides have moved closer to a deal in recent months, neither has agreed to peace. A reformed and reinvigorated "IGAD Plus" process would unite a number of stakeholders and members of the international community behind a common peace plan and give international partners a larger role in shaping process and substance. Ultimately, however, the decision to end this needless conflict and to begin the process of reform and rebuilding of South Sudan lies with the warring parties. The United States will continue to look for further opportunities to enhance the mediation process and will lead international efforts to bring additional pressure upon the parties to shift their concern toward the people of South Sudan, instead of their narrow political interests.

RESPONSES OF CASSANDRA Q. BUTTS, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE COMMONWEALTH OF THE BAHAMAS, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE BUTT'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR MENENDEZ

Question. What are the most important actions you have taken in your career to date to promote human rights and democracy? What is the impact of your actions? Why were your actions significant?

Answer. At every stage of my adult life I am proud to have worked to advance the cause of human rights at home and abroad. As a college student, I was one of the organizers of an advocacy campaign to end the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill's investments in corporations that did business in apartheid South Africa. Our campaign was successful, and the effort foreshadowed a path to the end of the apartheid regime in South Africa and the direction of my professional life.

My first job following law school was a fellowship with the Georgetown Women's Law and Public Policy Program, where I worked as a lawyer to advance access to quality health care for the poorest communities at the National Health Law Program. My focus included addressing the particular challenges facing impoverished women of color, including the incarcerated. Our work advanced efforts to expand treatment for women of color with HIV/AIDS and to eliminate the practice of shackling incarcerated women while giving birth.

As a lawyer on Capitol Hill, I worked on civil rights issues and issues related to migration, asylum, and refugees. In the latter category, I traveled the world to view conditions for migrants, asylum seekers, and refugees in conflict and post-conflict zones working with the Department of State, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and a range of international NGOs to find durable solutions for some of the most vulnerable populations in the world. Through that work, we were able to provide critical oversight and increase the number of individuals accepted into the U.S. refugee resettlement program.

My work at Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC) over the past 4 years has focused on advancing the values of democracy and human rights. As the chairperson of MCC's Investment Management Committee, I have overseen and approved investments of over $8 billion with partner countries that must prove a measured commitment to policy performance in the area of democratic governance and human rights. In my role, I have traveled to partner countries to the importance democratic governance and human rights to the work of poverty reduction through economic growth. In addition, my work at MCC has focused on advancing the agency's work on gender equality, ensuring that women and men are equal beneficiaries of our program is an international model for how to best integrate gender equality in development assistance.

Finally, as a lawyer at the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, the Nation's premier civil rights legal advocacy organization, I litigated civil rights cases on issues of voting rights and education. In addition, I advocated on Capitol Hill and within the executive branch for the expansion of a range of basic human rights for women and minority communities.

Question. What are the most pressing human rights issues in the Bahamas? What are the most important steps you expect to take—if confirmed—to promote human rights and democracy in the Bahamas? What do you hope to accomplish through these actions?

Answer. The Bahamas has a strong tradition of protecting human rights. Bahamians enjoy freedoms of speech and religion, and Bahamian media is able to present the various sides of issues and frequently takes editorial positions critical of the government.

The most pressing human rights concerns in the Bahamas center around the country's correctional and immigration detention facilities. Both are outdated, overcrowded, and do not meet the growing needs of the country. Local human rights organizations report of migration raids that ignore the rights of those they detain. The United States has provided training and technical assistance over the last 2 years under the Caribbean Basin Security Initiative (CBSI), which has improved conditions at the Bahamas Department of Correction's (BDOC) and enhanced BDOC's capacity to operate a sanitary, safe, and secure correctional facility in conformity with international standards.

If confirmed, I will urge the government to take the steps necessary to improve conditions of detention and detention practices, both in terms of addressing immediate problems and in looking more systematically at modernizing and improving conditions over the medium to long term. I will also continue to apply U.S. assistance in these efforts where appropriate with the goal of bringing Bahamian facilities and procedures into full conformity with international human rights standards, practices, and procedures.

Statelessness remains an issue, particularly in the case of second generation Haitian children born in the Bahamas who have access to neither Haitian nor Bahamian citizenship at birth. I commend the Bahamian Government for proposing a constitutional amendment allowing for Bahamian citizen women married to non-Bahamian husbands to pass on their Bahamian nationality to their children. Statelessness is also a concern for migrant children born in the Bahamas who, according to the constitution, have the right to apply for Bahamian citizenship at age 18. The process to acquire citizenship is cumbersome and complex, and if confirmed, I will urge the government to both simplify the process and pass the constitutional amendment on gender equality before the end of 2015.

Question. If confirmed, what are the potential obstacles to addressing the specific human rights issues you have identified in your previous response? What challenges will you face in the Bahamas in advancing human rights and democracy in general?

Answer. Although considered a “high income” country by the World Bank, the Bahamas faces significant resource constraints which make building new detention centers or expanding existing facilities challenging. In addition to resource problems, the country also faces significant challenges in its judicial system. Despite some recent improvements, criminal cases can be prolonged, and a lengthy appeals process often adds additional time after a trial before a case is finalized.

Societal and structural issues present the largest challenges to advancing human rights and democracy in general. The Bahamian Constitution protects against discrimination due to race, but societal prejudices exist, especially with regard to the Haitian immigrant community. The Bahamian Constitution and law currently do not prohibit discrimination based on gender, sexual orientation, or gender identity, and certain gender inequalities exist with regard to citizenship. The Christie administration has introduced constitutional amendments that would largely correct these deficiencies, but the process has stalled. If confirmed, I will continue to advocate for improvements to the justice sector and promote nondiscrimination and nonviolence toward vulnerable groups.

Question. Are you committed to meeting with human rights and other nongovernmental organizations in the United States and with local human rights NGOs in the Bahamas?

Answer. If confirmed, I will maintain a regular dialogue on human rights with all stakeholders, including human rights and other NGOs in the United States and local human rights NGOs in the Bahamas. In addition, if confirmed, I will engage in a frank dialogue with Bahamian officials on human rights issues, which will include bringing specific concerns to the attention of the government when it is appropriate to do so.

Question. If confirmed, please describe steps that you will take to enhance effective implementation of Section 620M of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, commonly known as the Leahy amendment, within the Embassy in the Bahamas as well as steps you would take to accomplish the goal of the law, namely, helping the Government of the Bahamas end impunity for human rights violations by security forces.

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue Embassy Nassau’s current practice of ensuring that all Bahamian candidates for U.S. assistance are fully vetted in conformity with State Department and Defense Department procedures before any assistance is provided. I will ensure that the Embassy is diligent in denying assistance to Bahamian security force units when we have credible information that such units have committed gross violations of human rights. I will also press the Bahamian Government to establish an appropriate and transparent process to investigate allegations that government officials have engaged in human rights violations and to hold accountable those found to have done so.

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE BUTTS’S RESPONSES TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR FLAKE

Question. What do you see as the most significant challenges in relations with the Bahamas? What would be your priorities if confirmed as Ambassador?

Answer. The United States and the Bahamas enjoy a long-standing cooperative relationship and security partnership. As one of our closest neighbors, our shared interests include improving citizen security and promoting shared prosperity through trade.

If confirmed, I hope to continue working with the government of the Bahamas on efforts to strengthen citizen security, promote social and economic development, including advancing U.S. trade and investment interests, and reduce crime, including illicit trafficking and other transnational crime. If confirmed, I will encourage the Bahamas to take a more systemic approach to address the worsening crime situation. I hope to support efforts by the Bahamas to improve the education system and look at opportunities for workforce development. Other key priorities will be economic development and growth, including the attendant energy and environmental issues. Finally, I will ensure that the entire U.S. mission in the Bahamas—Bahamians and Americans—understands that their contributions are valued and that they are appreciated.

Question. The Bahamian economy was hard hit by the global financial crisis and has only registered meager economic growth rates over the past 3 years. What is the outlook for the Bahamian economy over the next few years? Is there any prospect that the Bahamas will diversify its economy beyond tourism and financial services?

Answer. The Bahamas economy is projected to see real growth rise steadily to 2.8 percent by 2016 based on IMF forecasts. The government anticipates additional revenue from the new value-added tax that became effective on January 1, 2015, and the licensing and regulation of local gaming operations later in 2015. The Bahamas also expects economic boost from continued economic improvement in the United States, which is the Bahamas' largest trading partner and source of tourism dollars.

The Bahamian Government faces significant challenges in diversifying its economy beyond tourism and financial services in the near future. New investments in the light manufacturing and technology sectors are hindered by high energy prices and limited availability of skilled labor. The government continues to promote investment in nontraditional sectors outside of tourism and financial services, and is also making efforts to promote the agriculture sector in an effort to mitigate the high cost of importing food. The government also has announced plans to offer new products within the financial services sector, such as the development of an international arbitration center and an offshore clearing and settlement center for international currencies, in the hopes of attracting greater trade and investment to the country.

Question. U.S.-Bahamian cooperation on drug interdiction has been strong. Are there any further actions that the Bahamian Government can undertake to improve its antidrug efforts?

Answer. The United States and the Bahamas enjoy a long-standing history of counternarcotics cooperation, most notably under the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) led Operation Bahamas, Turks and Caicos (OPBAT). Under OPBAT, DEA Special Agents coordinate, in an integrated manner, with the Royal Bahamas Police Force (RBPF) and the Royal Bahamas Defense Force (RBDF) to gather intelligence, conduct investigations, and execute interdictions. OPBAT seizure operations increased substantially between FY 2012 and FY 2014. We believe this is due, in part, to increased U.S. support, cooperation, and equipment.

The Bahamian Government could impose stricter penalties on individuals convicted of serious drug offenses. In addition, the Bahamas continues to be challenged by delays in trials and in responding to U.S. extradition requests. Improved procedures to expedite extraditions would bring drug crime offenders more quickly to trial and serve as a more credible deterrent for traffickers. The Bahamas National Anti-Drug Strategy places significant emphasis on drug abuse, awareness, demand reduction, and treatment policies, but programs in these fields would benefit from additional resources. In addition, health care professionals report that women and residents of the Family Islands (i.e., islands other than New Providence) are underrepresented in substance abuse prevention and treatment programs.

RESPONSES OF KATHERINE S. DHANANI, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF SOMALIA, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE DHANANI'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CORKER

Question. What considerations, apart from the holding of elections, were taken into account when recognizing Somalia as a sovereign state in 2012? What additional considerations have been identified as crucial in moving to the nomination of an ambassador?

Answer. U.S. recognition of the Federal Government of Somalia (FGS) on January 17, 2013, was the first step toward normalizing the U.S.-Somalia bilateral relationship. The decision was in large part due to the relatively credible political transition after more than a decade of transitional governments. The provisional constitution and Parliament forged from the 2012 transition were the first steps toward rebuilding a sovereign Somali state. Recognizing the FGS signaled U.S. commitment to sustained diplomatic engagement with Somalia.

The Department's decision to seek a Presidential Appointment of an ambassador was in recognition of the growing interagency engagement toward Somalia. Between FY 2006 and FY 2014, State and USAID provided nearly $3.1 billion in development, security, education, and humanitarian assistance. The level of U.S. assistance underscored the need to coordinate our Somalia engagement under an ambassador, to ensure that our relationship with the FGS best reflects our broad range of national security and foreign policy interests.

Question. What specific parameters, including political reconciliation and security concerns, will be required by the United States to warrant a move of the Office of Somali Affairs/U.S. Embassy for Somalia in Nairobi, from its current location to Mogadishu? What is the best estimate or U.S. expectation of a move of our mission to Somalia? Would it be to Mogadishu in every instance or is there an intermediate location elsewhere?

Answer. The Department of State does not have permanent diplomatic presence in Somalia due to continued instability and the high-threat environment in Mogadishu. After the December 25, 2014, al-Shabaab attack on the Mogadishu International Airport (MIA) compound, the Department is assessing what security upgrades need to be made to bolster MIA perimeter security and the internal compound utilized by U.S. diplomats. As security conditions permit, we look forward to broadening and deepening our engagement, and to reestablishing a permanent diplomatic presence in Mogadishu. As I mentioned in my testimony, there is no fixed timeline for the establishment of a permanent diplomatic presence in Mogadishu, but if confirmed, I will carefully monitor the security environment in Somalia and make the recommendation for a more enduring U.S. presence in Mogadishu, when the environment permits.

Question. How do the positions of U.S. Special Representative for Somalia and Ambassador to Somalia differ, if at all? Will the role of a U.S. Special Representative be necessary upon the confirmation of an ambassador, and if so, what role will the SE play?

Answer. The U.S. Special Representative for Somalia (SRS) is a secretarial appointee who manages the Department's relationship with the Federal Government of Somalia. The SRS, resident in Nairobi, also engages regional governments on Somalia—Burundi, Djibouti, Ethiopia, Kenya, and Uganda—given their national security interests in Somalia as troop contributing countries. The SRS does not have authority to direct and coordinate the actions of U.S. executive branch agencies in Somalia. As chief of mission, unless otherwise directed by the President, the U.S. Ambassador to Somalia will have full responsibility and authority for the direction, coordination, and supervision of all U.S. Government executive branch activities, operations, and employees in Somalia. The role of SRS will no longer be needed as the U.S. Ambassador to Somalia will maintain the regional coordination role given the level of international engagement in Somalia.

Question. Yemen may prove a cautionary tale. In view of the unsuccessful efforts of significant U.S. military assistance and operational emphasis in Yemen to withstand political and militant unrest and in view of the ensuing instability, how will U.S. policy integration and coherence across USG agencies address current parallel efforts similar to those that existed in Yemen? What specific mechanism exists to harmonize U.S. policy governmentwide in moving Somalia toward sustainable governance and greater stability than it has had in decades? How will the U.S. role in partner efforts to help reestablish a viable government for Somalia change with an ambassador?

Answer. U.S. policy in Somalia directly links security sector reform to political progress. Our Somalia strategy, previously shared with Congress, includes ways in which political development and security progress must move in tandem. U.S. policy is harmonized governmentwide through the White House directed interagency policy coordination process, and with our international partners via the New Deal Somali Compact.

The United States and international partners support a regional force, the African Union Mission to Somalia (AMISOM), that enjoys broad international and regional support. AMISOM is composed of African troop contributors that have a strategic interest in stabilizing Somalia and as a result have initiated a number of military operations designed to pressure and erode al-Shabaab. AMISOM also has provided critical time and political space so the Somali political process can gain strength and the Federal Government of Somalia can begin to build a representative, apolitical, human rights respecting, professionally trained force under civilian oversight.

In Yemen, there was no international or regional force like AMISOM that provided Yemen's leaders the time and space to find a peaceful solution to Yemen's political crisis, while at the same time maintaining security and putting pressure on al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula.

Question. What is the status of Somaliland and Puntland as it relates to U.S. policy? How do you expect the status to change, if at all, in the near to mid-term? What are your priorities for working with Somaliland and how will this translate into engaging Somalia?

Answer. The United States recognizes a single Somalia, which includes Somaliland and Puntland. We are encouraged by the progress made in the integration of Puntland into the federal state formation process. While progress has stalled in regards to the formal, Turkey-sponsored talks between Somaliland authorities and the Federal Government of Somalia (FGS), we continue to encourage dialogue between both parties.

The United States regularly engages with all levels of the Somali Government, including the FGS, the newly established interim regional administrations, and the authorities in Puntland and Somaliland. If confirmed, my priorities at the regional level will be to promote security, good governance, and economic development, as well as to advance the state formation process.

Question. The implementation of Vision 2016 is behind schedule. How will you apply pressure on the Somalia Government to complete the plan?

Answer. While implementation of Vision 2016 is behind schedule, the Federal Government of Somalia (FGS) has made significant and important progress, especially in regards to advancing the state formation process. That said, time is short and the FGS has itself acknowledged that Vision 2016 is behind schedule.

If confirmed, I will engage extensively with the President, Prime Minister, parliamentarians, and the regional governments, in close collaboration with our international partners, to push for a renewed focus on accelerating implementation of the Vision 2016 reform agenda. It is of paramount importance that the FGS move swiftly this year to lay the foundations for credible, democratic, and inclusive national elections in 2016, as well as for a constitutional referendum as envisioned by Vision 2016. The United States will maintain close engagement with the international community to ensure we have a coordinated approach to support the Somalis as they work towards 2016.

Question. How will East Africa region's instability and the drawdown of Embassy personnel in Nairobi, Kenya, affect the movement and accessibility of the U.S. Ambassador to Somalia to travel and conduct business with the Government of Somalia, its citizenry and U.S. programming in Somalia while operating from Nairobi?

Answer. The Somalia Unit, comprised of 21 personnel, was deemed to be of such strategic importance it was not reduced in size during the July 2014 drawdown of Embassy personnel in Nairobi, Kenya. The drawdown did not reduce staffing or programming operations of the Somalia Unit. If I am confirmed, the Department will transition the Somalia Unit to U.S. Mission Somalia and is in the process of determining the accompanying staffing footprint. As security conditions permit, U.S. officials will maintain regular travel into Somalia to conduct official business and promote our foreign policy objectives.

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE DHANANI'S RESPONSES TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR MENENDEZ

Question. What are the most important actions you have taken in your career to date to promote human rights and democracy? What is the impact of your actions? Why were your actions significant?

Answer. Throughout my career, I have advanced U.S. interests in the promotion of human rights. In my current assignment in the Africa Bureau, I lead the office responsible for coordinating the Bureau's efforts to promote human rights throughout the continent. Our activities include, for example, ensuring that recipients of security assistance have clean human rights records; promoting atrocity prevention; promoting fair, credible, and peaceful elections; and defending the human rights of LGBT persons. We coordinate the Country Reports on Human Rights Practices, Trafficking in Persons Reports, and International Religious Freedom Reports for African countries. As consul general in Hyderabad, India, my team's activities included partnering with the private sector to sponsor training for disabled adults, promoting local nongovernmental organizations' projects to economically empower women in lower income Muslim communities, supporting efforts to combat HIV/AIDS stigma, and persuading local police to rescind an order banning a rainbow film festival. In Gabon our human-rights-related activities included a public program highlighting abuses committed as part of rituals to enhance political success and in Zambia we were particularly active in responding to the humanitarian needs of refugees, including projects aimed at protecting teenage refugee girls from sexual abuse and exploitation.

My actions to promote human rights were particularly important during my service as deputy chief of mission in Zimbabwe. The U.S. Embassy's programs directly assisted thousands of Zimbabweans whose human rights were abused by the regime, and our efforts to expose abuse changed the course of events surrounding the 2008 election. When U.S. Government-supported election monitoring made stealing the election impossible during a first round of voting, the Government of Zimbabwe launched a campaign of violence and intimidation to ensure that the ruling party would prevail during a runoff. The U.S. mission in Zimbabwe already supported a network of partners to provide medical care, psychological counseling, and legal counsel to victims of torture and other human rights abuses. When the scale and severity of abuse expanded dramatically, we led an international effort to protect victims and expose abusers. In addition to supporting shelters and services for internally displaced persons (IDPs), we interviewed scores of individuals who had been beaten and burned out of their homes to identify individuals at risk of further political persecution for targeted support. The Embassy led the diplomatic community in visits to torture camps, defying police roadblocks. On July 3, 2008, hundreds of IDPs who had been forced to leave a shelter arrived at the U.S. Embassy seeking refuge. We scrambled to identify alternative shelters for the women and children, and provided blankets and hot meals for over 150 men that winter night. The USAID Director and I spent July 4 identifying and setting up a shelter on a farm outside the city, where we identified partners able to meet the IDPs' basic needs in the ensuing weeks. Independent media and watchdog groups who enjoyed our support provided us with documentation of the regime's abuses which we shared throughout the region, convincing Zimbabwe's neighbors that this time they could not turn a blind eye to the Mugabe regime's crimes. As a result, the ruling party recognized that it would be unable to steal the runoff, and invited the opposition into a coalition.

I was proud to lead the team at U.S. Embassy Harare who demonstrated the tremendous compassion and empathy of the American people under the most trying circumstances, making a difference in both the lives of individual Zimbabweans and the course of public events.

Question. What are the most pressing human rights issues in Somalia? What are the most important steps you expect to take—if confirmed—to promote human rights and democracy in Somalia? What do you hope to accomplish through these actions?

Answer. If I am confirmed, working with the African Union, Government of Somalia, and Somali civil society to improve protection of civilians will be central to my engagement. Violence against women and girls, including rape, remains a pervasive problem. I will work with Somali and international counterparts including AMISOM to improve protection efforts, including ensuring that women can access the services they need and perpetrators are held accountable. I am also deeply concerned about the situation of media freedom in Somalia. The country remains one of the most dangerous places to be a journalist. I will regularly discuss protection concerns with Somali journalists themselves, speak out against abuses against journalists, and strongly encourage the Somali Government to fully respect freedom of expression. In addition, I will work with Somalia and the United Nations to further implementation of Somalia's action plan to end the use and recruitment of child soldiers and standardize operating procedures for the reception and handover of children separated from armed groups.

Question. If confirmed, what are the potential obstacles to addressing the specific human rights issues you have identified in your previous response? What challenges will you face in Somalia in advancing human rights and democracy in general?

Answer. Key challenges to addressing human rights concerns in the country include continued insecurity in al-Shabaab-controlled portions of the country. This limits not only U.S. Government access to much of the country, but also access by international and local partners who could provide information that is vital to addressing human rights concerns. Human rights organizations have identified the lack of data on the situation in much of the country as problematic.

Improving civilian protection while conflict continues is extremely challenging, but it will be central to my efforts. Attacks, including direct attacks on civilians, continue to result in deaths, injuries, and displacement. Somali women and girls experience systematic marginalization, which makes it difficult to address gender-based violence and sexual exploitation. Women are reluctant to report abuse due to possible reprisals, and police are reluctant to investigate. The Government has arrested alleged rape victims. Authorities rarely used formal procedures to address rape. Improving protection for journalists is challenging in part due to the continued insecurity and presence of al-Shabaab. Also challenging is that the Government of Somalia and regional authorities continue to arrest, detain, and prosecute journalists. In regards to child soldiers, the government has taken additional steps to implement its action plan with the U.N., though, overall, implementation of the plan has been limited. More also needs to be done to improve demobilization, rehabilitation, and reintegration efforts for children separated from armed groups.

Question. Are you committed to meeting with human rights and other nongovernmental organizations in the United States and with local human rights NGOs in Somalia?

Answer. If confirmed, one of my most important goals as U.S. Ambassador to Somalia will be improving respect for human rights in the country, so that all Somalis have the opportunity to exercise their fundamental freedoms and live their lives without fear. My efforts will include those focused on improving civilian protection, strengthening efforts to address rape, building respect for media freedom, and ensuring that children are not used as soldiers. Human rights and other NGOs are critical to this work and I look forward to meeting with them, if I am confirmed.

Question. If confirmed, please describe steps that you will take to enhance effective implementation of Section 620M of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, commonly known as the Leahy amendment, within the Embassy as well as steps you would take to accomplish the goal of the law, namely, helping the Government of Somalia end impunity for human rights violations by security forces.

Answer. The Leahy laws are based on a basic principle: A government security apparatus' respect for human rights bolsters its legitimacy and trustworthiness in the eyes of the people it is supposed to protect, and enhances its ability to protect. Moreover, holding violators accountable fortifies the rule of law, which will be key in our efforts to improve governance in Somalia. If confirmed, the Embassy staff and I will convey this message in all our interactions with the FGS. In terms of implementation, the Embassy and the Department vet all individuals and units of the security services; if confirmed, I will ensure that our vetting continues to be comprehensive, thorough, and in full compliance with the Leahy laws, and that those who violate human rights are restricted from training. Furthermore, I will strongly urge the FGS to hold all violators accountable for their actions.

Question. In your written testimony, you mention the importance of building Somali institutional capacity. The U.S. Government has spent considerable time and resources in training the Somali national army as part of its Somalia strategy. The U.S. strategy toward sub-Saharan Africa states that as part of security sector reform, the United States will build security forces that "are subordinate to and operating jointly with their constitutional civil authorities."

- ♦ a. What programs are currently underway to build up the civil authorities in Somalia? What is the status of current efforts to build the capacity of the Somali Ministry of Defense? What plans do we have to build capacity in the judiciary and civilian oversight organizations that can provide oversight of the Somali National Army?

Answer. The United States has supported the development of the Ministry of Defense (MOD) by refurbishing the MOD headquarters at Gashandiga in Mogadishu, as well as providing a contract advisor who works with the Defense Minister at the MOD on a daily basis. Other donors are also participating in the effort to build the capacity of the MOD, including the European Union. We intend to expand our support to the MOD in the coming years, to include additional training, advisory support, and material support. Our assistance will reflect the absorptive capacity of the MOD, and complement the efforts of other donors. We are designing this support in coordination with other donors to strengthen civilian oversight of the military so that respect for human rights and inclusivity become well entrenched.

- ♦ b. What tools were used to assess the requirements of the Somali National Army and what is the plan for monitoring and evaluating our current efforts in keeping with the policy guidelines contained in Presidential Policy Directive 23?

Answer. Defining the requirements of the Somali National Army (SNA) has been an iterative process involving inputs and analysis from across the U.S. interagency, the AU Mission to Somalia (AMISOM), other donors involved in the effort to develop the SNA, U.S.-funded advisors embedded with the SNA and MOD, and, most importantly, the Somalis themselves. Program monitors in Mogadishu, augmented by U.S.

Government personnel's visits, ensure programming is being provided in line with U.S. Government regulations and objectives.

- ♦ c. How is the United States coordinating with other donors in the security sector?

Answer. U.S. support to the Somali security services is coordinated by regular working group meetings within the framework of the New Deal's Peacebuilding and Statebuilding Group Two (PSG-2). PSG-2 and the subworking groups that fall under it, is the primary vehicle for coordinating international community support directly with the Federal Government of Somalia, the U.N., the AU, and other partners.

- ♦ d. What is the administration doing to build government capacity to administer or provide social services in Mogadishu and areas which have been liberated from al-Shabaab?

Answer. The United States is helping the Federal Government of Somalia (FGS) define, coordinate, and manage the frameworks for national programs within the Office of the President, National Security Advisor, and the Ministry of Interior and Federalism. We support the Federal Government of Somalia to increase inclusiveness of political processes and facilitate the delivery of critical services in newly liberated areas, including training national and regional Parliaments to increase their oversight role through the Transition Initiatives for Stabilization from USAID. The United States helped the FGS understand the utility of initiating local-level reconciliation and civic dialogues in areas liberated from al-Shabaab, as a means to prevent new conflicts from erupting in the aftermath of liberation.

In FY 2014, the administration provided more than $58.3 million in development assistance to Somalia to promote peace and stability, foster good governance, spur economic growth and job creation, improve transparency and accountability, support institutional development, and increase the responsiveness of government institutions at the federal, regional, and local levels. The United States is supporting Somalia's Ministry of Education to help develop an Education Sector Strategic Plan. Development of this national plan will build government capacity to deliver improvements in educational quality and services across the country.

Question. Regarding the Somali Federal Government's Vision 2016 agenda, you mentioned that many deadlines have already been missed and that the international community continues to encourage the federal government to adhere to the roadmap.

- ♦ a. What is the status of constitutional development in Somalia?

Answer. The Somali parliamentary constitutional review committee has begun to advise the recently established Independent Constitutional Review Implementation Commission (IRIC), on chapters one and four of the constitution which address the critical issues of the status of Mogadishu in the state formation process and the electoral law. The Speaker of Parliament informed us that he intends to expedite the review process during the next session of Parliament (technically scheduled to open the week of April 20).

- ♦ b. What is the status of discussions about federalism and the integration of semiautonomous regions such as Somaliland?

Answer. The state formation process to build a federal system in Somalia is currently underway. Interim administrations, precursors to formal federal states, are now in place in Jubbaland and the South West region, and a reconciliation process is currently underway in the central regions. The Federal Government of Somalia and Puntland signed an agreement in October 2014 to pave the way for Puntland's recognition as a federal member state. To accelerate the federalism process, Mogadishu and the regional leaders recently created the Somali Leadership Forum to discuss key issues, including regional security force integration, 2016 elections, and the state formation process. Somaliland maintains its unilaterally declared independence from Mogadishu, but has engaged in Turkish-sponsored talks on issues requiring cooperation, such as airspace management.

TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR FLAKE

Question. What are the prospects for Somalia to hold elections as expected in 2016? Given the political infighting and insecurity, will it be possible to hold a nationwide constitutional referendum and elections next year?

Answer. The United States continues to support the Federal Government of Somalia's Vision 2016 agenda, which includes holding national elections in 2016. The Federal Government of Somalia (FGS) itself has acknowledged that Vision 2016 is behind schedule. We consistently urge the FGS to accelerate the pace of reform and to put in place the institutions, laws, and processes necessary to meet its Vision 2016 goals.

Question. Given that the current central government was largely appointed and selected to overcome internal rivalries, do you think these elections will be viewed as credible and legitimate in the eyes of the Somali people?

Answer. The United States supports Somalia's state formation process, currently underway, which will lay the foundation for a more representative government. We continue to urge the Somali Government to begin the process to review the interim constitution and present a final version for its citizens to approve in a national referendum by early 2016. USAID's democracy and governance program in Somalia strengthens regional and national parliaments to perform oversight and to develop legislation, particularly as regards the legal framework necessary for credible and legitimate referenda and electoral processes. If confirmed, I will continue to press the Government of Somalia urgently to take steps toward inclusive and democratic elections. As Somalia continues to develop inclusive political institutions, its leaders must support the ability of citizens to choose their own government through periodic free and fair elections.

Question. How would you characterize al-Shabaab's relationship with al-Qaeda, Al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula, and the Islamic State, respectively?

Answer. Al-Shabaab publicly announced its merger with al-Qaeda in a February 2012 statement in which they pledged loyalty to al-Qaeda leader Ayman al-Zawahiri. Al-Shabaab is not related to ISIS, although there have been reports of ethnic Somalis, not affiliated with al-Shabaab, fighting alongside extremist groups in Syria and Iraq. Al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula, like al-Shabaab, is an al-Qaeda affiliate.

Question. What is the anticipated timeline for establishing an embassy in Mogadishu? What are the challenges with the current system, in which U.S. diplomats and USAID personnel travel back and forth from Kenya?

Answer. We look forward to broadening and deepening our engagement and to re-establishing a permanent diplomatic presence in Mogadishu. Currently, chief of mission personnel travel to Mogadishu and other locations in Somalia as security conditions permit. Establishment of a permanent diplomatic presence in Mogadishu will represent the culmination of this recognition process, but there is no fixed timeline for achieving this objective.

Question. The State Department budget justification includes a request for $110 million to support African Peacekeeping Rapid Response Partnership (APRRP). According to the CBJ, the program would "build rapid peacekeeping response capabilities in Ethiopia, Ghana, Rwanda, Senegal, Tanzania, and Uganda."

- ♦ (a). How does this proposal compare to existing training programs, including African Contingency Operations Training and Assistance (ACOTA) Program?

Answer. APRRP assistance will complement but not replace existing peace operations capacity-building programs, such as the Global Peace Operations Initiative (GPOI), the Africa Contingency Operations Training and Assistance (ACOTA) program (which is funded predominantly through GPOI), and the International Police Peacekeeping Operations Support (IPPOS) program. GPOI and IPPOS emphasize broader, global capacity-building efforts focused on addressing a wider range of international peace operations shortfalls and strengthening the effectiveness of U.N. and regional missions. APRRP partners have and may continue to receive training through these other programs as well.

- ♦ (b). How would you see the program impacting troop contributing countries effectiveness in ongoing operations?

Answer. APRRP will focus on developing the capabilities of partner nations to deploy forces rapidly in support of an AU or U.N.-mandated operation. APRRP will inject targeted resources to address specific gaps in peacekeeping rapid response capabilities in the selected partner countries. With this specific goal in mind, APRRP works with a set of proven partners to emphasize training and provision and maintenance of equipment to enable rapid deployment and sustainment. While facilitating rapid deployment is the primary focus of the program, we anticipate that the improved specialty capabilities and institutional capacity provided through APRRP have the potential to benefit ongoing operations as well.

- ♦ (c). As you know, reports implicated Ugandan and Burundian troops participating in AMISOM of raping civilians. Would APPRP include modules aimed at protecting civilians? Would, if not how, do you guard against reputational risk to the U.S. from being associated with their training?

Answer. We are greatly concerned about the reports of sexual exploitation and abuse by AMISOM forces. The United States immediately engaged with the African Union and the Governments of Uganda and Burundi to urge them to undertake a credible and transparent investigation into the alleged incidents immediately. Ugandan and Burundian forces deploying to AMISOM currently receive substantial training related to human rights and protection of civilians through the Africa Contingency Operations Training and Assistance (ACOTA) program and counterterrorism training funded through section 2282. We are continuously looking at ways to improve this training, including in response to the reports of sexual exploitation and abuse. That training will need to focus not only on increased awareness of sexual exploitation and abuse, but also on improving the capacity of the contingents to investigate allegations and hold perpetrators accountable.

We intend to keep APPRP focused on developing specialized capabilities and enabling units required to facilitate rapid deployment (including logistics, engineering, equipment maintenance, transport, intelligence, and medical capabilities), and, therefore, we do not expect protection of civilians to be a primary focus of the APPRP-funded training events. This is not because protection of civilians is unimportant, but rather because these topics are already being addressed through the existing predeployment training initiatives funded through the Global Peace Operations Initiative (like ACOTA) and section 2282. We intend APPRP to complement, not replace existing training initiatives.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. JOHN BARRASSO, U.S. SENATOR FROM WYOMING

Senator BARRASSO. Well, good afternoon. Congratulations. I would like to call to order this hearing of the United States Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

The committee is meeting today to examine the nomination of five individuals to serve our country's interests in international financial institutions in the State Department.

Again, congratulations on your nominations to these important positions. I want to welcome all of you and extend a warm welcome, on behalf of the committee, to all your families and friends who are here. And I hope that, when you get a chance to testify, each of you will introduce others that are here supporting you from your family.

Should you serve our Nation in these important positions, it is critical that each of you provide strong stewardship of American taxpayer resources, demonstrate professionalism and good judgment, and vigorously work to advance the priorities of the United States.

During your testimony, I hope each of you will lay out your vision and goals for the positions to which you have been nominated for, and your plan to achieve them.

Joining us this afternoon are five nominees. I am pleased to introduce them to the committee.

Mileydi Guilarte, who is been nominated to be the United States Alternate Executive Director of the Inter-American Development Bank. And she is currently serving as the International Cooperation Specialist in the Bureau for Latin America and the Caribbean at the United States Agency of International Development. She previously worked at the United Nations, the World Bank, and the International Monetary Fund.

Jennifer Haverkamp is the nominee to be Assistant Secretary of State for Oceans and International Environmental and Scientific Affairs. Ms. Haverkamp is currently an independent consultant and lecturer at George Washington University Law School. She has previously worked for the Environmental Defense Fund, serving as the Director of International Climate Program and the Managing Director for International Policy.

Marcia Ocomy is the nominee to be the United States Director of the African Development Bank for a term of 5 years. She is currently a specialist leader at Deloitte Consulting and has been with Deloitte since 2009, where she has worked with the United States Agency for International Development on various assignments.

Sunil Sabharwal is the nominee to be the United States Alternate Executive Director of the International Monetary Fund for a term of 2 years. He is an independent investor and consultant in the international payment sector since 2006. During his career, he has worked at the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and held senior positions at First Data Corporation, Western Union, and GE Capital.

And then Brian Egan has been nominated for the position of Legal Adviser at the Department of State. He is currently working as Legal Adviser to the National Security Council, Deputy Assistant to the President, and Deputy Counsel to the President. In addition to previously working with the national security staff at the White House, he has also served as an attorney adviser at the Office of Legal Adviser of the Department of State.

Now I want to turn to the Ranking Member, Senator Udall, to offer his opening remarks.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. TOM UDALL,
U.S. SENATOR FROM NEW MEXICO

Senator UDALL. Thank you very much, Chairman Barrasso, for holding this hearing. And I, too, want to welcome our nominees who are with us this afternoon. We have five well-qualified candidates with impressive resumes being considered today.

As most of you know, our subcommittee's jurisdiction covers a lot of ground, some would say from the ocean floor out to space. The Bureau of Oceans and International Environmental and Scientific Affairs, I think, would agree with that. Their work, ranging from environmental issues, such as climate change, to emerging issues, such as space, is crucial to our foreign policy. Congress has a vital interest in international institutions to promote economic growth, to support the development of international law, to support strong environmental standards and improve security and lives. All serve to strengthen social and international development and further important objectives of U.S. foreign policy.

The nominations we are considering today provide an excellent opportunity for the United States to continue to work closely with the international community. Our participation in the international development organizations help shape the discussions in multilateral forums to reflect U.S. priorities and interests, and also ensure that organizations like the Inter-American Development Bank, the African Development Bank, and the International Monetary Fund are well equipped to succeed in their missions. Those missions are essential to promote security, economic prosperity, and advocate for healthier lives through science and partnerships. That is a responsible course and brings greater stability, not only to specific regions around the world, but throughout the world.

So, I look forward to our discussions here today with this impressive list of nominees.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I would yield back.

Senator BARRASSO. Thank you.

Senator Cardin, anything you would like to add?

Senator CARDIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I just really want to welcome our nominees, thank you for your public service, your willingness to serve, and I also thank your families.

Senator BARRASSO. Thank you both.

And all of the positions that the committee is discussing today are very important. I look forward to hearing the testimony.

Your full statements will be entered into the record in their entirety. And I ask that you try to summarize your testimony in about 5 minutes in order for members to have an opportunity to ask questions. Other members may be joining us at different times during the hearing. And again, please feel free to introduce your family members who are here today offering their support.

And, with that, Ms. Guilarte, may we please start with you?

STATEMENT OF MILEYDI GUILARTE, NOMINATED TO BE U.S. ALTERNATE EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF THE INTER-AMERICAN DEVELOPMENT BANK

Ms. GUILARTE. Thank you, Chairman.

Chairman Barrasso, Senator Udall, members of the committee, thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today.

I am honored that President Obama nominated me to serve as the Alternate Executive Director at the Inter-American Development Bank. I am also grateful to Secretary Lew and Assistant Secretary Marisa Lago for supporting me.

I am also grateful to my family, friends, and colleagues that are present today for their love, encouragement, and unwavering support. I would like to acknowledge my mother, Zenaida Guilarte, who is with me today.

If confirmed, I will bring to the IDB a deep understanding of Latin America, solid experience with international development, and a strong belief in the value of public service, and the commitment to relentlessly promote U.S. interests in the region.

Representing the United States at the IDB, an institution created to support the economic and social development of Latin America, is a humbling yet vital undertaking. If confirmed, I would be the first Latina in nearly 30 years to hold this important position.

Since I appeared before this distinguished committee a year ago, I have continued to strengthen my experience and engagement in Latin America at the United States Agency for International Development, primarily working on our response to last summer's surge of unaccompanied minors from Central America. Addressing the interrelated economic, political, and security challenges facing the region, and their consequences, are critical to the national security interests of the United States. If confirmed, I hope to continue supporting this difficult and challenging task.

Let me take the opportunity to tell you a little bit about my background, which has helped shape how I came to pursue a career in international development.

Born in Cuba, I left Havana for the United States at an early age with my family in search of a better life with only a single blue suitcase in our hands. I spent my formative years in Miami, where I worked side by side with my parents in flea markets each weekend to help make ends meet. These experiences taught me the values of discipline and hard work. I was the first member of my family to graduate from college. And I feel deeply blessed to have prospered in America.

While in graduate school, I focused on developing a social academic foundation to understand economic, political, and social issues as they impact development and democracy. After graduation, my deep commitment to the promotion of democracy and human rights led me to work and live in various countries around the world.

Through these experiences, I deepened my leadership skills and learned how critical the interaction between financial institutions, donor, and civil society are in the development of the world's poorest nations. At the World Bank and at the United Nations, I worked on conflict prevention, humanitarian assistance, and strengthening the emerging democracies. Most recently, at the United States Agency for International Development, I have worked on our response to address the root causes of the influx of unaccompanied minors while at the same time contributed to the interagency process that produced the administration's proposed $1 billion request for Central America. These experiences allow me to appreciate the challenges of working within complex multilateral institutions and develop the skills to help promote effective initiatives in that environment.

Thinking about Latin America has been a constant throughout my life. The opportunity to represent our great country at the Inter-American Development Bank is a particular honor for me as an American born in Latin America. If confirmed, I will work diligently to advance U.S. objectives at the IDB by carefully stewarding the resources of U.S. taxpayers and by promoting greater accountability, transparency, and effectiveness.

I look forward to working closely with the members of this committee and your staff. Thank you for your consideration. And I look forward to answering any questions you might have.

STATEMENT OF JENNIFER ANN HAVERKAMP, NOMINATED TO BE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE FOR OCEANS AND INTERNATIONAL ENVIRONMENTAL AND SCIENTIFIC AFFAIRS

Ms. HAVERKAMP. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Ranking Member Udall and distinguished members of the committee. It is a great privilege for me to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee for Assistant Secretary of State for the Bureau of Oceans and International Environmental and Scientific Affairs.

With your permission, I have a longer statement for the record.

I am deeply grateful to President Obama and Secretary Kerry for placing their trust in me for this position. And I look forward to again working with Under Secretary Novelli, my former colleague from the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative. If confirmed, I very much look forward to working with the Congress, and with this committee in particular, to advance U.S. interests through our global environmental, scientific, and health diplomacy.

I am also deeply grateful to my family, my support and inspiration. With me here today are my husband, Jeff Kehne, my father-and mother-in-law, Bruce and Elizabeth Kehne, and my niece, Meagan Haverkamp. Our two children, Gregory and Adrianne, very much wish they could be here, but they are busy wrapping up their end-of-semester college activities far from Washington.

My parents, were they still alive, would have been enormously proud. My father, a college educator who served as a U.S. Navy lieutenant in World War II in the Pacific, and my mother, a teacher and homemaker who raised six children, believed deeply in the importance of education, hard work, and public service.

I am energized and eager to return to government and put my experience to work advancing American priorities and values. I would bring to the position a science background, having majored in biology in college and published ecological field research. I have dedicated most of my career to public service, and have worked for the last 22 years in the international realm. I served as the Assistant U.S. Trade Representative for Environment and Natural Resources for most of my 10 years at USTR, and, before, held positions of responsibility at the Department of Justice, the Environmental Protection Agency, and the U.S. Court of Appeals. More recently, I have worked and served on boards in the nonprofit sector, with a focus on finding practical solutions to confront climate change, conserve tropical forests, and advance clean energy.

I believe many aspects of my experience, especially at USTR, will have relevant parallels in the work of OES. These include strengthening the United States domestically through international engagement, finding ways to advance U.S. economic interests while protecting our environmental values, and promoting health and prosperity abroad, and leveling the playing field for U.S. companies through advancing environmental protections in other countries.

Turning to OES: Four decades ago, this Congress created the Bureau and gave it broad responsibilities for complex and consequential issues. In the years since, OES's signature issues of science, technology, and innovation, environment, oceans, and health have all played increasingly significant roles in strengthening the U.S. economy, advancing our foreign policy objectives, and buttressing our leadership positions around the world.

If confirmed by the Senate, my priorities would be interwoven and would encompass the themes of investments, innovation, and inspiration.

First, investments. I would continue and build upon the strong and effective investments Secretary Kerry is making in the oceans, the Arctic, climate change, wildlife conservation, and health. In each of these areas, achieving substantive and diplomatic gains depends upon making strong and effective investments in long-term policy development, interagency coordination, the best analysis, and partnerships with other governments, the private sector, and civil society.

Second, innovation. Advances in science and technology have sharpened the need to focus on science diplomacy. To remain the best innovators in the world, our scientists must have access to data, research results, and collaboration opportunities with their international counterparts. And science enables the United States to exert innovative leadership in averting catastrophes, whether from mercury contamination, an infectious disease like Ebola, or severe water shortages.

Third, inspiration. If confirmed, I would work to foster and capitalize on the tremendous talent and inspiration of the people in OES to build coalitions and yield important diplomatic wins.

In closing, I am eager to tackle the staggering pressures bearing down on the planet's people and natural resources—as Senator Udall said, from the ocean's depths to the ice-capped poles and to outer space, and to help shape foreign diplomacy in these areas for years to come.

If confirmed, I would work hard every day to successfully carry out the profound responsibility thereby conferred upon me.

Thank you for your consideration. And I look forward to your questions.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Haverkamp follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF JENNIFER ANN HAVERKAMP

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Udall and distinguished members of the committee.

It is a great privilege for me to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee for Assistant Secretary of State for the Bureau of Oceans and International Environmental and Scientific Affairs (OES). I am grateful to President Obama and Secretary Kerry for placing their trust in me to help fashion solutions to the profound challenges facing our fragile world and the people it must continue to sustain. I am also grateful for the opportunity to again work with Under Secretary Catherine Novelli, whose dynamic leadership and excellent judgment I had the privilege to observe closely during our years together at USTR.

If confirmed, I very much look forward to working with the Congress, and this committee in particular, to advance the United States essential environmental, economic, and national security interests through our global environmental, scientific, and health diplomacy.

I am also deeply grateful to my family, who have supported and inspired me throughout my career in public service and international environmental and trade policy. With me here today are my husband, Jeff Kehne, my father- and mother-in-law, Bruce and Elizabeth Kehne, of Columbia (formerly Pikesville), Maryland, and my niece, Meagan Haverkamp. Our two children very much wish they could be here but our son Gregory, a college junior, is studying mathematics abroad in Budapest and our daughter Adrienne is busy completing her freshman year of college.

My parents, were they still alive, would have been enormously proud to see this day. My father, a college educator who served as a U.S. Navy lieutenant in World War II's Pacific Theater, and my mother, a teacher and homemaker who raised six children, believed deeply in the importance of education, hard work, and public service. And I can thank our family's cross-country vacations, which Dad and Mom spent driving us to see our Nation's spectacular national parks and historic sites, for sparking my lifelong passion for nature conservation and outdoor recreation.

Professional background

I am energized and eager to return to government and put my experience to work advancing American priorities and values. My professional experiences have attracted me to this position and I might even argue this is a role I have been preparing for throughout my career.

I would bring to the position a science background, having majored in biology in college and published field research on the ecology of the North American tall-grass prairie. I have dedicated most of my career to public service, and have worked for the last 22 years in the international realm. For most of my 10 years at USTR I served as the Assistant U.S. Trade Representative for Environment and Natural Resources and was a career member of the Senior Executive Service. Before USTR I also held positions of responsibility at the Department of Justice, the Environmental Protection Agency, and the U.S. Court of Appeals. Though working at Foggy Bottom would be a new experience, over the years I have engaged actively with many of the Department's global environmental, fisheries, and economic issues and gotten to work with many of its outstanding officials.

I believe many aspects of my experience at USTR will have relevant parallels in the work of OES: strengthening the United States domestically through international engagement; finding ways to advance U.S. economic interests while protecting our environmental values; promoting health and prosperity abroad and leveling the playing field for U.S. companies by advancing environmental protections in other countries; and recognizing that often the best way to protect biodiversity is through solutions that accommodate the local population's economic needs—by making the forests and elephants and coral reefs worth more alive than dead.

More recently, I worked in the nonprofit sector to find practical solutions to confront climate change, conserve tropical forests, and advance clean energy. Addressing and preparing for climate change, one of the most profound challenges facing our generation, is a key priority of the President and Secretary Kerry, and cuts across many aspects of OES's work and that of the Department more broadly.

Overview of OES

Four decades ago, Congress passed legislation creating OES with broad responsibilities for complex and consequential issues, around the same time Congress addressed increasingly harmful environmental degradation by passing landmark environmental and pollution control legislation. Over the years since those laws were enacted, OES's signature issues of science, technology, and innovation; environment; oceans; and health have played increasingly significant roles in strengthening the U.S. economy, advancing our foreign policy objectives, and buttressing our leadership position in the world. More and more, the Department's regional bureaus and embassies consider OES's deep bench of substantive experts a valuable tool in their bilateral diplomacy, as the host countries seek out U.S. scientific and technological cooperation or assistance to address challenges such as wildlife trafficking or resolving conflicts over access to water resources. For example, OES experts supported efforts by countries along the Nile River Basin to establish a cooperative framework for managing its limited water resources that is expected to contribute to the region's economic development, peace, and security.

As part of the first Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review (QDDR) in 2010, OES joined with the Department's Bureau of Economic and Business Affairs and the Bureau of Energy Resources to become the "E" family, now under Under Secretary Novelli's leadership. This collaborative relationship was reinforced in the recently released second QDDR. I would welcome the opportunities this structure presents for close collaboration with these offices, a situation resonant with my career experiences in international trade, environmental protection, and clean energy development.

If confirmed by the Senate, my priorities would be interwoven and would encompass the following themes: investments, innovation, and inspiration. First, I would like to continue the strong and effective investments Secretary Kerry is making, especially in the areas of oceans, the Arctic, climate change, conservation, and health. In each of these areas, investments in long-term policy development; inter-agency coordination; partnerships with other governments, the private sector, and civil society; and the best analysis will be key to achieving sustained substantive and diplomatic gains.

Second, innovation. Our knowledge of science to educate and inform our partners and the public will guide my thinking and bring an innovative, equitable and cost-effective approach to problemsolving. Advances in science and technology have brought our world much closer together and sharpened the need to focus on science diplomacy. To remain the best in the world, our scientists need access to data, research results, and collaboration opportunities with their international counterparts. And science underpins the actions we take and enables the United States to exert innovative leadership in averting catastrophes, whether from mercury contamination, an infectious disease or severe water shortages.

Third, inspiration. I would work to foster and capitalize on the tremendous talent and inspiration of the people in OES to build coalitions and partnerships. The Bureau's professionals have been at the forefront of international efforts to achieve important wins on the conservation, health, climate change, science, space and trade fronts, keeping a steady eye on the prize throughout often contentious, hard-fought negotiations (including some that I have witnessed firsthand).

Priority issues for OES

Across the wide range of issues that fall within OES's responsibility, I'd like to elaborate on my key priorities, if confirmed:

Oceans

The oceans, covering almost three-quarters of the planet, are vital resources for food, for transportation, for energy, for tourism. Secretary Kerry has rightly made global oceans policy a top priority of the Department, and if confirmed I look forward to throwing my energy into those efforts.

The key initiatives coming out of last June's successful Our Ocean international conference include goals to advance sustainable fisheries, reduce pollution entering the marine environment, stem the increase of ocean acidification, and protect ocean areas. One OES priority in 2015 is carrying out a plan developed by President Obama's Task Force on Combating Illegal, Unreported, and Unregulated Fishing and Seafood Fraud. Implementing this plan to combat IUU fishing and seafood fraud will help level the playing field for American fishermen and fishing businesses who play by the rules.

I would also prioritize OES's role in promoting sustainable global fisheries for the world's people who depend on oceans for their food and their livelihoods. Over 1 billion people worldwide rely on food from the ocean as their primary source of protein. OES is involved in a wide range of negotiations addressing the conservation and management of global fish stocks. The economic benefit to the United States generated by the fisheries subject to these negotiations, or managed by the regional fisheries management organizations within which many such negotiations occur, is estimated at between $12-$15 billion each year. These negotiations affect economic interests and stakeholders in virtually all parts of the United States, including the Pacific and Atlantic coasts, Gulf of Mexico, Alaska, Hawaii and the U.S. Pacific territories.

I am grateful the Senate gave its advice and consent to U.S. ratification of four important fisheries treaties last spring, and look forward, if confirmed, to working with Congress, members of the Oceans Caucus and this committee to implement them. Illustrative of these agreements' contribution to safeguarding U.S. economic interests is the Agreement on Port State Measures to Prevent, Deter, and Eliminate Illegal, Unreported, and Unregulated Fishing. The Port State Measures Agreement combats these harmful fisheries practices through the implementation of robust, globally consistent requirements of parties, in their capacity as port States, to refuse port entry or access for landing fish, transshipment, packaging, processing, or servicing a ship if the ship is known to have engaged in IUU fishing. The U.S. fishing industry benefits when its competitors are compelled to also follow the rule of law, and I look forward to contributing to these efforts.

Arctic

As part of OES's responsibility for oceans and polar affairs, in recent years the Bureau has deepened its engagement with other Arctic countries, as the region's changing climate and receding ice cover have necessitated greater attention to emerging issues. As more Arctic waters become navigable and fishable, the need escalates for greater Arctic science cooperation, sustainable fisheries management, and protection of a fragile ecosystem newly opening to shipping, economic development and resource extraction. The Arctic is an excellent example of how U.S. environmental and natural resource conservation interests are inextricably entwined with our economic and national security interests, and must be an integral part of our diplomatic efforts.

In April, the United States took over from Canada the 2-year rotating chairmanship of the Arctic Council, an intergovernmental forum made up of those eight nations with land territory above the Arctic Circle. The Council's priorities during the U.S. chairmanship will focus on stewardship of the Arctic Ocean, improving economic and living conditions for the people of the region, and addressing the effects of climate change in the Arctic. If confirmed, I look forward to working closely with Admiral Papp, the Department's Special Representative for the Arctic, as well as with other bureaus and government agencies, to make the best use of this important diplomatic opportunity.

Climate change

The Department's 2015 Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review focuses on four global policy priorities, including mitigating and adapting to climate change. As Secretary Kerry stated in his March 2015 speech before the Atlantic Council, climate change, like epidemics, poverty, extremism, and nuclear proliferation, is a challenge that respects no borders. He has also spoken frequently of our responsibility to future generations as stewards of the Earth.

If confirmed, I would look forward to supporting the Office of the Special Envoy on Climate Change (SECC), the Department's lead on international negotiations on climate change. Although OES does not lead this work, the Bureau lends its scientific and technical expertise to SECC. One example in particular is the work the Bureau is undertaking with Mexico and Canada to gain broad international support for an agreement to dramatically reduce hydrofluorocarbons (HFCs) in the atmosphere. The health and economic benefits that would be derived from eliminating 90 billion tons of carbon dioxide-equivalent through 2050 would be enormous. If confirmed, I would lend my professional expertise in the trade, economics, and environmental arena to ensure that the support the Bureau provides in confronting climate change is scientifically based, results oriented and of tremendous value to the American people.

Wildlife trafficking

Wildlife trafficking is a critical conservation concern and a threat to our country's national security. The illegal trade in wildlife has devastating impacts: it fuels corruption and undermines the rule of law, hinders economic development, contributes to the spread of disease, and is pushing some species to the brink of extinction. It is compromising the tourism-based economies of vulnerable African countries and, in some instances, is being used to finance organized crime, insurgencies, and possibly terrorism.

The toll on iconic species is horrific: the forest elephant populations in Central Africa, for instance, declined by approximately two-thirds between just 2002 and 2012. And while elephants and endangered rhinos slaughtered for their ivory first come to mind, many other species from most continents, including black coral, turtles and tortoises, iguanas, tropical birds, pangolins and primates, are all at risk. The United States is both a link in the transit chain and a final destination for some wildlife and wildlife products; our international efforts focused on reducing both supply and demand must and will be pursued in tandem with domestic actions.

The OES Bureau has an important role to play in carrying out the Implementation Plan for the National Strategy for Combatting Wildlife Trafficking, issued in February. The Plan provides details for how the National Strategy's goals will be achieved and how progress will be measured. OES is leading coordination of two elements of the strategy: the international cooperation and partnerships and demand reduction components. OES is also contributing, through its support for regional wildlife enforcement networks (WENs) worldwide, to the global enforcement element.

The United States ramped-up efforts are beginning to pay off. We have, notably, reached agreements with China to cooperate in our efforts to combat wildlife trafficking. But there is still an enormous amount of work to be done, and if confirmed I would ensure that the Bureau's resources are deployed effectively in the fight against this global scourge.

Global health diplomacy

Before the daunting challenges of Ebola fade in memory, the United States Government needs to incorporate its lessons learned into our broader global health diplomacy, to better inform our Nation's responses to the inevitable future pandemics, wherever and whenever they may arise. The Ebola outbreak is but the latest evidence that the world has far to go to be ready to prevent, detect, and respond to these global health security threats, and OES is well-positioned to help address this problem. The Global Health Security Agenda, a 44-country effort launched by the United States in 2014, has now gained over 100 new concrete commitments to prevent, detect, and rapidly respond to infectious disease threats before they become epidemics like Ebola. The Bureau supports this vital priority by working among these countries and with relevant international organizations to achieve the Agenda's targets. Among other efforts, the Bureau is also working to expand the number of countries able to meet their obligations to the World Health Organization to develop certain core capacities to detect, assess, notify, and report public health emergencies of international concern.

OES plays a critical, though often behind the scenes, role in global health diplomacy. The Bureau works closely with the Department's regional and functional bureaus, special representatives and other U.S. entities (CDC, HHS, DOD, USAID, et al.) with important roles in global health policy. The strong relationships that U.S. expert agencies have developed with their international counterparts are vital to advancing global health. But as we learned from Ebola, in a crisis, to mobilize the global resources needed, and to coordinate the efforts of multiple entities, it takes the high level, cross-cutting diplomacy that the State Department does so well. If confirmed, I would apply myself to finding ways to strengthen the international and interagency coordination on shared global health priorities, and to advancing global pandemic readiness.

Science and technology—promoting innovation and entrepreneurship

As I mentioned earlier, I consider the deployment of U.S. scientific and technological expertise, and our leadership in innovation, to be an important engine of diplomacy and global development. Equally important is to support the Secretary's efforts to increase the role of science across the work of the State Department.

Innovation and entrepreneurship have been fundamental drivers of U.S. economic growth since our country's founding, and promoting innovation abroad is an especially promising area of U.S. diplomacy. In this vein, OES has developed a Global Innovation through Science and Technology (GIST) initiative, which trains young entrepreneurs. GIST, itself an excellent example of bringing an innovative approach to diplomacy, has to date led to businesses that generated over $80 million in revenue. The program has worked in 86 emerging economies with over 2.6 million innovators and entrepreneurs around the world, providing training to over 4,500 startups. If confirmed, I would work to grow this program, which gives hope to young entrepreneurs and creates jobs in countries where the lack of economic opportunity can sow unrest and threaten our national security.

Closing

I am excited about the prospect of leading a bureau that brings to bear the best analysis to help pioneer scientific and technological breakthroughs. I am excited to tackle the staggering pressures bearing down on natural resources, from the oceans' depths to the ice-capped poles, to the savannas and to outer space, and to help shape foreign diplomacy in these areas for years to come.

If confirmed, I would work hard every day to deserve the extraordinary honor and carry out the profound responsibility thereby conferred upon me.

Thank you for your consideration, and I look forward to your questions.

Senator BARRASSO. Well, thank you. Congratulations, again.

I will next move to Ms. Occomy.

STATEMENT OF MARCIA DENISE OCCOMY, NOMINATED TO BE U.S. DIRECTOR OF THE AFRICAN DEVELOPMENT BANK

Ms. OCCOMY. Thank you, Chairman and distinguished members of the committee. I am grateful for the opportunity to appear before you today.

I am honored that President Obama has nominated me to serve as the U.S. Executive Director for the African Development Bank.

I grew up in Chicago in a family of excellent role models who taught me the importance of hard work, discipline, and focus to be successful in life. My grandmother was one of the first African-American women to attend Radcliffe College in the early 1900s, and later became a prominent writer during the Harlem Renaissance. My father entered the University of Chicago at the age of 15, excelling in math and later becoming a computer executive in the retail industry in Chicago. My mother taught public schools for over 30 years, dedicating her life to public service. They and many others have influenced my decision, in part, to pursue an international development career later in my life.

If confirmed as the U.S. Executive Director to the African Development Bank, my vision is to leverage my international development experience to support U.S. interests in seeing the African Development Bank carry out its mission to promote economic development and progress across Africa.

Boosting growth is important for the African Continent but also for the United States by opening new markets and providing new customers for American goods and services. I have years of experience as a fiscal reform adviser on USAID-financed projects in developing in post-conflict countries. I have advised Ministries of Finance as they underwent public financial management reforms to strengthen their revenues and to build financial systems and capacity to put the country on the path towards economic growth. I have worked in countries in Central Asia, the Middle East, Central Europe, and in Africa, Egypt, Senegal, and, most recently, in the newest independent nation, South Sudan. I have experienced firsthand when countries struggle to balance implementation of sound fiscal policies while seeking to maintain political stability and security. I was in South Sudan and directly involved in assisting the country in post-conflict recovery efforts. Prior to my fiscal reform project implementation experience, I worked as a policy analyst at OMB during the 1990s.

I also have experience leveraging public-private partnerships for important local economic development projects. As a University of Chicago graduate student on a Patricia Harris Fellowship, I worked with the Habitat Company, a leading real-estate development firm which partnered with the Chicago Housing Authority to build scattered-site housing for public-housing residents to better integrate them into the broader community. This project was a model for how the public and private sector can partner to address a social issue effectively. I recognize that leveraging private-sector investment solutions and technologies will be a critical aspect of the future development of Africa, as well. I look forward to supporting the African Development Bank to leverage the financing instruments, to encourage private investment in Africa, including through public-private partnerships.

During his July 2013 visit to Africa, President Obama launched the Power Africa Initiative, a $7 billion, 5-year initiative to double access to electricity in sub-Saharan Africa, in partnership with African countries and the private sector.

When President Obama launched the Power Africa Initiative in Tanzania, African Development Bank president Donald Kaberuka joined him as a symbol of how the United States and Africa are working together to promote inclusive growth in the region.

Attracting private investors to Africa will require significant investment in infrastructure and a climate that is conducive to investment. Creating the right investment climate will depend on Africa's commitment and ability to improve governance, transparency, regional integration, and to build a skilled workforce. The African Development Bank has played a leading role in assisting African countries to address those issues, but more work remains to be done.

If confirmed, I commit to being a good steward of U.S. financial contributions to the bank and to ensure that the bank furthers U.S. economic and security interests.

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, thank you for considering my nomination. I look forward to answering your questions today.

PREPARED STATEMENT BY MARCIA DENISE OCCOMY

Chairman Barrasso, Ranking Member Udall, and distinguished members of the committee, I am grateful for the opportunity to appear before you today. I am honored that President Obama has nominated me to serve as the U.S. Executive Director for the African Development Bank.

I grew up in Chicago in a family of excellent role models who taught me the importance of hard work, discipline, and focus to be successful in life. My grandmother was one of the first African American women to attend Radcliffe College in the early 1900s and later became a prominent writer during the Harlem Renaissance. My father entered the University of Chicago at the age of 15 excelling in math and later becoming a computer executive in the retail industry in Chicago. My mother taught public schools for over 30 years dedicating her life to public service. They and many others have influenced my decision in part to pursue an international development career later in my life.

If confirmed as USED, my vision is to leverage my international development experience to support U.S. interests in seeing the African Development Bank carry out its mission to promote economic development and progress across Africa. Boosting growth is important for the African Continent, but also for the United States, by opening new markets and providing new customers for American goods and services. I have years of experience as a fiscal reform advisor on USAID-financed projects in developing and post conflict countries. I have advised Ministries of Finance as they underwent public financial management reforms to strengthen their revenues and to build financial systems and capacity to put the country on a path toward economic growth, while building political capacity. I have worked in such countries as Kazakhstan, Kosovo, Iraq, Afghanistan, and in Africa—Egypt, Senegal and most recently in the newest independent nation South Sudan. I have experienced firsthand when countries struggle to balance implementation of sound fiscal policies, while seeking to maintain political stability and security. I was in South Sudan and directly involved in assisting the country in post conflict recovery efforts. Prior to my fiscal reform project implementation experience, I worked as a policy analyst at the OMB during the 1990s.

I also have experience leveraging public-private partnerships for important local economic development projects. As a University of Chicago graduate student on a Patricia Harris Fellowship, I worked with Habitat Company, a leading real estate development firm which partnered with the Chicago Housing Authority to build scattered site housing for public housing residents to better integrate them into the broader community. This project was a model for how the public and private sector can partner to address a social issue effectively. I recognize that leveraging private sector investment, solutions and technologies will be a critical aspect of the future development of Africa as well. I look forward to supporting the African Development Bank to leverage its financing instruments to encourage private investment in Africa including through public-private partnerships.

During his July 2013 visit to Africa, President Obama launched the Power Africa Initiative, a $7 billion, 5-year initiative to double access to electricity in sub-Saharan Africa in partnership with African countries and the private sector. In announcing this key initiative the President noted, “America’s been involved in Africa for decades but we are moving beyond a simple provision of assistance . . . to a new model, a partnership between America and Africa, a partnership of equals that focuses on (Africa’s) capacity to solve problems and (Africa’s) capacity to grow.”

I embrace the President’s vision. When President Obama launched the Power Africa Initiative in Tanzania, African Development Bank President Donald Kaberuka joined him as a symbol of how the United States and Africa can work together to promote inclusive growth in the region.

Attracting private investors to Africa will require significant investment in infrastructure and a climate that is conducive to investment in Africa. Creating the right investment climate will depend on Africa's commitment and ability to improve governance, transparency, regional integration and to build a skilled workforce. The African Development Bank has played a leading role in assisting African countries to address these issues, but more work remains to be done.

If confirmed, I commit to being a good steward of U.S. financial contributions to the bank and to ensure that the Bank supports our Nation's inherent values—recognizing that open societies are the strongest societies; transparent systems are the most successful systems; and countries that commit to equally helping their citizens be healthy and educated, with economic opportunities will be the most prosperous.

Thank you again for considering my nomination, and I look forward to answering any additional questions you may have.

Senator BARRASSO. Thank you very much for your testimony.
Now we will hear from Mr. Sabharwal.

STATEMENT OF SUNIL SABHARWAL, NOMINATED TO BE U.S. ALTERNATE EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF THE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

Mr. SABHARWAL. Chairman Barrasso, Ranking Member Udall, distinguished members of the committee, it is an honor to appear before you today to present my personal and professional credentials for the position of the United States Alternate Executive Director of the International Monetary Fund.

I am grateful for President Obama for nominating me to this important office, and to Secretary Lew for his confidence and support. I also do want to thank the committee staff who have taken time to meet with me in the confirmation process.

If confirmed I look forward to advancing our shared commitment to make the IMF an even more effective organization and one where U.S. interests are strongly represented, promoted, and defended.

I would like to introduce the members of my family who are here with me today: my wife, Gabrielle, of 24 years, who has given up her forensic sciences career to follow me around the world and help me raise the family; my son, Nicolas, who just finished his sophomore year at Duke University studying computer sciences. He is accompanied by two of his college friends. It is great to see interest in the political process amongst youth.

Senator BARRASSO. You will be paying for dinner tonight.
[Laughter.]

Mr. SABHARWAL. We did not talk about that yet. [Laughter.]

Who is missing—of course, the busiest person in the family is always the youngest, and that is my daughter, Isabella. She is 16, a sophomore at the Cathedral School, who simply did not want to give up her orchestra practice and her track-and-field practice 2 days before the D.C. State Championships, and her chemistry exam, shockingly. So, we are missing her.

I have submitted my written statement for the record. I do not intend to read that in its entirety here. However, I would like to point out, just briefly, that I arrived in this country 32 years ago from Communist Hungary. My family—my mother, brother, and I—we fled and arrived at the United States Embassy in Vienna, sought political asylum, and, through the support of a number of families, churches, organizations, charities, I managed to enroll college and start a professional career. I am extremely, eternally grateful to this country. And I am now looking to give back.

In the 27 or so years of my professional career, I had an opportunity to serve both on the public sector and predominantly on the private-sector side of things. In the public-sector capacity, I was an early American employee at the EBRD, the European Bank for Reconstruction Development, shortly after its inception, where I really found an appreciation of the role an IFI can play in funding infrastructure projects, creating institutions, and providing comfort to private-sector investment and engagement. However, as you have seen in the testimony, the majority of my experiences are in the private sector as an investor in financial services and financial technology.

With my various positions, I have had a chance to travel and live around the world. And I believe this professional background, coupled with my volunteer experiences with the sports movement and Olympic organizations, really have given me an opportunity to deal with people from every single continent from many, many countries. And this, I feel, has prepared me well to carry out the duties, if confirmed, of the U.S. Alternate Executive Director at the IMF. I think this is an important skill when you are dealing with an institution with up to 200 members and where you need their support to engage with you on a wide range of issues.

Thank you for the opportunity to appear here today. I would be pleased to answer any questions and, if confirmed, of course, working with you and your staff on a range of issues affecting the IMF.

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Sabharwal follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF SUNIL SABHARWAL

Chairman Barrasso, Ranking Member Udall, and distinguished members of the committee, it is an honor to appear before you today to present my personal and professional credentials for the position of United States Alternate Executive Director of the International Monetary Fund (IMF).

I am grateful to the President for nominating me to this important office and to Secretary Lew for his confidence and support. If confirmed, I look forward to advancing our shared commitment to make the IMF an even more effective organization and one where U.S. interests are strongly represented, promoted, and defended.

I would like to introduce members of my family, who are here with me today: starting with my son, Nicolas, who is a sophomore at Duke University with an interest in engineering and the sciences. My daughter, Izabella, who is a sophomore in High School at the National Cathedral School, and is vying to follow her grandfather to be an Olympian track athlete, and finally my wife, Gabrielle, with a Forensic Sciences background whose attention to detail has helped me get through all the documents needed prior to me sitting here in front of you. We also share a common passion for the sport of fencing as we met 25 years ago in Culver City, CA, in a fencing club and continue our involvement with the sport and the Olympic movement.

I was born in New Delhi, India, to an Indian father and a Hungarian mother. My parents separated when I was 9, and I moved to Budapest Hungary part of the Soviet Block at the time. Following my mother's refusal to join the Communist Party, she was refused a business permit, was constantly harassed for her religious beliefs—in the end giving the family no choice but fleeing the country and seeking asylum at the U.S. Embassy in Vienna. I had just finished high school.

Through the cooperation of the U.S. State Department, the United Nations, and charitable organizations, we received political asylum in the United States, more precisely in Columbus, OH, and with specific assistance by the Upper Arlington Lutheran Church. To date, I will never forget the reception we received in Columbus, in December of 1983 (just a couple of days before Christmas) and will remain forever grateful to Professor Cole and his family who enabled me to enroll at the Ohio State University weeks after my arrival. While I put myself through college with the use of financial aid, work-study, and scholarships, my family moved to California. Upon graduation, I joined them to begin my professional career.

When I left Hungary in 1983, I thought it was for good. Little did we know that less than 10 years later, massive political changes would sweep the region free. One of the first institutions created to foster the transition of the region was the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development (EBRD), and I was fortunate enough to play a meaningful role in the region's transition as an American citizen and EBRD employee.

I established the EBRD office in Budapest in early 1992, a time in which Hungary was at the forefront of innovative foreign direct investment legislation and regulations. This experience allowed me to participate in landmark public and private sector transactions, including the first bank and telecom privatizations, infrastructure projects, municipal finance, and venture capital deals of Central and Eastern Europe. In 1995, I transitioned to London to join the EBRD's headquarters staff as a member of its Financial Institutions team, which had the responsibility of investing in, and lending to, banks in the region. The 5 years I spent at the EBRD had shaped my early professional career and have had a significant impact throughout. I then spent about 10 years working for GE and First Data Corporation, most of it focused on investing in the financial services sector or companies that provide services to the financial services industry. For the last 8 years, I have served as an independent investor and adviser focused on the financial services, or "fintech" sector.

As a result of my global upbringing, through which I gained an ability to relate to people around the world, and my 25 years of tenure in the financial services sector—in both public and private domains—I am equipped with the experience necessary to carry out successfully the duties, if confirmed, of the U.S. Alternate Executive Director at the IMF. In addition, my language skills and volunteer experiences are also highly relevant in a body where we need to get representatives of nearly 200 countries to support us on a wide-ranging set of issues.

I look forward to answering your questions, and, if confirmed, to working with members of the committee on policy matters affecting the IMF.

Thank you for the opportunity to appear before the committee today. I would be pleased to answer any questions you may have.

Senator BARRASSO. Thank you for your testimony. Congratulations, again.

And now, finally, Mr. Egan.

STATEMENT OF BRIAN JAMES EGAN, NOMINATED TO BE LEGAL ADVISER OF THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Mr. EGAN. Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Udall, and members of the subcommittee, it is an honor to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to serve as Legal Adviser to the Department of State.

I am humbled by the trust that the President and Secretary Kerry have placed in me, and I am grateful to the committee for considering my nomination. I also appreciate the opportunity I have had to meet with committee staff, before this hearing, for productive discussions on a range of topics.

Mr. Chairman, please allow me to introduce my wife, Amy, and my children, Sally, Niles, and Damon, who are happy to have a half day of school to attend this afternoon's event. As you know, government service often requires long and unpredictable hours, which take a toll on our families. And I want to thank my family for the sacrifices they have made to enable me to pursue my passion for public service. I would not be able to carry out my current responsibilities, and I could not contemplate assuming the duties that I hope you will see fit to entrust to me, without their love and support.

I would also like to introduce my father, Dennis Egan, who, by example, has taught me the importance of hard work, independent judgment, and kindness in raising myself and my five brothers and sisters.

I am particularly honored to have been nominated for this position because serving as the Legal Adviser would mark a homecoming for me. Although I began my career as a lawyer in private practice, my calling has always been public service, and I have spent the past 10 years as a government lawyer, starting as a career attorney in the Office of the Legal Adviser. From my time there, I know that the Office of the Legal Adviser plays a critical role in advancing U.S. foreign policy and national security by providing high-quality and objective legal advice to the Secretary of State and other policymakers. The over 200 career lawyers and other professionals who make up the office strive to promote and protect U.S. interests around the world every day, without regard to party or politics, and in areas ranging from counterterrorism, law enforcement, and nuclear nonproliferation to the promotion of American trade and business and the protection of American citizens abroad.

I have dedicated my career to public service, to play a part, however small, in helping address the many legal challenges that are faced by the greatest democracy in the world. If confirmed, I would seek to uphold the office's tradition of providing rigorous and objective legal analysis in furtherance of our Nation's interests at home and around the world.

In my career, I have had the good fortune of being able to work in a number of national security legal positions with lawyers from around the government. And since 2013, I have been the Legal Adviser to the National Security Council. In my current role, I have the privilege of working every day with the President, Ambassador Rice, and other senior national security officials on a broad range of complex domestic and international legal issues. And in this capacity, I have had the privilege of working closely with general counsels and other senior lawyers from around the government, including the Departments of Justice, Defense, Commerce, Homeland Security, and the Treasury, the Director of National Intelligence, the CIA, and, of course, the Department of State. I have benefited immensely from the wisdom and counsel of Mary McLeod, who has served as State's Legal Adviser in an acting capacity for over 2 years, and many of the other outstanding attorneys who serve in the office that is known as L at the State Department.

Prior to serving in my current job, I worked at the Treasury Department as Assistant General Counsel for Enforcement Intelligence from 2012 to 2013, and my first job after graduating college was with the Department of Justice, where I served as a legal assistant in the Antitrust Division for nearly 3 years.

My experience in government have taught me a considerable amount about leadership, responsibility, problem solving, and collaboration. And these experience have deepened my conviction that we are best able to confront the foreign policy challenges that we face as a nation when the executive and legislative branches work together to address those challenges. While we may not always see the same issues in precisely the same way, or reach the same conclusions, if confirmed, I would be committed to maintaining an open dialogue with this committee on the issues that I will be responsible for as Legal Adviser.

Thank you for your consideration, and I look forward to answering your questions.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Egan follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF BRIAN JAMES EGAN

Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Udall, and members of the committee, it is an honor to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to serve as Legal Adviser to the Department of State. I am humbled by the trust the President and Secretary Kerry have placed in me, and I am grateful to the committee for considering my nomination. I also appreciate the opportunity I have had to meet with committee staff before this hearing for what I found to be productive conversations on a range of topics.

Mr. Chairman, please allow me to introduce my wife, Amy, and my children, Sally, Niles, and Damon. As each of you can attest, government service often requires long and unpredictable hours, which take a toll on our families. I want to thank my family for the sacrifices they have made to enable me to pursue my passion for public service. I would not be able to carry out my current responsibilities—and I could not contemplate assuming the new duties I hope you will see fit to entrust to me—without their continued love and support. I would also like to introduce my father, Dennis Egan, who by example has taught me the importance of hard work, independent judgment, and kindness.

Although I began my career as a lawyer in private practice, my calling has always been public service. I have spent the past 10 years as a government lawyer, starting as a career attorney in the Office of the Legal Adviser.

From my previous time there, I know that the Office of the Legal Adviser plays a critical role in advancing U.S. foreign policy and national security by providing high quality, objective legal advice to the Secretary of State, other policymakers within the Department of State, and departments and agencies across the Federal Government. The over 200 career lawyers and other professionals who make up the Office of the Legal Adviser strive to promote and protect U.S. interests around the world every day. They do so, without regard to party or politics, in areas ranging from counterterrorism, law enforcement, and nuclear nonproliferation to the promotion of American trade and business and the protection of American citizens abroad.

I have dedicated my career to government service to play a part, however small, in helping to address the many challenges faced by the greatest democracy in the world. If confirmed, I would seek to uphold the Office of the Legal Adviser's tradition of producing rigorous and objective legal analysis in furtherance of our Nation's interests at home and around the world.

Beyond working at the Legal Adviser's Office, I have had the good fortune of being able to work in a number of other national security legal jobs, with lawyers from across the Federal Government. Since 2013, I have been the Legal Adviser to the National Security Council and Deputy Counsel to the President. In my current role, I have the privilege of working every day to enhance the security and prosperity of the United States and the American people by advising the President, Ambassador Rice, and other senior national security officials on a broad range of complex domestic and international legal issues.

I have worked closely with the General Counsels and other senior lawyers of departments and agencies throughout the government, including the Departments of Justice, Defense, Commerce, Homeland Security, and the Treasury; the Office of the Director of National Intelligence; the Central Intelligence Agency; and, of course, the Department of State. I have benefited from the wisdom and counsel of Mary McLeod, who has served as State's Legal Adviser in an acting capacity for over 2 years, and many of the other outstanding attorneys who serve in the Office of the Legal Adviser.

Prior to serving as Legal Adviser to the National Security Council, I worked at the Department of the Treasury as Assistant General Counsel for Enforcement and Intelligence from 2012 to 2013. In that capacity, I was responsible for a staff of approximately 50 attorneys who provided legal advice and counsel on combating terrorism financing and other financial crimes, ensuring the effectiveness of U.S. financial sanctions regimes, and other issues related to Treasury's enforcement and intelligence responsibilities. And my first job after graduating from college was with the Department of Justice, where I served as a legal assistant in the Antitrust Division for nearly 3 years.

My experiences in government have taught me a great deal about leadership, responsibility, problemsolving, and collaboration. These experiences also have deepened my conviction that we are best able to confront the foreign policy challenges we face as a nation when the executive and legislative branches work together to address those challenges. While we may not always see the issues in precisely the same way or reach the same conclusions, if confirmed I would be committed to maintaining an open dialogue with this committee on the issues that I will be responsible for as Legal Adviser.

The challenges we face as a nation in the areas of foreign policy and national security are increasingly complex, and the legal issues that underlie some of these challenges are equally complex. Our Nation's leaders require the best possible legal advice to navigate these challenges, consistent with the Constitution and our commitment to the rule of law. If confirmed, I commit to you that I will do my best to provide that advice.

Thank you for your consideration. I look forward to answering your questions.

Senator BARRASSO. Well, thank you so much for your testimony. And welcome, to your family, as well.

Ms. Guilarte, the Latin American/Caribbean region have incredibly high energy costs, I think insufficient rates of investment; they rely on energy resources, such as Venezuelan oil, which may not be suitable, in the long run, in terms of sustainability. The countries are dependent on excess—on very expensive fuel. And I think we have an opportunity—and three members of this committee who are here today have all supported legislation—to make it a little easier for us to export U.S. natural gas, as well, and want to use the knowledge and the technology we have in the United States. Natural gas can be helpful in economies, because it provides a—much more affordable energy.

So, in your role, if confirmed, at the International—at the Inter-American Development Bank, you know, they talk about electricity demand in Latin America and the Caribbean, it is going to be doubling over the next decade. And they are looking at economic development role that natural gas can play. So, I am going to ask if you know of any steps right now that the Inter-American Development Bank is taking to provide the region with energy security and diversification through natural gas, and what role you would like to play in that.

Ms. GUILARTE. Thank you, Chairman, for your question.

I can understand your concern specifically about Venezuela and how their influence, especially on the ALBA members, especially those in the Caribbean and Central America, can have really a crisis situation, the way things are unfolding in Venezuela, and the impact that that could have in the region.

In terms of coal energy projects and what can be done better at the IDB, certainly all projects that come to the board are given full consideration. At the moment, there are no correlated projects—

Senator BARRASSO. And, I am sorry, I asked about natural gas.

Ms. GUILARTE. This—natural gas.

Senator BARRASSO. Natural gas, yes.

Ms. GUILARTE. If confirmed, what I can do, in my capacity, is that, one, I will make sure that those related projects that come to the board are given full consideration that it meets the needs of the country's energy demands, that we consider all relevant alternative approaches, and that ultimately they are sustainable, both financially and environmentally. I understand that the administration is also, through their Alliance for Prosperity, creating—in Central America—is looking at providing better and more diversified opportunities on energy efficiency approaches.

If confirmed, I look forward to working with you and members of this committee in ensuring that we look at all the range of options available.

Senator BARRASSO. Yes. But, I would say that, knowing that there was significant bipartisan support and an opportunity for affordable energy, it is something that I think would benefit that area.

Senator Corker, I am happy to turn my time over to you. I know you are on a tighter schedule, and you are chairman of this committee. So—

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I really appreciate you letting me do this. I know I am—you know I am here for just one of the witnesses and—or nominees. But, thank all of you for letting me doing—thank you for your service to the country that is getting ready to be in, in a different role, anyway.

To Mr. Egan, I just wanted to ask a few questions. I think you know I was going to do this. So, thank you for your willingness.

Congress has long understood that the 2001 AUMF covered al-Qaeda and the associated forces of al-Qaeda. Would you please describe the administration's legal view of why it is that ISIS is covered by the 2001 AUMF? And again, thank you for your continued service.

Mr. EGAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for your question.

The administration's position is that the 2001 AUMF does cover the ongoing military operations against ISIL. And I think the key fact which is reflected most recently in a speech that the general counsel from the Defense Department gave—Steven Preston—about a month ago, is that ISIL is essentially the remnants of a group that was formerly known as Al Qaeda in Iraq, a group that we fought in Iraq for a number of years and that broke from al-Qaeda in 2013. The administration's view is that the break of that group should not change the legal authority to use force against that group. Given that ISIL, as it is now known, continues to fight Americans and American interests in Iraq, they believe that they are the true successor to Osama bin Laden, and they are, in fact, competing for affiliation of groups with al-Qaeda right now. And that is why the administration's view is that ISIL is subject to the 2001 AUMF.

The CHAIRMAN. And does the administration currently have the statutory or article 2 authority to defend the United States or coalition-trained forces in Iraq and Syria if those forces come under direct threat from ISIS—al-Nusra, Assad regime forces, Hezbollah, or any other armed groups? As you know, we have a train-and-equip program that is underway. And, as you know—well, anyway, I will let you answer the question.

Mr. EGAN. Senator, I should have, of course, noted the administration's proposal, which this committee has considered, for new authorization to use military force, which would be specific to the threat posed by ISIL in Iraq and Syria. The administration's view is, at this time, we would have the authority to use force against ISIL and against the Nusra Front to defend our personnel in Iraq and Syria. I would say, to the extent that those personnel came under attack, we would—the President would likely have article 2 authority against anyone who had attacked them. But, we do have an AUMF that this committee has—that you have considered, that reflects the President's view on the appropriate scope of military force against ISIL in Iraq and Syria.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, actually, that is not true. Martin Dempsey and several—Ash Carter and several witnesses who came before us said that they did not have the authority to defend against Assad if the train-and-equip people that are not our folks—they are not part of our coalition, they are people that we are training in Syria to deal with both ISIS—well, we—in this particular case, ISIS. We may have another program. There may be another alleged program against Assad. But, they actually say they do not have that authority.

So, you are saying that you believe we do have that authority now to defend them against barrel bombs from Assad.

They said they had not sought that authority, and there was actually an internal debate right now within the administration as to whether to seek that authority.

Mr. EGAN. Then, Senator, I apologize. Maybe I misunderstood your question. I thought you were asking about our authority to defend our—

The CHAIRMAN. Right.

Mr. EGAN [continuing]. Troops who are currently stationed in Iraq—

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. EGAN [continuing]. Which I think is a slightly different question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Syrian opposition train-and-equip group, we do not have that authority, would you agree?

Mr. EGAN. We would have the authority to conduct military operations against ISIL and al-Qaeda under the same rationale that we do to conduct our own direct operations against those groups. I think the question of our authority to use force against the Assad regime is a more difficult question, and, you are correct, sir, that that is one that is under policy consideration within the administration right now.

The CHAIRMAN. To defend the very people that we are training to go in and be on the ground.

Mr. EGAN. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Okay.

I will just ask one more. And I want to thank the chairman for allowing me to do this, and the ranking member.

With United States forces on the ground in Iraq conducting activities in both Iraq and in Syria, what authority to protect and defend those forces, if any, is currently available under the 2001 or 2002 AUMFs? And is there something additional you gain under the 2002 AUMF that is not in the 2001 AUMF? I think you know the committee is looking at a number of things, one of which is the relevance of the 2002 AUMF. And I would appreciate it if you would answer that.

Mr. EGAN. Thank you, Senator.

So, the administration's position is that both the 2001 AUMF and the 2002 AUMF provide authority for the current military operations in Iraq and Syria. The President's AUMF proposal would, among other things, repeal the 2002 AUMF. And that is because he believes that the authority we have in both his proposal and in the 2001 AUMF would be sufficient to conduct the operations that are ongoing in Iraq and Syria.

The CHAIRMAN. And so, just to summarize so that you have been asked the same question that every other administration witness that has these kinds of responsibilities, you believe that, today, there is no authorization necessary—no additional authorization necessary to deal with ISIS—or ISIL, as you would call them—or Daesh, as some may call them.

Mr. EGAN. Senator, as a legal matter, I believe that we have the authorization that we need. I think the President has been clear that he believes that there are other reasons that it is important for this committee to continue its work on the AUMF. But, as a legal matter, our view is that we have the authority we need to conduct military operations against ISIL.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

And I will wish you the best, all of you, in your nomination testimony.

And thank you very much for this courtesy, both of you. Thank you.

Senator BARRASSO. Senator Udall.

Senator UDALL. Thank you very much, Chairman Barrasso.

Executive Director Guilarte, the Inter-American Development Bank has partnered with the Obama administration on several initiatives in Latin America. These include the Micro-Finance Growth Fund for the Western Hemisphere, announced at the fifth Summit of the Americas in April 2009, and the Women's Entrepreneurship in the Americas, announced at the sixth Summit of the Americas in April 2012. What are the objectives of these initiatives? And what have they accomplished so far?

Ms. GUILARTE. Chairman, I appreciate the question. I am sorry. Senator.

I am not familiar with the initiatives, in entirety, and I would appreciate if I can get back to the committee—

Senator UDALL. That would be great.

Ms. GUILARTE [continuing]. On your question.

Senator UDALL. If you could—

Ms. GUILARTE. Yes.

Senator UDALL. If you could answer that for the record, that would be terrific.

Ms. GUILARTE. I will.

Senator UDALL. Thank you very much.

Assistant Secretary Haverkamp, in 2013 President Obama issued an Executive order on combating wildlife trafficking, with some specific actions for the United States to take. Can you describe in more detail what the United States is doing to combat wildlife trafficking, and how the State Department is working to address these efforts?

Ms. HAVERKAMP. Thank you very much, Senator Udall, for that question.

Wildlife trafficking is a real scourge. And it is a problem, not just for the obvious reasons of the elimination of some iconic species, but it is also an economic problem for countries that depend on tourism. It is a national security problem because of the involvement of organized crime and extreme elements. It is also clearly a biodiversity concern. And it is, frankly, a health problem because of the potential for these illegally traded species to transmit diseases that affect people.

As you noted, the President has led this initiative. Recently, an implementation plan was released, where the Department of State, including the Bureau that I hope to lead, has a key role, in partnership with the Department of Interior and the Department of Justice. The focus that I would see having under this initiative is especially in the areas of public education, so that people are less likely to demand these products, and in the areas of enforcement, as well. Enforcement is an especially important concern for OES. There is a network of wildlife enforcement networks that OES has helped establish around the world, and I would be very interested in expanding that and helping to establish additional networks around the globe.

Thank you.

Senator UDALL. Thank you.

My home State of New Mexico is the world's—has the world's first commercial spaceport and two national laboratories. So, my State appreciates the role of science—that science and technology play in protecting American security and providing economic opportunities. What are OES's main priorities with regards to space policy and science and technology cooperation?

Ms. HAVERKAMP. Thank you for that question.

In the area of space, in particular, the President, in 2010, produced a national space policy; and OES's work is consistent with and in furtherance of that policy. Key among that is the promotion of commercial space activities, including the work on Spaceport America that could contribute to expanding the opportunities for space transportation.

Also, OES has an important diplomatic role in working with other countries to do things such as address space debris so that it is safer to have increased space travel, working, as I said, in expanding the opportunities for commercial use of space and also working with other countries on things like the sustained funding of the International Space Station, that sort of thing. But, very much the role of the commercial entities, like Spaceport America, is something that we would like to see more of.

Senator UDALL. Yes, I appreciate that answer.

Executive Director Ocomy, it is my understanding that, in 2013, the African Development Bank approved a new 10-year strategy which will focus on economic growth plus operational priorities, including infrastructure development, regional integration, private-sector development, governments and—governance and accountability, and skills and technology. How would you assess the strategy?

Ms. OCCOMY. Thank you, Ranking Member Udall, for that question.

I understand that the strategy is going along. One thing that I would say is that the African Development Bank has a strong partnership with the United States. And part of carrying out its strategy is actually to support the United States with key initiatives, such as the Power Africa Initiative. The Power Africa Initiative is designed to increase electricity access across Africa, which is a key priority for the African Development Bank, and it is a key directive, in terms of implementing one of the core parts of the strategy.

Again, if confirmed, I will make every effort to work with the African Development Bank to effectively implement its strategy and to make sure that the elements and the initiatives that are implemented are in line with U.S. interests, particularly U.S. economic and security interests in Africa.

Senator UDALL. Appreciate that answer.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator BARRASSO. Senator Gardner.

Senator GARDNER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thanks for holding this hearing today. And thanks, to all the witnesses, for being here, and your families, as well. Thank you for your willingness to serve this country.

To Mr. Egan, just a couple of quick questions. Last week, we had a hearing before the East Asia Subcommittee, which also now addresses cyber issues. So, just a couple of questions on cyber. How do you envision your office interacting with Chris Painter's office as the Coordinator for Cyber Issues?

Mr. EGAN. Thank you, Senator.

I think that the issues of cybersecurity, cyber defense, are increasingly important, both as a policy matter—as you know, Chris Painter's office is deeply involved in international fora related to those issues—but also as a legal matter. I think you can look back to some remarks that my predecessor—hopeful predecessor—the Legal Adviser, Harold Koh, gave in 2012, where he kind of laid out the framework for how we would think about cyber activities from an international legal perspective. And I would anticipate, if I were confirmed by this committee and by the Congress, working very closely with Chris—and others at the State Department—to help further develop those rules in the interests of our own national security.

Senator GARDNER. Thank you.

And the Sony cyber attack carried out by North Korea was described by the President as an act of cyber vandalism and not cyber terrorism. In your legal opinion, where do you cross the line between cyber vandalism and cyber terrorism?

Mr. EGAN. Thank you, Senator.

An important legal question that came up in the context—would come up in the context of Sony or some future event is whether we would consider an act in cyber space a use of force, where the responses to use of force would apply. And considering a question such as that, I think we would look to the effects of the act. Did it result in death, destruction of significant amounts of property, and other similarly serious acts? I think it is hard to kind of speculate in the abstract, but those are the types of factors that I would anticipate looking to in addressing a question like yours.

Senator GARDNER. Thank you.

And, to Ms. Haverkamp, the United States assumed the chairmanship of the Arctic Council in 2015. How do you assess our viability in working effectively with Russia, given that nation's aggression in Ukraine and increased military activity in the Arctic?

Ms. HAVERKAMP. Thank you very much for that question, Senator.

In the Arctic Council, this is an entity that the United States helped create many years ago. It operates by consensus among the countries that all have territory north of the Arctic Circle. Russia has been a part of that process for a very long time. And, while the United States has very significant problems with some aspects—significant aspects of Russia's policy, so far in the Arctic Council, their interests seem to have been to work together with the other countries of that region.

Senator GARDNER. So, you do not, at this point, see Russia's policies as an obstacle to United States Arctic policies or objectives in the region?

Ms. HAVERKAMP. The agenda that the United States has put forward for its chairmanship is one that the other countries had to agree to by consensus. And so, Russia has joined that consensus in the objectives of Arctic Ocean stewardship, safety, and security; protecting the health and economic well-being of the Arctic peoples; and addressing the concerns of climate change in that region.

Senator GARDNER. So, when it comes to the Arctic, Russia is living by the terms of the agreement, or at least what we believe the agreement to be?

Ms. HAVERKAMP. Well, the U.S. chairmanship just began last month. And so, I think—my understanding is that people are hopeful. But, it may be too early to tell.

Senator GARDNER. Thank you.

And I am going to—may need help with the last name. Is it Mr. Sabharwal? Very good. One of the primary tasks facing the International Monetary Fund is stabilizing the economies of two European nations: Greece and Ukraine. The next 1.5 billion dollar—billion Euro—excuse me—billion Euro payment from Greece to the IMF next month—will Greece be able to make the payment, or are we heading toward default?

Mr. SABHARWAL. Thank you for the question, Senator Gardner.

As you know, when the IMF stepped into Greece, back in 2010, there was serious risk of contagion effect. And whilst Greece perhaps is a small percentage, in terms of GDP, of the European and the global economy, it was critical that it steps in at that time, together with the other institutions, the European Central Bank and the European Commission.

Greece was supposed to, and did, make a payment in full last week. And thereby, this week—this actually opened the doors for a new set of discussions later on, taking place this week in Latvia, where we do not refer to them as a troika anymore, because the Greeks do not like that word. We—the institutions—the ECB, the European Commission, and the fund—are discussing a way forward so that Greece is able to make the payments, not just in June, but also in July and August. Of course, I am not at the fund at this point, I am not in the administration. But, from what I understand, the parties intend, including Chancellor Merkel, who wishes that Greece stays in the eurozone, the institutions, and, after, let us say, about a month of pause in dialogue, everybody is back at the table. So, we do believe there will be a constructive resolution here.

Senator GARDNER. Obviously, one of the other important issues that—I mentioned Ukraine. Just yesterday, the United States Government signed a $1 billion loan guarantee for Ukraine. On March 11, the IMF approved a $17.5 billion loan payment to assist the Government of Ukraine. Recently, I met with Finance Minister Natalie Yuresko, and she had assured me that Ukraine is on a path to economic reform that would satisfy both the needs and requirements of the United States Government and other international creditors.

Do you share in this view?

Mr. SABHARWAL. Thank you for the question.

So, Ukraine and that part of the world is relatively close to me, because I spent part of my life growing up there. And if you think—wind the clock back 20 years, 23 years, to the origin of Ukraine's independence, it really—what has happened, one bad economic policy and one less-than-adequate government followed another for 20-plus years. Actually, Natalie is someone who, when I was at the EBRD, she was actually working for one of the venture funds that we were supporting at the time. So, it is great to see actually someone so knowledgeable about the region coming from the private sector, being in the position that she is right now.

To answer your question, the IMF had identified about a $40 billion need at Ukraine as a need to get into a financial and stable footing. Part of that 17 and a half billion is coming from the IMF; part of it from other institutions. And, of course, there is kind of a debt overhang in Ukraine, which I understand that the parties are in discussion as to how to manage that. As long as those discussions are ongoing, the fund will continue to be—proactively support Ukraine with its program. From what I understand, there is actually a team on the ground right now, a fund team on the ground. And the initial indications are that—whilst the issues are difficult, that the program is on track.

Senator GARDNER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator BARRASSO. Thank you, Senator Gardner.

Senator Murphy.

Senator MURPHY. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Welcome, to all of our nominees. I wish you good speed in your confirmation process.

I wanted to pick up where Senator Gardner left off, Mr. Sabharwal, to talk a little bit more about Ukraine. I am glad to know that you have some expertise, or at least some familiarity, with the region.

So, you know, it is always struck me that our policy on economic assistance to Ukraine is anchored in the theater of the absurd. We are giving them loan guarantees, we are partnering with the IMF and other creditors to extend loans with fairly high spreads to them. This is in the midst of an invasion of their country. We are forcing them to make very painful—very necessary, but very painful reforms in exchange for this money. It sort of strikes me as if your neighbor's house is on fire, and, instead of just delivering them the bucket of water, you sit and negotiate with them for a period of hours on the terms for the repayment of that water, instead of just putting the fire out.

And so, I wanted to talk to you for a moment about this issue of debt reduction. Larry Summers just wrote a column, in which he said that the case for debt reduction with respect to Ukraine is, “as strong as any I have encountered in the past quarter century.” And it strikes me as incredibly reasonable that the United States should be playing a leading role in working with Ukraine’s creditors for a writedown of their debt, given the fact that they are in the middle of a war in the eastern section of their country, and that—they have, frankly, undertaken reforms already that are quite impressive in scope and dwarf reforms that have been undertaken in prior administrations.

So, I just wanted to get your sense of what you thought the importance of debt reduction was, as part of the strategy moving forward for Ukraine, and what role you see United States representation as part of the IMF infrastructure playing in that conversation.

Mr. SABHARWAL. Thank you for the question.

As I mentioned before, the identified gap of financing in Ukraine, from what I understand, is around $40 billion. Part of that is filled with the IMF facility of 17 and a half. And, in that, about one-five—15 million—billion is to come from, let us call it—whether it is a restructuring of the private-sector debt, maybe lengthening the maturity, a combination, lowering of interest rates. There could be a number of ways that the Government of Ukraine can achieve that, vis-a-vis its private-sector lenders.

I believe that the fund does not directly engage in the negotiations between the Ukrainian Government and the private-sector bondholders, but I do believe that the position of the Treasury and the position of the fund would be an encouragement—a strong encouragement of Ukrainian government to be at the table, continue good-faith negotiations with the private-sector lenders. And, whilst those are actually ongoing, the fund can continue with its program and continue to fund Ukraine as it tries to come out of its economic difficulties.

So, in summary, I would say the position would be of support, both from the Treasury—significant support—and the fund, but not a direct engagement of negotiations between two parties.

Senator MURPHY. Thank you for the answer to the question. I mean, I do not think that Ukraine, at this point, is largely the problem. My understanding is that it is the private creditors that are, right now, refusing to engage in a constructive process about debt reduction. And so, I would just counsel for a—if that is, indeed, the policy, that the IMF and our representation at the IMF is not going to get in the business of trying to unmask the fact that many of these creditors are refusing to engage in constructive conversations about debt reduction, I would, frankly, hope that we would have a little bit more active presence and participation, given that it is our money at risk. The United States has made loan guarantees. We have exposure here. And, to an even more important degree, if we do not unravel the economic mess in Ukraine, which I think debt reduction is a big part of, then the world’s security is at risk. That is not necessarily the IMF's responsibility, but it is certainly a U.S. interest.

Mr. SABHARWAL. Thank you very much, Senator.

I have taken note. And, if confirmed, I will take up the matter within Treasury and at the fund, itself.

Senator MURPHY. Mr. Egan, I just wanted to just build on some questions you were getting from Senator Corker. As you know, there is a deep disagreement between many of us in the administration on this interpretation of whether the existing AUMF covers ISIL. I certainly do not believe that it does. I think it is a strain, a reach of pretty incredible proportions. And part of our worry is that we are not sure where this rationale ends, that if ISIL is included under the umbrella of an authorization of al-Qaeda, then what about all of the other groups that are, as we speak, pledging allegiance to al-Qaeda? Does that mean that the 2001 AUMF lives on forever, in that any group in any part of the country can find itself now a subject of U.S. force simply because it has aligned itself with ISIS?

Can you share a little bit as to what you believe the tests are right now as to how this new doctrine of interpretation that the administration is using of the 2001 AUMF plays out with respect to these groups around the world who have pledged allegiance to ISIL?

Mr. EGAN. Yes. Thank you, Senator, for the question.

I think the administration's test as to whether a group is an associated force of al-Qaeda is something that has been talked about for a number of years. And that is, if a group is an organized, armed group that has joined the fight against the U.S. or coalition partners alongside of al-Qaeda, a group could be considered an associated force of al-Qaeda.

You are correct that our view on ISIL is different.

Senator MURPHY. But, this is different, because this is not an associated force of al-Qaeda. This is now an associated force of ISIS.

Mr. EGAN. The way that I would think about it, at least, is that they are a successor to Al Qaeda in Iraq. They are, in fact, the group that was formerly known as Al Qaeda in Iraq, which is what our intelligence community would say. They are, in fact, al-Qaeda's longest affiliate, going back to the early 2000s. And I think if you look at the facts behind ISIS and their history, ISIL—ISIS and their history, they are probably uniquely situated, and it is hard to see another group that would fit the bill as they did, a group that we were fighting against, going back several years, that continued to fight us, that believes that they are the true successors to Osama bin Laden. There just are not other groups out there that I am aware of that would fit that bill.

Senator MURPHY. And I would just hope that you will help us understand some of the terminology that is being used today. In the administration's proposed AUMF, they suggest that "associated forces" will be those that are engaged in hostilities against the United States or our coalition partners. Well, because ISIS now has, arguably, roots in almost every corner of the world, and we have coalition partners in every corner of the world, you can see a definition by which even Boko Haram, if it is engaged in hostilities against a group that—against a country which is a coalition partner, now all of a sudden falls under an authorization that was intended for a very different group.

And so, I think many of us are worried about the—not the 2000 AUMF authorization, in and of itself, but this new authorization that is proposed, and how big and unwieldy it could become. I look forward to working with you on some of those very tricky questions.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Senator BARRASSO. Thank you very much, Senator Murphy.

Just to follow up, Mr. Egan, a couple of things, in terms of treaties, executive actions, where it all fits in. The Senate has passed a bipartisan piece of legislation for the Iranian deal to make sure that the Senate has an opportunity to review that, not at the treaty level, which is a 67, but as a—more of a disapproval motion, and then whether that is vetoed. So, how do you see these differences, in terms of treaty and just a disapproval motion? And what qualifies for what?

Mr. EGAN. Thank you for your question, Mr. Chairman.

If I were confirmed, I think working with this committee on issues involving treaties, executive agreements, political commitments is one of what I would consider to be my most important responsibilities. I think that administrations from both parties have had a history of working with the Congress to identify agreements that would be treaties subject to the treaty clause in the constitution, other agreements that would be Executive agreements, and then political commitments of the type that the Iran deal is intended to be. And so, working through the nuances and making sure that this committee and the Congress understands how the administration is approaching a particular negotiation, I think, is one of the more important responsibilities I would take on if I were confirmed as Legal Adviser.

Senator BARRASSO. Yes. I mean, because the United States and other nations are attempting to negotiate an agreement on international climate later this year. And so, I wonder what conditions or provisions in a new climate change agreement would require advice and consent of the Senate, which would not, and, you know, will you commit to sending any new agreement for the Senate for advise and consent?

Mr. EGAN. Senator, I think each agreement would have to be looked at in each negotiation kind of on its facts. And I think Secretary Kerry, in his testimony before this committee, has identified a number of the facts that would be relevant to whether an agreement should be considered a treaty, an Executive agreement, or a nonbinding commitment. And I am not intimately familiar with the facts behind the climate negotiations, but I would commit to working with this committee to make sure that you were informed of the status of those discussions so that you could have an informed view on the nature of the arrangement being negotiated.

Senator BARRASSO. Thank you.

Ms. Haverkamp, the United States is currently participating in this climate negotiation, or will be soon, with the goal of reaching an agreement at the end of the year. Will you commit to ensuring that any new agreement the administration reaches internationally on climate change is brought to the Senate for advise and consent?

Ms. HAVERKAMP. Thank you for the question, Mr. Chairman.

My understanding of the status of the negotiations is that they are still at a fairly early stage, and focused primarily on what the substance of the agreement would be, and not yet really on the form. So, it is too early, I think, to say what might happen.

I do know that the mandate that the countries are negotiating under is one that creates a real opportunity for the United States, which is to create an agreement that involves contributions from all countries, not just the developed countries, which has been the case in the past. But, what form those contributions or commitments might take is something that has not yet been decided. The mandate gives countries a lot of flexibility in what type of decisions or agreements might come out of Paris.

Senator BARRASSO. And then, what role would you personally be playing in these negotiations, if you are confirmed, in terms of the climate change conference and the negotiations?

Ms. HAVERKAMP. As I believe you know, the lead for the U.N. climate negotiations at the Department of State is the Special Envoy, Todd Stern. And his office leads those negotiations. I would anticipate cooperating and collaborating with his office—

Senator BARRASSO. But, would he report to you? I mean, I am trying to get the pecking order.

Ms. HAVERKAMP. He reports to Secretary Kerry.

Senator BARRASSO. And you are not in that chain.

Ms. HAVERKAMP. Well, the—

Senator BARRASSO. You would not be, if confirmed, in the chain.

Ms. HAVERKAMP [continuing]. The arrangement is that there is a significant office within the Bureau that I would head, which is the Office of Global Change, and which provides a lot of the staff support, you might even say “the backbone” of technical expertise, to the Special Envoy’s team. And there is a role that that group plays, in terms of the negotiations, in terms of technical expertise, and also in overseeing some of the adaptation foreign assistance funding that the Department provides.

Senator BARRASSO. It seems to me there is some duplication of climate change resources at the State Department. And so, I would ask, Are you committed to eliminating duplication and redundancies at the State Department? You know, I am trying to figure out, How does the Office of Climate Change in the Bureau interact with the Office of Special Climate Envoy? It does seem, I think, to a lot of taxpayers, as duplicate use of taxpayer dollars, at this point.

Ms. HAVERKAMP. Senator, I certainly embrace the idea of the Department using taxpayer dollars efficiently and effectively. And, if I am confirmed, I would take a very close look at that.

Looking more broadly at the question of Special Representatives and Special Envoys, it does seem that there are certainly times when an issue is of a certain priority or urgency, such as the U.S. chairmanship of the Arctic Council, which calls for bringing in a special office to lead that particular effort. Another example is the Ebola crisis, where the State Department created a Special Representative for Ebola, and that office has just recently been dismantled, and then some of that work brought back to OES.

Senator BARRASSO. Thank you.

Ms. Occomy, the African Development Bank's goal is to promote economic growth, reduce poverty in 53 African member countries. The U.S. Director should support, I believe, low-cost, dependable energy sources as a means to help countries spur economic growth. Now, these nations include some of the poorest countries in the world. African countries have substantial fossil fuel resources, including oil, coal, and natural gas. Do you believe the African Development Bank should end all financing for projects dealing with fossil fuels?

Ms. OCCOMY. Thank you, Chairman, for that question.

As you know, Africa has vast needs. And promoting access to affordable, reliable, efficient energy infrastructure and resources is actually a major focus of the African Development Bank, which includes projects related to coal, natural gas, and oil. If confirmed, I would vote in favor of projects that are consistent with U.S. policies and laws and are within the African Development Bank's operating guidelines.

You know, what is really interesting is that the administration's policies recognize the unique needs of the poorest countries, including those in African, and, as such, supports the United States to be in favor of coal power generation plant projects, but under certain conditions whereby, you know, those projects promote the most efficient coal technologies and—in the poorest countries without, you know, economically viable alternatives.

So, in essence, you know, the African Development Bank has been long committed to addressing the electricity access needs across African. And a demonstration of that is the Bank's strong collaboration with the United States in the Power Africa Initiative. So, if confirmed, I will continue to support and to promote the strong collaboration between the United States and the African Development Bank, and in the consideration of, you know, reliable, affordable energy infrastructure and services projects to help address the electricity needs across Africa, particularly sub-Saharan Africa.

Senator BARRASSO. Thank you.

Senator Markey.

Senator MARKEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, very much.

So, Mr. Egan, can you outline what you do believe are the limits—again, in terms of the use of the Authorization for the Use of Military Force that was passed in 2001, in terms of the President's inherent ability to use it to engage affiliates of ISIS, ISIL, or other groups? I mean, Senator Murphy asked about Boko Haram. Can you envision a situation where that would be something that could be justified as having been authorized under the 2001 authorization?

Mr. EGAN. Thank you, Senator.

I think the limits of the existing 2001 authorization are that it authorizes the use of military force against al-Qaeda, the Taliban, and their associated forces. And I think "associated forces" is an important limitation. It is not enough for a group to declare their affiliation with al-Qaeda in order to be covered by the authorization. They actually have to be, in international law terms, a co-belligerent with al-Qaeda. They—

Senator MARKEY. What is the phrase?

Mr. EGAN. A cobelligerent, sir. So, somebody who, for example, posts on the Internet their agreement with al-Qaeda, that would not, in and of itself, be enough to come within the AUMF. But, there has to be some degree of organizational affiliation between the two groups for the 2001 AUMF to apply.

Senator MARKEY. Okay. Are there any geographical limits?

Mr. EGAN. No, Senator, not in the existing 2001 AUMF.

Senator MARKEY. Yes. So, any group that could meet the test that you laid out, regardless of their geographical proximity to Afghanistan, could, in fact, be covered, in terms of the deployment of U.S. forces.

Mr. EGAN. I think that that is true, Senator, although I think that, if you look at the administration's history of its reliance on the 2001 AUMF, the groups against whom we have used that authority have been fairly limited, although I recognize this committee's and the Congress' questions about our use of the authority against ISIL.

Senator MARKEY. Yes.

So, Ms. Haverkamp, on climate change, I think there is big breakthrough that occurred between this administration and China. And I give you a lot of credit for that. Just a huge moment in history. As you are looking forward to Paris, do you see some additional opportunities to foster cooperation in a way that can advance our goals of reducing the dangerous greenhouse gases that are being sent up into the atmosphere?

Ms. HAVERKAMP. Thank you very much for that question, Senator.

While much of the attention is focused on Paris, and that is a very important forum for making advances on climate change, there are other fora where progress can and needs to be made. One very important one this year is the Montreal Protocol, where there has been significant progress recently on countries agreeing to try to address HFCs, which is a potent greenhouse gas, in that forum. And if I were confirmed, I would want very much to be part of the effort to get agreement by the end of this year, in the Montreal Protocol, on adding HFCs to its mandate and working toward the elimination of them.

Senator MARKEY. Secretary Kerry has done a great job in focusing upon illegal fishing. How do you see your role in furthering that agenda to make sure that we are stamping out illegal fishing around the world?

Ms. HAVERKAMP. Thank you for asking. That is a really important part of the mandate of the State Department and the responsibilities of the Bureau I would hope to lead.

As you know well, something like a billion people around the world depend on the oceans for the protein in their diets. And many, many people depend on the fishing industry for their livelihoods. Illegal, unreported, unregulated fishing is a very big problem. And there is a Presidential task force on that, which the State Department cochairs with NOAA. I would hope very much to be part of the efforts of implementing the work of that task force, which includes ramping up enforcement, educating people, expanding partnerships with other countries, and developing, for the United States, a traceability program.

Along those lines, I know the folks at the State Department are very pleased that this committee gave its advice and consent to the Port State Measures Agreement, which is an important aspect of addressing this problem. And I understand that tomorrow there may even be markup of implementing legislation for that and other fisheries agreements, which I very much consider important progress in addressing these issues. And, if confirmed, I would very much want to make that one of my priorities.

Senator MARKEY. Yes. And, you know, on the question of exportation of American natural gas, there is no question that the more of that that we do is—the harder it is going to be to meet our greenhouse gas objectives in the United States, because it is going to drive up the price of natural gas here and, as a result, make coal much more affordable here in the United States for utilities to be burning. So, it is going to run totally contrary to the goals that we are going to set, going forward. The Energy Information Agency said that there could be a 50-percent rise in the price of natural gas here domestically if we export all the natural gas that the Department of Energy is now approving for its export. So, that is just going to really drive a stake into our ability to be able to meet the promises that we are going to be making.

And sometimes I think we forget that we should also be focusing on exporting of energy efficiency technologies overseas. The Ukraine, for example, is the second least efficient energy-efficient country in the world. Only Uzbekistan is less energy efficient. So, if they just reached Poland's level of efficiency, they would back out all of their imported natural gas. And I think sometimes we do a disservice to these countries by not first focusing upon energy efficiency and promising them the larger projects that ignore the easy gains that they can make if they, in fact, use energy efficiency in a much more expansive way.

So, I thank you, Mr. Chairman, very much.

Senator BARRASSO. Well, thank you very much, Senator Markey.

Ms. Haverkamp, November 30, 2012, you wrote a blog at the Environmental Defense Fund stating, "The agriculture sector, itself, contributes a substantial share of the emissions that cause climate change, often in the form of powerful greenhouse gases like methane and nitrous oxide." In the same blog, you say, "The major emitters' paucity of vision, ambition, and urgency, has brought us to the brink of catastrophe."

How has the American farmers, who you state are responsible for, "a substantial share of the emissions that cause climate change" brought us, as you say, "to the brink of catastrophe"?

Ms. HAVERKAMP. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The factors that contribute to climate change are many. But, the land-use sector is a major contributor, especially in developing countries. And that includes deforestation, it includes overuse of fertilizers, it includes, frankly, a fair amount of methane from rice production around the world. So, I think that that is a concern that is a worldwide concern, not just one that would affect American farmers. And when I was at Environmental Defense Fund, one of the things I worked on was addressing deforestation and helping rural farmers in India and Vietnam with finding low-carbon ways to improve their agricultural practices.

Senator BARRASSO. So, from 2011 to 2014, you were director of the International Climate Program at the Environmental Defense Fund. While in that position, you wrote another blog post stating, “One of Doha’s notable developments was that, for the first time, the talks broached the subject of compensation from rich countries for the loss and damage incurred by the most vulnerable nations due to climate change.” You went on to say, “The sobering reality is that grappling with the dangerous effects of climate change can no longer be put off to some future date. They are already inflicting harm.”

So, do you believe U.S. taxpayers owe millions of dollars, if not more, in climate reparations to small developing nations?

Ms. HAVERKAMP. No, Senator, I do not. And the issue of loss and damage in the U.N. climate negotiations is one that does not need to be put in that box. And my understanding, though I am not close to the negotiations currently, is that it is in the adaptation context, in helping countries to adapt to significant effects of climate change that are coming, and some of which are already here.

Senator BARRASSO. But, when you said, “The dangerous effects of climate change can no longer be put off. They are inflicting harm.” You blame the agriculture sector, contributing a substantial share of the emissions. So, you talk about rich countries, like the United States, owing money to developing countries, in the form of climate reparations. So, a good—it sounds like you believe American agriculture is partially to blame for climate change. As the poultry growers in Delaware, cotton farmers, Tennessee, cattle ranchers in Wyoming—are they responsible? Do they owe money for the loss and damage that they have, under, you know, your phraseology, “inflicted on developing nations” because of climate change?

Ms. HAVERKAMP. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that owing reparations is part of what I was talking about. I believe that the agricultural sector can contribute in a very positive way to addressing climate change. And there are many opportunities, frankly, to help agriculture farm more efficiently if they are able to use more targeted fertilizer or, for example, again, with rice, use less water, so that there is less methane produced from the rotting of the submerged vegetation. I think that one reason that climate change is a profound challenge is that there are so many different contributions to the problem, and there are not easy solutions. It is something that requires a lot of effort and contributions from everyone

Senator BARRASSO. Thank you.

Ms. OCCOMY, in your testimony, you committed to being a good steward of U.S. financial contributions to the bank. And we agree. It is critically important U.S. resources are used in a responsible and efficient manner. So, do you believe requiring borrowers—people that come to the bank to borrow money—that they accept higher-cost energy projects, in terms of only being able to borrow for costs for energy projects that are approved by some people that have a specific position, from a climate change standpoint—do you believe requiring borrowers to accept high-cost energy projects is a responsible use of taxpayer dollars when affordable, reliable alternatives are readily available?

Ms. OCCOMY. Thank you, Chairman Barrasso, for that question.

Again, you know, a major focus of the work of the African Development Bank is to promote access to modern, reliable, efficient energy services and infrastructure.

Senator BARRASSO. Even if it is more expensive. I mean, that is the question. Is modern, newer, not been around for thousands of years under the ground, but something built up and——

Ms. OCCOMY. Absolutely. When a project comes before us to review and to consider the U.S.'s determination as to whether to support that project, it is important to look actually at the full lifecycle costs. Sometimes there may be higher costs up front relating to implementing a modern, more efficient form of energy. But, over the lifecycle of the project, it should not be higher. So, I think it is important, not necessary to look just at the upfront investment costs, which seem to be higher, but to look at the full lifecycle costs of the project and to take that into consideration, and also to look at, generally speaking, potential environmental and social costs associated with not implementing a more modern, efficient, reliable source of energy.

So, I think it is important, you know, not just to look solely at perhaps higher costs up front, but to look at the full lifecycle costs of the project, the environmental, social costs, and so forth.

Senator BARRASSO. So, the social cost of carbon, the lifecycle of the project—in my multiple trips to Africa, people wanted affordable—first, they wanted electricity. They wanted electricity. I mean, it is an astonishing thing, as you travel to these areas that just completely go dark at night, due to lack of electricity. They want affordable energy today. And I do not think any of the many, many people I visited in so many communities give any consideration to the lifecycle cost of the project or the social cost of the project. And they believe—and I agree with them—that their lives could be made so much better with available electricity, affordable electricity today.

And I just—so, I think about this, and I think that—you know, should the economic feasibility, the potential to provide maximum access to energy with maximum efficiency, not be the biggest factors when evaluating projects to get electricity that is affordable to those people today? Is that not the thing that could actually help so many people worldwide, in terms of the long-term—you talk about lifecycle—I am talking about their life, that lifecycle of that individual, of that human being, who views the whole thing as their lifecycle, not some investment project lifecycle.

Ms. OCCOMY. Thank you, Chairman.

You know, as I stated earlier, the administration's policies do recognize that there are unique needs for the poorest countries, particularly those in Africa. And taking that into consideration, under certain administration policies, the United States can vote in favor of coal power generation plants if it is—under certain conditions, if the project promotes more efficient coal technologies and there is no other economically viable alternative.

So, I think the criterion really is, you know, looking at all of the alternative approaches to address the energy needs, particularly for the poorest countries, and then to figure out, What is the most economically viable alternative to address that need? So——

But, the United States can support coal projects in consideration of the current policies.

Senator BARRASSO. You know, I just recently learned that the African Development Bank—because you mentioned the word “voting” and how you can vote—and I learned that the bank is actually having elections for the new president, I think, in a couple of weeks. I do not even know how that is structured. Could you kind of run through that for me?

Ms. OCCOMY. Yes. Thank you for raising that point.

I welcome the African Development Bank’s open, transparent, merit-based process for selecting a president. The bank will be selecting a president on May 28 at its annual meeting of eight candidates who have been put forth by their countries. I am not aware of who the United States is supporting of the eight candidates. But, if confirmed, I look forward to working with the newly elected president to implement his or her’s vision for the African Development Bank, going forward.

Senator BARRASSO. So, is it an annual—you said at their annual meeting they are going to do this, of the eight candidates. Is it for a 1-year term, and they are just trying to figure out how—

Ms. OCCOMY. Right. Oh, I am sorry.

Senator BARRASSO [continuing]. How we decide how that—

Ms. OCCOMY. Right.

Senator BARRASSO [continuing]. How we vote for—

Ms. OCCOMY. Right. So, at the annual meeting, the president is elected. And this is after a very deliberative process, where the candidates have put forth their positions at different venues. In fact, they were here at the spring meetings for the World Bank and the IMF, and there was a side meeting where they presented their candidacies and agenda—you know, agendas for those in the international development community. So, in general, it is a very open, you know, transparent, merit-based process.

The—excuse me—the term of the president, I believe, is for 4 years. And that term can be—he can—he or she—

Senator BARRASSO. Right.

Ms. OCCOMY [continuing]. Can be reelected—

Senator BARRASSO. Run for—

Ms. OCCOMY [continuing]. For another term.

Senator BARRASSO. Yes.

Ms. OCCOMY. And so, President Kaberuka, the end of his second term—

Senator BARRASSO. Oh, so—that is right, it is—

Ms. OCCOMY [continuing]. Is coming up.

Senator BARRASSO [continuing]. Open now to—

Ms. OCCOMY. And so, now that is why—

Senator BARRASSO [continuing]. Eight people.

Ms. OCCOMY [continuing]. They are electing a new president.

Senator BARRASSO. Good.

Thank you. Thank you. That helps clarify.

Mr. Sabharwal, a quick question for you. I think Senator Gardner asked you about Greece being able to make the recent 750 million euro payment, almost defaulted. They have another payment due in June. You know, I would ask if you would talk a little bit more about that, what the impact of a default would be, how effective this International Monetary Fund's program is in Greece, and what is the argument for having the IMF continue to loan more money to Greece, you know, given the situation.

Mr. SABHARWAL. Okay. Thank you for the question, Mr. Chairman. So, there are multiple questions there.

First of all, the significance of putting this policy in place was, of course, the contagion effect that was going to be significantly affecting the eurozone, which, in turn, as one of our major trading partners, going to affect the U.S. economy.

The second point I would make, that, as a percentage of total financing from the institutions, the IMF's share has actually decreased from about 26 percent, when it was put in place, to about 17 percent today. That is because of the different, kind of, repayment terms that there are between the IMF and the other institutions that are part of the package, the ECP and the European Commission.

We are encouraged that the discussions and negotiations are ongoing between the other parties. There was a period when there were no discussions, no constructive dialogue. But, we think that that period has passed. We are looking at meetings taking place later on this week in Latvia on the matter, and we believe that a resolution will be reached that will enable Greece to pay its obligations to the IMF as they come due. The IMF has really never lost money, so it has always been in a position that perhaps some nations have fallen into arrears for a period of time—for instance, Liberia—but they have recovered very successfully. So, we are fully confident that the discussions between the institutions and Greece will be successful.

Senator BARRASSO. Thank you.

Senator Udall, additional questions?

Senator UDALL. I would submit most of my—the rest of my questions for the record and just thank the witnesses, and thank their families for the very supportive role that they play.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator BARRASSO. And you make an excellent point there.

We thank each of you for your testimony, your willingness to serve our Nation. It is my hope each of you will be dedicated to advancing American interests all across the globe.

Members of the committee will have an opportunity, until the close of business on Thursday the 21st, to submit questions for the record. We ask you try to respond promptly in writing to the committee in order your nomination to be considered in a timely manner.

Thank you very much. Congratulations, again.

Hearing is adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 4:20 p.m., the hearing was adjourned.]

ADDITIONAL MATERIAL SUBMITTED FOR THE RECORD

RESPONSES OF MILEYDI GUILARTE, NOMINATED TO BE U.S. ALTERNATE EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF THE INTER-AMERICAN DEVELOPMENT BANK, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

DIRECTOR-DESIGNATE GUILARTE'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR BARRASSO

Question. What are the Inter-American Development Bank's relative strengths compared to the other international financial institutions? In what areas does the Inter-American Development Bank have a comparative advantage?

Answer. As a regional development bank, the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) has a sole focus on Latin America and the Caribbean, and its breadth and depth of knowledge of the economic, social, and political dynamics of the region and its borrowing member countries is its main relative strength. It has offices in every one of its borrowing member countries to ensure continuous policy dialogue and supervision of its projects. The IDB has developed broad-based sectoral/thematic comparative advantage in infrastructure, particularly energy; citizen security; and social sector development, including conditional cash transfer programs. The IDB also effectively works across countries on regional initiatives, including customs and trade facilitation, and transport and energy infrastructure.

Question. In January 2015, Vice President Biden stated, "An integrated North America, working to promote energy security beyond our borders can be a major asset for the entire hemisphere. And it's profoundly in the self-interest of the United States to see the Caribbean countries succeed as prosperous, secure, energy-independent neighbors."

♦ How can the Inter-American Development Bank help support greater regional interconnection of energy markets and infrastructure?

Answer. The IDB has a number of ongoing programs that actively support greater regional interconnection of energy markets and energy infrastructure investment. With significant assistance from the IDB over many years, Central American governments recently succeeded in integrating their electricity markets through an initiative known as the Central American Electrical Interconnection System (SIEPAC). To achieve this success, the IDB, in cooperation with the United States, facilitated a dialogue in 2013 among Central American governments that resulted in a ministerial declaration outlining the governments' commitment to regional energy trade. And in November 2014, the Central American governments supported a Mesoamerican Energy Investment Summit in Guatemala that drew over 500 participants to highlight the investment potential in the region and to celebrate the completion of the SIEPAC transmission line. The IDB has also provided direct financing totaling $253.5 million and an additional $25 million in technical assistance to support Central America's energy infrastructure and to facilitate creating the regional energy market.

In addition to Central America, the IDB has been working with Andean countries on the Andean regional electric integration process. The IDB has provided a variety of technical assistance to help in this effort and is the technical secretary of the Andean Electrical Interconnection System (SINEA).

The IDB has done considerable work with the Caribbean to assess the potential of regional energy markets, including how best to develop and use sustainable sources of energy, such as natural gas and renewable energy sources.

Question. What steps is the Inter-American Development Bank currently taking to provide the region with energy security and diversification through natural gas?

Answer. The IDB is committed to financing reliable, low-cost generation in Latin America and the Caribbean. The IDB is helping many clients develop favorable policy and regulatory frameworks for energy access, in addition to support for the private sector to increase the use of efficient technologies.

Now that the SIEPAC is complete, thanks in large part to the efforts of the IDB, Central American economies are looking to introduce natural gas to substitute for heavy fuel and diesel generation in the coming years. To support that effort, the IDB has completed prefeasibility studies for natural gas in power generation in both Central America and the Caribbean, and is supporting analysis of some natural gas projects, including the proposed Mexican natural gas pipeline project with El Salvador, Honduras, and Guatemala.

Question. Do you believe that American liquefied natural gas exports would improve energy diversification in the Western Hemisphere and promote economic growth in the region?

Answer. Natural gas can be a useful part of a country's or region's energy diversification strategy like renewables and energy efficiency. As is the case for any energy infrastructure project, mobilizing the finance required to introduce natural gas into a given country requires open, transparent, and stable investment climates and appropriate legal, policy, and regulatory frameworks.

Question. What specific actions is the U.S. Government taking to work with the Inter-American Development Bank, the World Bank, the Organization of American States and American companies in coordinating efforts on cross-border trade in electricity, regional interconnection, and energy development?

Answer. Working with regional partners, including the IDB, the World Bank, and the Organization of American States (OAS), the United States is supporting the Connecting the Americas 2022 initiative (Connect 2022) under the Energy and Climate Partnership of the Americas (ECPA). The most recent meeting of the ECPA was hosted by the Mexican Government on May 25–26, 2015. Connect 2022 seeks to achieve universal access to electricity and create a business climate that accelerates interconnection and renewable energy. Connect 2022 coordinates technical assistance for regulatory and institutional reform, builds on extensive bilateral and subregional government efforts to connect grids and empower regional energy integration, supports IDB and World Bank power sector programs, and catalyzes private investment to promote greater access to cleaner and low-cost energy.

The administration's Central America strategy, as well as the Northern Triangle's Alliance for Prosperity—for which the IDB serves as Secretariat—also advance Central American energy security by emphasizing energy sector reform and development. In addition, President Obama, in his April 2015 visit to Panama for the Summit of the Americas, launched a new Central American and Caribbean Energy Security Task Force to help these smaller markets promote policies that attract private investment in lower carbon power sources and reduce their dependency on imported oil.

The U.S. Department of Commerce maintains an Office of Business Liaison in the IDB to work with the American business community to identify business opportunities, provide advice and counsel on strategies for approaching those opportunities, and advocate before the IDB and borrowing country governments on behalf of interested American businesses.

The IDB also hosts the Americas Business Dialogue (ABD), which serves as a platform for private sector entities in Latin America and the Caribbean to engage with governments on potential reforms, and which includes efforts to maximize the potential of the region's energy market as one of its four areas of focus.

Question. In 2012, the United States joined leaders of the Western Hemisphere in committing to an initiative called "Connecting the Americas 2022." The initiative aims to achieve universal access to electricity through enhanced electrical interconnection by 2022.

♦ What is the status of this initiative and what progress has been made in reaching the initiative's goals?

Answer. Working with regional partners, including the IDB, the World Bank, and the OAS, the United States is supporting the Connecting the Americas 2022 initiative (Connect 2022) under the ECPA. The most recent meeting of the ECPA was hosted by the Mexican Government on May 25–26, 2015. Connect 2022 seeks to achieve universal access to electricity and create a business climate that accelerates interconnection and renewable energy. Connect 2022 coordinates technical assistance for regulatory and institutional reform, builds on extensive bilateral and subregional government efforts to connect grids and empower regional energy integration, supports IDB and World Bank power sector programs, and catalyzes private investment to promote greater access to cleaner and low-cost energy.

Significant progress has been made in Central America, which has been a leader in furthering the Connect 2022 efforts. SIEPAC and the related regional transmission line, completed in September 2014, now connects six Central American countries from Guatemala to Panama and establishes a regional market.

In addition to Central America, the IDB and the United States have been working with Andean countries on the Andean Regional electric integration process. The IDB has provided a variety of technical assistance to help in this effort and is the technical secretary of SINEA.

Question. How is the Connecting the Americas 2022 complementing or adding to the work being done at Inter-American Development Bank?

Answer. The IDB has been a key partner in the Connect 2022 initiative, providing complementary support to the efforts of the United States. With significant assistance from the IDB over many years, Central American governments recently succeeded in integrating their electricity markets through the SIEPAC initiative. To achieve this success, the IDB, in cooperation with the United States, facilitated a dialogue in 2013 among Central American governments that resulted in a ministerial declaration outlining the governments' commitment to regional energy trade. And in November 2014, the Central American governments supported a Mesoamerican Energy Investment Summit in Guatemala that drew over 500 participants to highlight the investment potential in the region and to celebrate the completion of the SIEPAC transmission line. The IDB also has provided direct financing totaling $253.5 million and an additional $25 million in technical assistance to support Central America's energy infrastructure and to facilitate creating the regional energy market.

In addition to Central America, the IDB has been working with Andean countries on the Andean Regional electric integration process. The IDB has provided a variety of technical assistance to help in this effort and is the technical secretary of the SINEA.

The IDB has done considerable work with the Caribbean to assess the potential of regional energy markets, including how best to develop and use sustainable sources of energy such as natural gas and renewable energy sources.

Question. What kind of technical assistance and capacity-building programs is the United States providing to support the Connecting the Americas 2022 in Central America, the Caribbean, and the Andean region?

Answer. In collaboration with the IDB, the State Department and USAID are providing policy and technical assistance to improve regional electricity market development and trade in Central America. Additionally, the U.S. and Mexican Governments have been working with Guatemala on plans to pass through Mexican electricity and gas to benefit Central America as a whole.

In Chile and Peru, the State Department is working with utilities to assess interconnection options in support of connecting the Chilean and Andean electrical grids.

In the Caribbean, the U.S. Trade and Development Agency (USTDA) and the Overseas Private Investment Corporation (OPIC), in coordination with the State Department, USAID, and the Department of Energy, are launching a $20 million facility to encourage investment in clean energy projects in the region. The facility will provide early-stage funding to catalyze greater private and public sector investment in clean energy projects.

Question. The United States is the largest contributor to the Inter-American Development Bank. Regional developing countries are required to have a controlling majority vote at the Bank. A March 2013 report by the Inter-American Development Bank's Office of Evaluation and Oversight stated that the effectiveness of reforms has been limited. The report found that, "reforms face inherent tensions with the demand-driven orientation of the Bank, and approaches are needed that can help meaningfully identify where Bank capabilities and borrower demand intersect."

Please describe the steps you would take to improve the effectiveness of the reforms.

Answer. If confirmed, I would work closely with IDB Management and fellow Board members to follow up on the implementation of the recommendations from the 2013 Office of Evaluation and Oversight Report to improve and deepen the effectiveness of the reforms undertaken as part of the Ninth General Capital Increase of the IDB. Some examples of those reforms are the recently approved revision of the policy for the Independent Consultation and Investigation Mechanism, the IDB's grievance mechanism for people affected by IDB projects; the update of the IDB's macroeconomic sustainability assessments; the IDB Governors' approval of a reform to consolidate the IDB's private sector activities within one entity; and improvements to IDB's framework for measuring development effectiveness, including enhancing its project completion reports and the guidelines for country strategies. If confirmed, I will encourage the Office of Evaluation and Oversight to continue reporting independently on the status of reforms and seek full implementation of action plans from IDB Management to continue improving the effectiveness of those reforms.

Question. What reforms would be your top priority at the Inter-American Development Bank?

Answer. If confirmed, I would work to ensure that the consolidation of the private sector activities of the IDB is implemented in a way that enhances efficiency and improves development effectiveness. I would promote sound use of financial resources, including through adherence to capital adequacy policies and prudential limits. I would also work to further the IDB's results focus to improve the impact of IDB activities in addressing inequality and bolstering growth in a region that is critical to the national and economic security of the United States. Given the IDB's pivotal role as Secretariat for the Northern Triangle's Alliance for Prosperity, I would also work to ensure that U.S. national interests remain a priority through the administration's Central America strategy.

Question. Do you believe meaningful reforms can take place while borrower countries maintain a majority of the voting power?

Answer. Yes. I believe that a number of meaningful reforms have already taken place at the IDB, particularly in the context of the Ninth General Capital Increase. As the majority owners of the IDB, the borrowing member countries have a strong interest in ensuring that the IDB's resources are deployed effectively and efficiently to address the challenges in the region. If confirmed, I will seek to work with all shareholders, including the borrowing member countries, to further implement and deepen the reform agenda at the IDB.

RESPONSES OF JENNIFER ANN HAVERKAMP, NOMINATED TO BE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE FOR OCEANS AND INTERNATIONAL ENVIRONMENTAL AND SCIENTIFIC AFFAIRS, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

ASSISTANT SECRETARY-DESIGNATE HAVERKAMP'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR BARRASSO

Question. Are you committed to eliminating duplication and redundancies at the Department of State?

Answer. I strongly support using taxpayer funds in the most effective and efficient manner. In properly managing the Department's programs and resources, it is of fundamental importance to continually look for and implement ways to improve the economy, efficiency, and effectiveness of operations.

Question. In fiscal year 2014, what percentage of the work of the Bureau of Oceans and International Environment and Scientific Affairs involved international climate change? In fiscal year 2014, what percentage of the Bureau's funding was spent on international climate change programs?

Answer. My understanding is that approximately 14 percent of the Bureau's salaries and operating expenses in fiscal year 2014 involved international climate change. Approximately 78 percent of the Bureau's Fiscal Year 2014 Economic Support Fund (ESF) resources were allocated for adaptation, clean energy and sustainable landscapes programs.

Question. Please provide examples of specific projects funded by the Bureau for adaptation, clean energy, and sustainable landscapes in fiscal year 2014. What were the tangible results and impacts of the funding?

Answer. In the case of adaptation, my understanding is that the OES Bureau provides funding for two multilateral specialized adaptation funds, the Least Developed Countries Fund (LDCF) and the Special Climate Change Fund (SCCF), which support hard-won development gains in the face of climate variability and change. Examples include:

- ◆ In Nepal, the LDCF is providing community-based early flood warning to nearly 32,000 vulnerable people and reducing the risk of glacial lake outburst floods through artificial drainage.
- ◆ In Indonesia, the SCCF is strengthening the resilience of 40 rural communities by adjusting subsistence farming practices to be more resilient to variable and extreme climatic conditions and helping communities to improve water resources in the face of projected changes in rainfall patterns.
- ◆ In the Philippines, the SCCF is strengthening the resilience of vulnerable farming communities by stimulating private sector engagement in climate risk reduction, developing Weather Index Based Insurance and financial literacy training for farming households, preparing early warning system plans, and conducting vulnerability adaptation assessments.

In the case of clean energy, my understanding is that, with $20 million the OES Bureau has provided to the U.S.-Africa Clean Energy Finance Initiative (U.S.-

ACEF), to date, OPIC and USTDA expect to leverage a total of nearly $2 billion in investment to increase access to clean energy for Africa. The U.S.-ACEF program is designed to help promising clean energy projects develop into viable candidates for financing by providing small amounts of early-stage funding for essential inputs, such as technical and feasibility studies. U.S.-ACEF serves a catalytic role to advance these projects and help attract far larger levels of private sector follow-on investment, which can help to fuel economic growth in the region while providing access to modern clean energy services. For example, in Tanzania, $600,000 was made available to a U.S. energy developer to help fund a feasibility study which is expected to mobilize $139 million in capital for a 55-megawatt solar photovoltaic project at the University of Dodoma (UDOM) campus.

In the case of sustainable landscapes, my understanding is that the OES Bureau supports the SilvaCarbon program, a joint effort of eight U.S. Government agencies that enables developing countries to better understand and manage their forests by leveraging U.S. technical expertise on forest and forest carbon mapping and monitoring. This technical capacity provides an essential foundation to enable countries to prioritize their efforts to preserve forests, reducing emissions from deforestation and safeguarding other benefits like biodiversity and water quality. With technical assistance from SilvaCarbon:

- ♦ Ecuador has completed its first national forest inventory;
- ♦ Colombia was able to generate estimates of forest cover change annually for the first time;
- ♦ Gabon has developed a draft national land-use plan; and
- ♦ Peru finalized its first forest dynamics map, which provides essential information needed to estimate forest cover and deforestation rates.

Question. How does the Office of Climate Change in this Bureau interact with the Office of the Special Climate Envoy Todd Stern? In what areas is there overlap in responsibilities and duties?

Answer. My understanding is that the Special Envoy for Climate Change leads the international climate change negotiations for the U.S. Government and oversees policy aspects of international climate activities in the State Department. The Special Envoy has an office focused on high-level meetings, negotiations, and policy-making.

OES's Office of Global Change handles a large portfolio of issues. In relation to the international climate change negotiations, the office provides staff-level support for the Special Envoy and Deputy Special Envoys. Its officers serve as working-level negotiators, and the office provides staff support for high-level diplomatic meetings to advance U.S. objectives. These distinct roles are complementary and I understand that there is no duplication in duties between these offices, which work closely together.

Question. Please describe the current staffing, resources, and responsibilities of the Office of Climate Change. In addition, please describe when the Office was created and under what statutory authority.

Answer. At the present time, the Office of Global Change in the OES Bureau has 18 permanent, full-time direct hire staff. It also has nonpermanent positions, including six fellows and temporary staff, and five contractors. The Office of Global Change provides staff-level support and technical expertise for the Special Envoy and Deputy Special Envoys in international negotiations related to climate change, supports several international climate change initiatives, and oversees implementation of OES programs related to climate change. The office has expertise on issues such as climate change mitigation, adaptation, sustainable landscapes, finance, science, and technology, as well as on management of programs. The Office of Global Change was established in 1989 pursuant to constitutional and statutory authorities regarding management of the day-to-day conduct of U.S. foreign relations.

Question. Please describe the current staffing, resources, and responsibilities of the Office of the Special Climate Envoy. In addition, please describe when the Office was created and under what statutory authority.

Answer. The Special Envoy for Climate Change serves as the chief U.S. negotiator under the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC), which was ratified by the United States on October 15, 1992. In this role, he helps develop the administration's international policy on climate, and represents the United States internationally at the ministerial-level in all bilateral and multilateral negotiations regarding climate change. Todd Stern was appointed on January 26, 2009.

The Special Envoy's office was established under the constitutional and statutory authorities regarding management of the day-to-day conduct of U.S. foreign relations. The Special Envoy for Climate Change and his immediate office were established to provide greater senior level focus to ensure that the interests of the United States are adequately protected, given the complex and high-level nature of the international climate discussions.

The Special Envoy's office coordinates the deployment of federal expertise and resources in the UNFCCC negotiating process, helping to ensure the best possible outcomes for the range of U.S. stakeholders. In addition to the Special Envoy, the office currently has seven full-time staff and three contractors.

Question. The United States is currently participating in international climate negotiations with the goal of reaching an agreement by the end of the year.

- ◆ What form of an international agreement is the United States advocating for at the international climate change negotiations?
- ◆ Will the agreement be legally binding on the United States and other countries, including funding commitments for any provision contained within the agreement?
- ◆ What kinds of agreements or commitments currently under negotiation would require congressional action, such as the advice and consent of the Senate, and what might not? Please explain your reasoning.

Answer. A 2011 decision of the Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, adopted in Durban, South Africa, launched a process to develop a "protocol, another legal instrument, or an agreed outcome with legal force under the Convention applicable to all Parties. . . ."

The Durban decision makes clear that the purpose of a future Paris agreement is to further the objective of the Convention (i.e., to avoid dangerous anthropogenic interference with the climate), yet leaves the Parties with substantial flexibility regarding its form and the legal nature of its provisions.

It is my understanding that at this stage, the international discussions are more focused on the substance of the agreement than on issues related to its form, such as whether it should be a protocol or whether particular provisions should be legally binding. The administration has indicated that the United States seeks an agreement that is ambitious in light of the climate challenge; that reflects nationally determined mitigation efforts in line with national circumstances and capabilities; that provides for accountability with respect to such efforts; that takes account of evolving emissions and economic trends; and that promotes adaptation by parties to climate impacts.

- ◆ Can the administration enter into a politically binding international agreement without congressional approval?

Answer. I understand the term "politically binding" in your question to refer to arrangements that do not give rise to legal obligations under U.S. or international law. It is my understanding that such nonbinding arrangements have been utilized by Presidents of both parties throughout our history to address a range of diplomatic and national security matters and do not require congressional approval.

- ◆ What state, local governing entity or community would not be subject to a politically binding treaty?

Answer. I understand the term "politically binding" in your question to refer to arrangements that do not give rise to legal obligations under U.S. or international law. Accordingly, any such nonbinding arrangements would create no legal obligations for any state, local governing entity, or community.

- ◆ How does the administration plan to legally commit to the President's November 2014 pledge to cut U.S. greenhouse gas emission to 26–28 percent below 2005 levels by 2025?

Answer. I understand that the administration does not intend to legally commit the United States to the 26–28 percent target. Moreover, I understand that the administration favors an approach to the Paris agreement under which emissions targets are not legally binding.

- ◆ Please describe any existing statutory authorities the administration may expect to rely on to implement the Intended Nationally Determined Contribution (INDC.) Does the administration believe it has the full statutory authority to implement its recently announced INDC now or will the administration need Congress to provide additional authorities?

Answer. I understand that the administration carefully evaluated available statutory authorities in the development of the INDC. My understanding is that several

U.S. laws, as well as existing and proposed regulations thereunder, are relevant to the implementation of the U.S. target, including the Clean Air Act (42 U.S.C. § 7401 et seq.), the Energy Policy Act (42 U.S.C. § 13201 et seq.), and the Energy Independence and Security Act (42 U.S.C. § 17001 et seq.). Since 2009, the United States has completed the following regulatory actions:

Under the Clean Air Act, the United States Department of Transportation and the United States Environmental Protection Agency adopted fuel economy standards for light-duty vehicles for model years 2012–2025 and for heavy-duty vehicles for model years 2014–2018.

Under the Energy Policy Act and the Energy Independence and Security Act, the United States Department of Energy has finalized multiple measures addressing buildings sector emissions including energy conservation standards for 29 categories of appliances and equipment as well as a building code determination for commercial buildings.

Under the Clean Air Act, the United States Environmental Protection Agency has approved the use of specific alternatives to high-global warming potential hydrofluorocarbons (high-GWP HFCs) in certain applications through the Significant New Alternatives Policy program.

At this time:

Under the Clean Air Act, the United States Environmental Protection Agency is moving to finalize by summer 2015 regulations to cut carbon pollution from new and existing power plants.

Under the Clean Air Act, the United States Department of Transportation and the United States Environmental Protection Agency are moving to promulgate post-2018 fuel economy standards for heavy-duty vehicles.

Under the Clean Air Act, the United States Environmental Protection Agency is developing standards to address methane emissions from landfills and the oil and gas sector.

Under the Clean Air Act, the United States Environmental Protection Agency is moving to reduce the use and emissions of high-GWP HFCs through the Significant New Alternatives Policy program.

Under the Energy Policy Act and the Energy Independence and Security Act, the United States Department of Energy is continuing to reduce buildings sector emissions including by promulgating energy conservation standards for a broad range of appliances and equipment, as well as a building code determination for residential buildings.

- ♦ What was the process the administration used for determining the U.S. commitment? What consultations and inputs from Congress and the American public did the administration seek when working to establish the U.S. commitment?

Answer. I understand that the administration undertook an extensive, rigorous interagency process to identify and assess potential emission reductions that are both achievable and cost effective. This process examined options to reduce emissions of all greenhouse gases in every economic sector through existing statutory and executive authorities and voluntary programs.

It is my understanding that agencies responsible for implementing these existing statutory and executive authorities and voluntary programs have had wide ranging discussions with stakeholders from the public, private and nonprofit sector, including formal and informal consultations with Congress.

- ♦ What role does the Bureau of Oceans and International Environment and Scientific Affairs have in the international climate change negotiations?

Answer. The Office of Global Change in the Bureau of Oceans and International Environmental and Scientific Affairs handles a large portfolio of issues. In relation to the international climate change negotiations, the office provides staff-level support and technical expertise for the Special Envoy and support for high-level diplomatic meetings to advance U.S. objectives, and its staff serve as working-level negotiators.

- ♦ What role will you play in the negotiations? What specific advice, analysis, information, and support is the Office of Climate providing for the international climate negotiations?

Answer. It is my understanding that over the past 14 years, under this administration and the Bush administration, the OES Assistant Secretary did not play a direct, formal role in the international climate change negotiations.

The Office of Global Change in the OES Bureau provides staff-level support and technical expertise for the Special Envoy and Deputy Special Envoy in the negotiations. That includes expertise on issues such as climate change mitigation, adaptation, sustainable landscapes, finance, science, and technology, as well as program management and support for high-level diplomatic meetings. Office staff also serve as working-level negotiators.

Question. In November 2014, President Obama announced a pledge of $3 billion to create a brand new Global Climate Fund. His fiscal year 2016 budget request asks for $500 million to start funding that pledge.

- ♦ What was the process the administration used for determining the appropriate commitment to the Global Climate Fund? What consultations did the administration have with Congress on this commitment?

Answer. It is my understanding that the administration undertook an interagency discussion among staff of the Department of Treasury, Department of State, Office of Management and Budget and the National Security Council to determine what the U.S. pledge should be as a good base of funding in the Green Climate Fund's initial few years. The key reference point was the Bush administration's $2 billion pledge to the Climate Investment Funds (CIFs), which that administration had planned to provide over a 3-year period. In light of a legislative requirement related to a multiyear pledge, I understand that the administration consulted with relevant House and Senate staff 10 days before the GCF pledge was announced, and then met with staff on multiple other occasions during those 10 days.

- ♦ What impact evaluations have been completed on the previous $2 billion in U.S. funding for international climate change already provided to the Climate Investment Funds?

Answer. My understanding is that an independent evaluation of the Climate Investment Funds (CIFs), carried out by the independent evaluation departments of the multilateral development banks, was released in June 2014 and is available at <http://www.cifevaluation.org>. Because of the early stage of most CIF investments (many of which are of very long duration), the evaluation focused more on institutional issues such as the process for developing country investment plans. Further CIF project-level evaluations will be conducted in the future. Each multilateral development bank that participates in the CIFs is including CIF programs or projects into their evaluation work program. Funding is being set aside in the CIF budget to support impact evaluations and other evaluation tools.

- ♦ When will the Climate Investment Funds be closed down? What will happen to the funding that remains or comes back into the fund?

Answer. My understanding is that the Trust Fund Committees of the Climate Investment Funds will make a decision in the future about the sunset of the CIFs, and when not to accept new contributions into the Funds. Then, once all contributions have been committed to projects, no new projects will be approved. Because the Climate Investment Funds are intended to sunset, my understanding is that financial reflows will probably not be used to finance future projects.

- ♦ Why is it responsible for the administration to recommend closing down the current Climate Investment Funds and creating a larger brand new Global Climate Fund if no evaluations have been done on the impact and results of U.S. funding to the current international climate change programs?

Answer. My understanding is that the administration supports having a robust evaluation program for the CIFs in order to inform future programs at the Green Climate Fund and elsewhere. An independent evaluation of the CIFs was released in June 2014 and is available at <http://www.cifevaluation.org>. Because of the early stage of most CIF investments (many of which are of very long duration), this evaluation focused more on institutional issues such as the process for developing country investment plans. We expect that further CIF project-level evaluations will be conducted in the future.

RESPONSES OF MARCIA DENISE OCCOMY, NOMINATED TO BE U.S. DIRECTOR OF THE AFRICAN DEVELOPMENT BANK, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

DIRECTOR-DESIGNATE OCCOMY'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR BARRASSO

Question. Do you believe the African Development Bank should equally support all types of energy resources in order to provide sub-Saharan Africa with the electricity it needs to grow their way out of poverty?

Answer. Facilitating energy access and energy security for the people of Africa is a priority for the African Development Bank and the United States. I understand that energy access is essential to promoting the growth of African economies. If confirmed, I will be committed to promoting energy access through an appropriate mix of energy resources consistent with U.S. laws and policies and the African Development Bank's own operating guidelines and policies.

Question. When reviewing projects at the African Development Bank, what criterion is used in determining whether the United States will support the project?

Answer. In reviewing projects at the African Development Bank (AfDB), the United States takes into account a range of different factors to determine whether or not to support a specific project. These factors include the degree to which the project will support a country's efforts to reduce poverty, whether the project is well-designed and mitigates foreseeable risks, whether the project is as sustainable (financially and economically) as possible, and whether the project meets both the AfDB's policies and U.S. legislative provisions.

Question. Do you believe economic feasibility and the potential to provide maximum access to energy with maximum efficiency must be the biggest factors when evaluating projects?

Answer. Economic feasibility and the degree to which a project increases energy access are important, but not the only factors in evaluating energy projects. The design of effective energy projects will also take into account other factors, such as improving the long-term financial sustainability of the country's energy sector; reducing the potential for corruption in the project; and mitigating the environmental, health, and social impacts of the project.

Question. Coal provides a low cost and reliable energy source which is important to countries looking for assistance in poverty alleviation and economic development. Do you agree with this statement? If not, why not?

Answer. The U.S. Government is committed to providing energy access and energy security to people around the globe as an important element of economic development. In the poorest countries, where energy needs are often the greatest, I understand that the President's Climate Action Plan allows for support for new coal power-generation projects under certain conditions that focus on promoting the most efficient coal technologies and where no other economically viable alternative exists. In wealthier countries, the U.S. may support new coal-fired power projects that deploy carbon capture and sequestration (CCS) technologies.

Question. Please list and provide information on all the countries in the African Development Bank that have oil, natural gas, and coal resources.

Answer. According to the latest data available from the Energy Information Agency at the Department of Energy, the African Development Bank's regional member countries with the largest reserves of oil are Libya, Nigeria, Algeria, and Angola. The largest proved reserves of natural gas are in Nigeria, Algeria, Mozambique, Egypt, Libya, and Angola. The largest recoverable reserves of coal are in South Africa, Zimbabwe, Mozambique, Tanzania, and Nigeria. Complete data for all countries with any proven reserves are below [Figure 1.] .

Question. What proportion of procurement contracts at the African Development Bank and the African Development Fund is awarded to U.S. businesses? What proportion of these contracts is awarded to Chinese businesses? What specific steps would you advocate for at the African Development Bank and the African Development Fund to increase the percentage of contracts awarded to U.S. companies?

Answer. In 2014, U.S. businesses received 0.54 percent of all procurement contracts by number and 0.26 percent of procurement contracts by value. Chinese business received 1.94 percent of contracts by number and 24.28 percent by value. If confirmed, I will advocate for maintaining transparent and competitive procurement practices and an increased focus on a value-for-money approach that considers costs over the full life cycle of projects rather than merely the lowest priced bid. U.S. firms are typically better positioned when such a value-for-money approach is taken. I understand that the African Development Bank is currently reviewing its procurement policies, which provides an opportunity to encourage a better focus on value-for-money approach to be reflected in the African Development Bank's updated procurement policies.

Question. What do you believe is an appropriate role for China to play at the African Development Bank and African Development Fund?

Answer. China is a nonregional shareholder of the African Development Bank and a donor to the African Development Fund. China should continue to engage constructively with other AfDB shareholders and AfDB Management to support Africa's development. As China's income and role in the global economy grows, it should support the poorest countries by contributing more to the concessional window, the African Development Fund.

Question. What is your view of China's recently launched Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank and the Chinese investment efforts in Africa? How will these efforts complement or duplicate efforts at the African Development Bank?

Answer. It is widely acknowledged that there is a pressing need to enhance infrastructure investment in Africa and around the world. China can provide an important contribution to Africa's development through its infrastructure investments, provided they maintain high-quality standards and operate within strong safeguards including established fiduciary, economic, and social safeguards. I believe that any new multilateral financial institution should share the international community's strong commitment to the high-quality standards of the existing multilateral development banks, including the African Development Bank. My understanding is that the AIIB intends to focus exclusively in Asia. However, if confirmed, I would encourage the African Development Bank to seek to ensure that any institution providing financing in Africa maintains these high-quality standards and operational safeguards.

Question. Please describe the planned $2 billion African Development Bank—People's Bank of China African Common Growth Fund and the U.S. view of this initiative. Is the United States considering a similar arrangement for the administration's Power Africa Initiative?

Answer. China created and will contribute $2 billion, over 10 years, to the Africa Growing Together Fund (AGTF) that will be housed at the AfDB. The AGTF will cofinance projects eligible for AfDB financing using a variety of funding modalities. The United States welcomes the additional financing that China will be making available to support Africa's development through the AGTF, especially as all projects financed from the AGTF must use the AfDB's standards, including those related to environmental and social safeguards and procurement rules.

While the United States has not considered a designated funding mechanism for its Power Africa partnership with the AfDB, the AfDB itself has pledged $3 billion of its own funds toward reaching the goals set by Power Africa. Power Africa is working closely with the AfDB to identify priority Power Africa transactions and allocate resources accordingly. In addition, both the AfDB and Power Africa have seconded staff members to the other's organization to enhance coordination. Power Africa has also provided $3 million to the African Legal Support Facility, an AfDB initiative that strengthens African countries' legal expertise and negotiating capacity in debt management and litigation, natural resources and extractive industries management and contracting, investment agreements, and related commercial and business transactions.

Question. The African Development Bank President Kaberuka recommended combining the African Development Bank and the African Development Fund lending windows into a single facility.

- ◆ Do you support this proposal? Did the 13th replenishment of the African Development Fund replenishment negotiations address this matter? What are the benefits and risks of providing market-rate and concessional assistance through the same facility?

Answer. I understand that while President Kaberuka expressed interest in this idea, AfDB Management has not actively proposed it during the negotiations on the 13th replenishment of the African Development Fund (AfDF) or since. The United States welcomes ideas from the multilateral development banks on how they can use innovative financial options to expand their lending capacity without additional resources from shareholders, and I understand that Asian Development Bank shareholders unanimously approved a similar proposal recently. I also understand that this approach would be more difficult for the AfDB due to the status of the AfDB and the AfDF as separate legal entities. The main benefit of such an approach is that the equity built up in the concessional window can be leveraged to create additional concessional and nonconcessional lending capacity. Risks include the need to ensure that the extra resources generated continue to benefit poorer countries and the need to maintain an appropriate level of concessionality in lending to these countries.

Question. The elections for a new President of the African Development Bank is taking place on May 28, 2015.

♦ Who is currently running for President of the African Development Bank and what are the main priorities of each of the candidates?

Answer. Dr. Akinwumi Adesina, the Minister of Agriculture from Nigeria, was elected as the next President of the AfDB on May 28, 2015. The other candidates were:

Jaloul Ayed, former Minister of Finance, Tunisia;
Sufian Ahmed Beker, Minister of Finance, Ethiopia;
Kordje Bedoumra, Minister of Finance, Chad;
Cristina Duarte, Minister of Finance, Cabo Verde;
Samura Kamara, Minister of Foreign Affairs, Sierra Leone;
Thomas Zondo Sakala, former Vice President of the AfDB, Zimbabwe; and Birama Sidibe, Vice President of the Islamic Development Bank, Mali.

Each candidate's vision statement is available at www.afdb.org/en/news-and-events/article/eight-candidates-in-the-running-for-the-next-afdb-presidency-submit-their-vision-for-the-bank-and-africa-14111/. All of the candidates prioritized building on the legacy of President Donald Kaberuka, supporting the private sector in Africa, reducing Africa's infrastructure deficit, enhancing inclusive growth and creating jobs for youth and women, building the capacity of fragile and conflict-affected states, and attracting the staff that the AfDB needs to play a leading role in these areas.

Question. What criterion does the United States use when deciding who to vote for as President of the Bank? What is your evaluation of these candidates?

Answer. The United States seeks candidates with a strong vision for supporting private sector-led growth and poverty reduction in Africa, a sound understanding of the AfDB's comparative advantages, a clear agenda for implementing the institutional reforms needed to make the AfDB more effective and to attract and retain high-quality managers and staff, and the ability to represent the AfDB as a leading development institution in Africa and globally. I welcome that there were several qualified candidates contesting the election.

Question. Which of the candidates is the United States supporting at the May 28, 2015 election?

Answer. The United States welcomed that there were several well-qualified candidates that contested the election. I was not involved in the voting process for the United States. If confirmed, I look forward to working with Dr. Adesina to continue strengthening the AfDB so that it remains a leading contributor to Africa's development and a key partner for U.S. development efforts.

RESPONSES OF BRIAN JAMES EGAN, NOMINATED TO BE LEGAL ADVISER TO THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

BRIAN EGAN'S RESPONSES TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CORKER

Question. Congress has long understood that the 2001 AUMF covered: (1) al-Qaeda; and (2) "associated forces" of al-Qaeda. Please describe the administration's legal view of why it is that ISIS is covered by the 2001 AUMF.

Answer. The 2001 AUMF authorizes the use of force against al-Qaeda, the Taliban, and associated forces. Based on ISIL's long-standing relationship with al-Qaeda and Usama bin Laden; its long history of conducting, and continued desire to conduct, attacks against U.S. persons and interests; the extensive history of U.S. combat operations against ISIL dating back to the time the group first affiliated with al-Qaeda in 2004 and was known as al-Qaeda in Iraq; and ISIL's position—supported by some individual members and factions of al-Qaeda-aligned groups—that it is the true inheritor of Usama bin Laden's legacy, the administration has concluded that the President may rely on the 2001 AUMF as statutory authority for the use of force against ISIL, notwithstanding the public split between al-Qaeda's senior leadership and ISIL. A contrary interpretation of the statute would allow al-Qaeda and its cobelligerents, rather than the President and the Congress, to control the scope of the AUMF by splintering into rival factions while still continuing to prosecute the same conflict against the United States.

Question. Does the administration currently have statutory or article II authority to defend U.S.- or coalition-trained forces in Iraq and Syria if those forces come under direct threat from ISIS, al-Nusra, Assad regime forces, Hezbollah, or any other armed groups?

Answer. The administration's position is that the 2001 AUMF would provide authority to conduct military operations in defense of U.S.- or coalition-trained forces against ISIL, the Nusrah Front, and other groups who are either part of or associated forces of al-Qaeda, in the same manner as it does for ongoing U.S. operations against those groups. The administration also believes that the 2002 Iraq AUMF would provide legal authority for military operations in some circumstances against ISIL in defense of U.S.- or coalition-trained forces in Syria.

The question whether the 2001 AUMF, the 2002 AUMF, or the President's article II authority would provide legal authority to defend those forces against Assad regime forces or other armed groups would be more difficult.

The 2001 AUMF authorizes the President to use "all necessary and appropriate force against those nations, organizations, or persons he determines planned, authorized, committed, or aided the terrorist attacks that occurred on September 11, 2001, or harbored such organizations or persons, in order to prevent any future acts of international terrorism against the United States by such nations, organizations or persons." To be an "associated force" of al-Qaeda a group must be both (1) an organized, armed group that has entered the fight alongside al-Qaeda, and (2) a co-belligerent with al-Qaeda in hostilities against the United States or its coalition partners. The determination that a particular group is an associated force is made at the most senior levels of the U.S. Government, following reviews by senior government lawyers and informed by departments and agencies with relevant expertise and institutional roles, including all-source intelligence from the U.S. intelligence community.

The 2002 AUMF authorizes the President to "use the Armed Force of the United States as he determines to be necessary and appropriate in order to—(1) defend the national security of the United States against the continuing threat posed by Iraq; and (2) enforce all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions regarding Iraq." Although the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq was the focus of the 2002 AUMF, the statute, in accordance with its express goals, has always been understood to authorize the use of force for additional purposes. Those purposes include helping to establish a stable, democratic Iraq to succeed Saddam Hussein's regime and addressing terrorist threats emanating from Iraq. At a minimum, to the extent that military operations against ISIL in Syria are necessary in order to achieve these purposes, they are authorized by the 2002 AUMF.

The President has authority under the Constitution to use force not amounting to "war" in the constitutional sense, where he reasonably determines that such force serves a sufficiently important national interest, at least insofar as the Congress has not specifically restricted it by statute. Whether the use of military force constitutes a "war" within the meaning of the Declaration of War Clause would, as described in previous opinions from the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel, involve the need for a fact-specific assessment of the anticipated nature, scope, and duration of the planned military operations and of the exposure of U.S. military personnel to significant risk over a substantial period.

As a policy matter, the nature and extent of the support that the United States is prepared to provide to U.S.-trained Syrian forces is critically important and under active consideration, but as of this point has not been decided. If confirmed as Legal Adviser, I would look forward to working closely with this committee to explain the legal issues related to any decision that is made.

Question. With U.S. forces on the ground in Iraq and conducting activities in both Iraq and Syria, what authority to protect and defend those forces, if any, is currently available under the 2001 or 2002 AUMFs, and is there something additional you gain under the 2002 AUMF but not the 2001 AUMF?

Answer. The administration's position is that the 2001 AUMF and, at least in some circumstances, the 2002 AUMF provide legal authority for the ongoing U.S. military operations in Iraq and Syria, including the authority to use military force in defense of U.S. forces.

The 2001 AUMF authorizes the President to use "all necessary and appropriate force against those nations, organizations, or persons" he determines were responsible for the 9/11 attacks, and it is not limited to a specific country or geographic region. This authorization clearly covers Usama bin Laden and al-Qaeda, and Congress and the federal courts have confirmed the Executive branch's view that the AUMF also authorizes the use of force against associated forces of al-Qaeda, each of which must be both (1) an organized, armed group that has entered the fight alongside al-Qaeda, and (2) a cobelligerent with al-Qaeda in hostilities against the United States or its coalition partners.

The 2001 AUMF authorized the use of force against ISIL beginning in at least 2004, when ISIL, then known as al-Qaeda in Iraq, pledged its allegiance to Bin Laden. Bin Laden then publicly endorsed the group as al-Qaeda's official affiliate in Iraq. After its formal affiliation with al-Qaeda, the group conducted numerous terrorist attacks against the United States and its coalition partners, and in response, the United States engaged in extensive combat operations against it.

The 2002 Iraq AUMF provides an alternative source of legal authority for U.S. military operations against ISIL in Iraq and, at least in some circumstances, in Syria. Among other things, the 2002 AUMF authorizes the use of force to "defend the national security of the United States against the continuing threat posed by Iraq," including in defense of U.S. forces.

The President has made clear that he would welcome bipartisan congressional action on a new, limited authorization for the use of military force that would specifically address the threat posed by ISIL. The President's AUMF proposal, among other things, would repeal the 2002 AUMF because the President believes the authority he would have under his proposal and the 2001 AUMF would be sufficient to conduct the operations that are ongoing in Iraq and Syria, including any operations to protect and defend the U.S. Forces who are part of those operations.

Question. The administration believes it has authority under the 2001 AUMF to use "all necessary and appropriate force" against ISIS. Does the administration have article II authority, on its own, to conduct the military activities we are currently engaged in against ISIS, or is congressional authorization necessary?

Answer. The administration has concluded that the 2001 AUMF provides legal authority to use military force against ISIL in Iraq and Syria. The administration has also concluded that the 2002 Iraq AUMF provides legal authority for military operations against ISIL in Iraq and, in at least some circumstances, against ISIL in Syria. The military activities against ISIL in which the United States is currently engaged in Iraq and Syria are being conducted pursuant to those statutory authorities. Because of its conclusion that the 2001 and 2002 AUMFs provide the necessary legal authority for the President, the administration has not developed a legal position on the question posed; namely, whether the President could rely on article II authority alone to continue to conduct the ongoing military activities we are currently engaged in against ISIL.

The Constitution recognizes important roles for both the President and the Congress in relation to the use of military force by the United States. As the administration has previously indicated to this committee, the President has authority under the Constitution to use force not amounting to "war" in the constitutional sense where he reasonably determines that such force serves a sufficiently important national interest, at least insofar as the Congress has not specifically restricted it by statute. Any analysis of the President's constitutional authorities to conduct these same operations in the absence of the AUMFs would therefore require a fact-specific assessment of the national interests served by these operations and their anticipated nature, scope, and duration, among other factors.

The administration has been clear in describing the critical national interests that are served by our ongoing efforts to degrade and ultimately defeat ISIL in Iraq and Syria. At the same time, this and previous administrations have recognized the congressional interest, including as reflected in the War Powers Resolution, in providing express congressional authorization for the use of force by the U.S. military in major, prolonged conflicts such as the wars in Vietnam and Korea.

Regardless, the President has made clear that he believes that it is important that decisions to send members of our military into harm's way enjoy the support of Congress and the American people. This is the reason that the President has submitted the proposed ISIL AUMF to the Congress. I share that view, and, if confirmed, I would use my voice within the administration to support robust consultation with Congress on such matters, and to ensure that deliberations and consultations with Congress are fully informed by the important constitutional responsibilities of both branches of government in this area.

BRIAN EGAN'S RESPONSE TO A QUESTION FROM SENATOR CARDIN

Question. Given the foreign policy objectives of the section 1504 rule, please discuss how you intend to engage with the SEC to ensure that they issue a strong rule that serves U.S. foreign policy goals.

Answer. Section 1504 of the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act requires reporting issuers engaged in the commercial development of oil, natural gas, or minerals to disclose in an annual report certain payments to the United States or foreign governments for the commercial development of oil, natural gas, or minerals. Section 1504 advances U.S. foreign policy interests by ensuring transparency and reducing corruption in the extractives sector, supporting international initiatives related to extractive industry transparency, and more broadly, promoting energy security and supporting global economic development.

If confirmed as Legal Adviser, I will work with the State Department's policy bureaus to ensure that the SEC is appropriately aware of these foreign policy interests so that they may be given due regard in the rulemaking process.

BRIAN EGAN'S RESPONSES TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR BARRASSO

Question #1. Do you believe a resolution adopted by the U.N. Security Council can preempt U.S. law?

Answer. No. U.N. member states are required under international law to accept and carry out decisions of the Security Council in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. This does not, however, preempt the obligation to comply with applicable provisions of U.S. domestic law. When deciding whether to support or oppose proposed Security Council resolutions, the Department of State, working with other departments and agencies, carefully considers whether actions that would be required under the resolutions would be consistent with U.S. law. The United States has the right, under Article 27 of the U.N. Charter, to veto resolutions that would impose requirements that would be inconsistent with U.S. domestic law and thereby prevent their adoption.

Question #2. Could the executive branch use a U.N. Security Council resolution to justify action that U.S. law would otherwise not allow?

Answer. No. The executive branch cannot take actions that it is prohibited from taking under U.S. law. Thus, the fact that a U.N. Security Council resolution authorizes a particular action will not enable the executive branch to carry it out if the action is impermissible under U.S. law.

Question #3. If the U.N. Security Council adopted a resolution requiring countries to lift sanctions on Iran, would the U.S. be obligated to comply?

Answer. In the case of Iran, the Security Council adopted a series of resolutions beginning in 2006 requiring U.N. member states to impose certain sanctions on Iran. When the Security Council makes a decision requiring U.N. member states to impose sanctions, U.N. member states are required under international law to accept and carry out that decision in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. A Security Council decision to lift these requirements would relieve U.N. member states of their international legal obligation to maintain the sanctions on Iran that were the subject of the Security Council resolutions, but would not prevent the United States or other U.N. member states from continuing to impose sanctions on a national basis under their domestic law. In any event, as explained in response to Question #1, the United States has the right, under Article 27 of the U.N. Charter, to veto resolutions that would impose requirements that would be inconsistent with U.S. domestic law and thereby prevent their adoption.

Question #4. What types of agreements are constitutionally required to take the form of a treaty and must be submitted to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification?

Answer. The Constitution's text does not specify particular types of agreements that must take the form of a treaty. As a matter of practice, the United States has entered into a variety of agreements approved by statute rather than through the procedures specified in the Constitution's Treaty Clause. These include the United Nations Headquarters Agreement; agreements establishing the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, and other international financial institutions; the agreement establishing the International Labor Organization; the SALT I Interim Agreement; and trade agreements including NAFTA and the agreement establishing the World Trade Organization. This practice suggests that the executive branch, Senate, and House of Representatives together have understood themselves to have significant latitude to use regular legislative procedures as an alternative to the procedures specified in the Treaty Clause for the approval of international agreements when collectively they deem it appropriate to do so.

If confirmed, I would welcome the opportunity to work with this committee on issues related to the approval of treaties and other forms of international agreements. Administrations of both political parties have a history of working with the Congress to identify international agreements that would be subject to the Constitution's Treaty Clause and agreements that could be concluded with other forms of congressional approval or as a sole executive agreement.

Questions #5 & #6. Is the President only able to enter sole Executive agreements concerning matters under his exclusive constitutional authority, or may these agreements also concern matters over which authority is shared with Congress?

What domestic or international legal effect do "sole executive agreements" have when there is a conflicting federal statute?

Answer. In analyzing the scope of the President's authority with respect to international agreements, the Supreme Court has referred to the framework outlined in Justice Jackson's concurrence in Youngstown Sheet and Tube v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952). That framework indicates that the President's authority is at its maximum when he acts pursuant to an express or implied authorization from Congress; that when he acts in the absence of either a congressional grant or denial of authority, he can only rely upon his own independent powers; and that when the President takes measures incompatible with the expressed or implied will of Congress, his power is at its lowest ebb, for then he can rely only upon his own constitutional powers minus any constitutional powers of Congress over the matter. Id. at 635–638.

Consistent with this framework, the validity of any particular Executive agreement as a matter of U.S. law would depend on factors including the particular matter addressed by the agreement, the extent of the President's independent constitutional authority with regard to that matter, and whether Congress had legislated with respect to the matter. For example, where an Executive agreement conflicts with a federal statute, Justice Jackson's concurrence indicates that "Courts can sustain exclusive Presidential control in such a case only by disabling the Congress from acting upon the subject." It further observes that "Presidential claim to a power at once so conclusive and preclusive must be scrutinized with caution."

The fact that an international agreement may conflict with a federal statute does not affect the status of the agreement as a matter of international law. In Medellin v. Texas, the Supreme Court observed that, although the President lacked the authority as a matter of U.S. law to give effect to an obligation under an international agreement at issue in the case, "no one disputes that it constitutes an international law obligation on the part of the United States." 552 U.S. 491, 536 (2008).

Question #7. Under existing law, the United States is required to suspend direct foreign assistance to the government of any country whose duly elected head of government is deposed by military coup d'état or decree or a coup d'état or decree in which the military plays a decisive role. How is a coup d'état defined under existing U.S. law?

Answer. The annual Department of State, Foreign Operations, and Related Programs Appropriations Acts provides that certain funds in the Act may not "be obligated or expended to finance directly any assistance to the government of any country whose duly elected head of government is deposed by military coup d'état or decree or, after the date of enactment of this Act, a coup d'état or decree in which the military plays a decisive role." This "military coup restriction" contains three elements that must be met in order to trigger the restriction: (1) whether the head of government was duly elected; (2) whether the head of government was removed from office, and (3) whether the removal was effectuated by the military or whether the military played a decisive role in the removal. Whether the military coup restriction could be triggered in connection with a particular change in government requires a detailed factual inquiry into all of the relevant circumstances.

Question #8. As noted, appropriations law requires the termination of certain foreign assistance if an elected head of government is deposed by a coup. At the time, an administration official was asked if it is "still U.S. policy that we are not determining that a coup was carried out in July in Egypt." He replied: "Nothing has changed in terms of approaching what you called the coup restriction; didn't make a determination, haven't made a determination, don't think we need to make a determination, are acting consistent with the provisions of the law and we'll continue to do so."

Answer. The military coup restriction in the annual Department of State, Foreign Operations, and Related Programs Appropriations Act does not require a determination to be made with respect to a particular change in government, so long as any assistance provided to the relevant government could be provided even if the restriction were triggered. Accordingly, the administration took action to restrict certain assistance to Egypt consistent with the military coup restriction until new legislation was enacted with regard to assistance for the Government of Egypt.

The administration decided it was not in U.S. foreign policy or national security interests to characterize the events in Egypt as either a military coup or not a military coup. Such a characterization would implicate a highly polarized debate in Egypt. The administration concluded that inserting the United States into that debate would undermine U.S. interests in a peaceful resolution to the crisis, risk alienating roughly half of the population in Egypt, and potentially put U.S. facilities and personnel in the region at increased risk.

Question #9. After a head of government is deposed from power, how long does the State Department have to determine if a coup took place?

Answer. The military coup restriction in the annual Department of State, Foreign Operations, and Related Programs Appropriations Act does not require a determination to be made with respect to a particular change in government, so long as any assistance provided to the relevant government could be provided even if the restriction were triggered.

As explained in response to Question #7, three elements must be met in order to trigger the restriction: (1) whether the head of government was duly elected; (2) whether the head of government was removed from office, and (3) whether the removal was effectuated by the military or whether the military played a decisive role in the removal. Whether this restriction could be triggered in connection with a particular change in government requires a detailed factual inquiry into all of the relevant circumstances, and in some instances the facts on the ground may not be clear for a period of time.

Questions #10 & #11. How is it consistent with the law to never make a determination whether a coup actually happened when a leader is deposed from power?

What other statutory regimes is this method of legal analysis applied to?

Answer. The military coup restriction in the annual Department of State, Foreign Operations, and Related Programs Appropriations Acts provides that certain funds in the Act may not “be obligated or expended to finance directly any assistance to the government of any country whose duly elected head of government is deposed by military coup d’etat or decree or, after the date of enactment of this Act, a coup d’etat or decree in which the military plays a decisive role.” If the standard in the legislation is met, assistance must be restricted consistent with the military coup restriction. On the other hand, so long as any assistance provided to the relevant government could be provided even if the military coup restriction were triggered, it is consistent with the law not to make a determination. Many countries receive no assistance from the U.S. Government; others receive assistance that would not be impacted by the military coup restriction (for example, assistance only for non-governmental activities). Therefore, the applicability of this provision varies with respect to the nature of our assistance. The Department of State’s efforts to ensure compliance with the military coup restriction are consistent with its broader efforts to ensure compliance with all applicable funding restrictions.

Question #12. There has been a lot of discussion about the type and form of a comprehensive agreement on Iran’s nuclear program. The administration claims that a final deal on Iran’s nuclear program will be an Executive agreement instead of a treaty requiring the advice and consent of the Senate for ratification. What is the legal basis for this position?

Answer. The administration has made clear that the P5+1 discussions with Iran are directed toward the conclusion of a nonbinding arrangement. Nonbinding arrangements are not Executive agreements in that they do not create legal obligations under U.S. or international law. As White House Chief of Staff Denis McDonough indicated in a March 14, 2015, letter to Senator Corker, such non-binding arrangements have been utilized by Presidents of both parties throughout our history to address a range of diplomatic and national security matters and do not require congressional approval.

Question #13. What conditions or provisions in a new climate change agreement would not require the advice and consent to ratification by the Senate?

Answer. It is my understanding that the international discussions on a new climate change agreement are continuing and have not resulted in any final decisions on any conditions or provisions of the new agreement. Accordingly, I am not in a position to speculate as to whether any of the terms of the final agreement will require Senate advice and consent.

The administration will continue to consult with the committee regarding the negotiations. During his confirmation hearing, Secretary Kerry assured this committee that any international agreement brought into force for the United States will be done consistent with the U.S. Constitution.

Question #14. What form of agreement is the United States advocating for during the international negotiations? Has the administration been pushing for the agreement to be legally binding during the negotiations?

Answer. A 2011 decision of the Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, adopted in Durban, South Africa, launched a process to develop a "protocol, another legal instrument, or an agreed outcome with legal force under the Convention applicable to all Parties. . . ."

The Durban decision makes clear that the purpose of a future Paris agreement is to further the objective of the Convention (i.e., to avoid dangerous anthropogenic interference with the climate), yet leaves the Parties with substantial flexibility regarding its form and the legal nature of its provisions.

It is my understanding that at this stage the international discussions are more focused on the substance of the agreement than on issues related to its form, such as whether it should be a protocol or whether particular provisions should be legally binding. The administration has indicated that the United States seeks an agreement that is ambitious in light of the climate challenge; that reflects nationally determined mitigation efforts in line with national circumstances and capabilities; that provides for accountability with respect to such efforts; that takes account of evolving emissions and economic trends; and that promotes adaptation by Parties to climate impacts.

Question #15. Will the final agreement be legally binding on the United States and other countries, including funding commitments for any provision contained within the agreement?

Answer. Please see response to Question #14.

Question #16. Can the administration enter into a politically binding international agreement without congressional approval?

Answer. I understand the term "politically binding" to refer to arrangements that do not give rise to legal obligations under U.S. or international law. As White House Chief of Staff Denis McDonough indicated in a March 14, 2015, letter to Senator Corker in response to questions regarding negotiations with Iran, such nonbinding arrangements have been utilized by Presidents of both parties throughout our history to address a range of diplomatic and national security matters and do not require congressional approval.

Question #17. What state, local governing entity, or community would not be subject to a politically binding agreement?

Answer. I understand the term "politically binding" to refer to arrangements that do not give rise to legal obligations under U.S. or international law. Accordingly, any such nonbinding arrangements would create no legal obligations for any state, local governing entity, or community.

Question #18. Has the Palestinian accession and acceptance of the International Criminal Court jurisdiction triggered this prohibition on the Economic Support Fund assistance?

Answer. The administration continually reviews its assistance to ensure compliance with U.S. law, including those provisions pertaining to assistance to the Palestinian Authority.

At this stage, the administration does not believe that any of the legislative restrictions on Economic Support Fund (ESF) assistance to the Palestinian Authority have been triggered. At the same time, in light of the latest developments, the administration has indicated that it is reviewing our assistance for the Palestinian Authority to ensure that it supports our policy.

Question #19. Has the International Criminal Court Prosecutor's opening of a preliminary examination of the situation in the Palestinian territories, enabled by the Palestinian ad hoc declaration, triggered the prohibition on Economic Support Fund assistance? If the prohibition has not been triggered, what steps would the Palestinians or the International Criminal Court have to take for the prohibition to take effect?

Answer. The administration strongly disagreed with the decision by the ICC Prosecutor to open a preliminary examination of the situation in "Palestine" and has indicated that it will continue to oppose actions against Israel at the ICC as counterproductive to the cause of peace.

At this stage, the administration does not believe that legislative restrictions on ESF assistance to the Palestinian Authority have been triggered. At the same time, in light of the latest developments, the administration has indicated that it is reviewing our assistance for the Palestinian Authority to ensure that it supports our policy.

It is difficult to predict how events may develop in the future and an assessment of whether particular restrictions have been triggered would need to take into account the specific circumstances as they may evolve. If confirmed, I would expect to work with Secretary Kerry and other officials at the State Department to monitor the situation closely.

Question #20. What are the defects in Palestinian claims to statehood or sovereignty? What steps is the United States taking or planning to take to challenge Palestinian accession to the Rome Statute and acceptance of ICC jurisdiction?

Answer. The view of the United States is that the Palestinians have not yet established a state and are not eligible to become a party to the Rome Statute. We remain committed to achieving a negotiated two-state solution that would result in two states living side by side in peace and security. We continue to believe that the conflict between the Israelis and the Palestinians ultimately should be resolved by the parties reaching an agreement on final status issues.

With respect to the ICC, the United States has made clear its opposition to Palestinian action in seeking to join the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. This step is counterproductive, will damage the atmosphere with the very people with whom Palestinians ultimately need to make peace, and will do nothing to further the aspirations of the Palestinian people for a sovereign and independent state. Our actions have included formal submission by the United States of a diplomatic note to the treaty depositary for the Rome Statute setting forth our view that the Palestinians are not eligible to become a party to the treaty, and of a notification to the Registry of the Court itself to make clear that the Palestinians are ineligible to accept the jurisdiction of the Court under Article 12(3) of the Rome Statute. The United States issued a public statement strongly disagreeing with the decision by the ICC Prosecutor to open a preliminary examination of the situation in "Palestine" and indicating we will continue to oppose actions against Israel at the ICC as counterproductive to the cause of peace. The United States continues to make our opposition known to the Palestinians and the international community.

Question #21. Do you believe Russia is in "material breach" of its obligations under the Intermediate Range Nuclear Forces Treaty? What are the differences between an activity described as a "material breach" versus a violation?

Answer. The international legal doctrine of material breach allows one party to terminate a treaty or suspend its operation in whole or in part based on inter alia another party's violation of a provision essential to the accomplishment of the object and purpose of the treaty.

The administration has made clear its extremely serious concerns about Russia's violation of the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces (INF) Treaty's ban on the possession, production, and flight-testing of intermediate range missiles. However, the administration does not believe it is in the interest of the United States to suspend the INF Treaty at this time. As a result, the administration has not invoked the doctrine of material breach. The administration's current efforts are focused on convincing Russia to return to compliance and preserving the viability of the INF Treaty, which the administration believes continues to serve U.S. and allied interests.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. RON JOHNSON, U.S. SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN

Senator JOHNSON. This hearing is called to order.

I would like to first recognize—the Ambassador from Georgia who is here in the audience today. Welcome.

I am pleased to be holding this hearing to confirm some very qualified individuals who are willing to serve this Nation in the capacity of Ambassadors to Kosovo, to Georgia, to Latvia, to Sweden, and to Croatia.

I have been in the Senate now for 4 years, on Senator Foreign Relations for 2½, and I just have to say that I have always been very impressed with the quality of career Foreign Service individuals and people who serve this Nation in the capacity of Ambassadors. From my standpoint, it is such an important position, in terms of being able to convey our values around the world. I hope you all take that responsibility—I am sure you will—very seriously, conveying that America, although we are not perfect, has been a phenomenal force for good in the world. I certainly always ask our Ambassadors to think of how you can utilize this committee, whether it is holding hearings or potentially passing resolutions to reinforce the work you are doing in those countries that you are representing America for. I also point out to our Ambassadors that you are representing those countries back to America. It is really a two-way street. I certainly appreciate your willingness to serve.

I know Senator Shaheen has a tight schedule, so I will not say anything further until I introduce the nominees.

Senator Shaheen.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. JEANNE SHAHEEN,
U.S. SENATOR FROM NEW HAMPSHIRE

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Welcome. I want to congratulate each of you on your nominations, and express my appreciation to you for your willingness to serve this country and take on these new responsibilities at such a critical time.

I also want to welcome all of your families who are here today. And I hope that you will introduce them as you are starting your statements.

You have all been named for ambassadorial posts in important countries in strategic areas of Europe. We are considering your nominations and our relations with these countries against the backdrop of an aggressive Russia in Europe's east and growing instability in its south, in the Middle East and in North Africa. I look forward to discussing a wide range of issues regarding the countries that you are going to serve, and other challenges facing Europe today, and hope that you will be confirmed to these very important posts.

Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator JOHNSON. Senator Kaine, would you like to make a comment, or—

Senator KAINE. No, thank you.

Senator JOHNSON. Okay.

With that, I will just introduce you one at a time before your testimony. And we will start from my right, going left, with Mr. Delawie. Mr. Greg Delawie is currently the Deputy Assistant Secretary within the Bureau of Arms Control, Verification, and Compliance at the State Department. He is a career member of the Senior Foreign Service, and he is the nominee for Ambassador to Kosovo.

Mr. Delawie.

STATEMENT OF GREGORY T. DELAWIE, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF KOSOVO

Mr. DELAWIE. Thank you very much, Chairman Johnson, Ranking Member Shaheen, Senator Kaine.

It is an honor and a privilege to appear before you today as the President's nominee to be Ambassador to the Republic of Kosovo. I deeply appreciate the confidence President Obama and Secretary Kerry have placed in me.

I am accompanied today by my wife, Vonda Delawie, a retired Foreign Service officer, and, further back, my daughter, Torrence, and my son, Fred, all of whom have shared with me the joys and challenges of bouncing from one country to the next. For all of us, it has been an honor to work for the American people and to represent them to the rest of the world.

The United States relationship with Europe's youngest democracy is based on a shared vision of Kosovo's legitimate place in a Europe whole, free, and at peace. Indeed, Kosovo has made remarkable progress since declaring independence. It has drafted and implemented modern laws, economic growth has been steady, and security throughout the country has improved, creating an atmosphere that allows the EU-led dialogue between Kosovo and Serbia to flourish.

Despite these significant achievements, Kosovo continues to face many obstacles. If confirmed as Ambassador, I will lead a whole-of-government U.S. effort to help it surmount the remaining challenges to its becoming a fully democratic, multiethnic, sovereign nation.

If confirmed, I will focus on three central and highly interdependent areas: strengthening the rule of law, increasing regional security, and promoting economic reforms. I would like to share what I see as our priorities, beginning with the rule of law.

First, corruption hampers Kosovo's democratic and economic development. The Government of Kosovo must develop a coordinated approach to addressing it. If confirmed, I will intensify interagency support for Kosovo's anticorruption efforts and help restore citizens' faith in their government.

Next, Kosovo must respond appropriately to allegations of serious crimes committed between 1998 and 2000. Kosovo must uphold its commitments by adopting, soon, the necessary legal measures to set up a special court to handle any potential indictments stemming from the ongoing investigation into the alleged crimes committed during this period. I will, if confirmed, encourage the Government of Kosovo to diligently support the court's judicial proceedings.

Third, Kosovo confronts a significant human trafficking problem, despite having good antitrafficking and victim-protection laws. If confirmed, I will work with Kosovo to implement these laws and intensify the fight against this modern form of slavery.

In terms of regional security, normalization of the Kosovo-Serbia relationship is a fundamental requirement for lasting stability in the Balkans. We continue to fully support the EU-led dialogue between Kosovo and Serbia, and full implementation of all elements of the April 2013 Agreement on Normalization. If confirmed, I will champion minority rights and promote integration throughout Kosovo. We must also find durable solutions for thousands of displaced persons.

I applaud Kosovo for its robust efforts to confront the threat posed by foreign terrorist fighters heading to Syria and Iraq, and Kosovo's participation in the counter-ISIL coalition. With U.S. assistance, the Government of Kosovo is improving its capacity to prosecute terrorism cases and developing a national plan for countering violent extremism. If confirmed, I will continue backing this important work.

Kosovo is in the process of transitioning from the Kosovo Security Force to the Kosovo Armed Forces. If confirmed, I will ensure that the United States guides this transition in a way that increases regional stability, strengthens democratic institutions in Kosovo, and positions it to qualify for eventual NATO membership.

Mr. Chairman, if confirmed, encouraging Kosovo's economic reform and development will be one of my highest priorities. This will be key to reducing high rates of poverty and unemployment, to promoting regional ties, and to expanding opportunities for U.S. firms. The lack of dependable electrical power is widely considered Kosovo's greatest obstacle to sustained economic growth. If confirmed, I will work with Kosovo to implement its energy strategy, including promoting significant growth in renewable energy.

This is a daunting agenda, but I know from my 30-plus years in the Foreign Service that I will not have to pursue it alone. I will be able to draw on the experience of the talented team of Americans and local staff in Embassy Pristina, as well as on partners from multiple agencies in Washington, and on so many others who want to see Kosovo succeed. I look forward to remaining in close consultation with the legislative branch and this committee to advance U.S. interests in the Balkans.

Mr. Chairman, if confirmed, I will do my utmost to promote a democratic Kosovo whose citizens trust its institutions, which is at peace with its neighbors, and which is making a sustainable contribution to the global economy.

Thank you very much for your attention. I hope you will place your trust in me and confirm me as Ambassador to Kosovo. I am happy to take any questions.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Delawie follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF GREG T. DELAWIE

Chairman Johnson, Ranking Member Shaheen, and members of the committee, it is an honor and a privilege to appear before you today as the President's nominee to be Ambassador to the Republic of Kosovo. I deeply appreciate the confidence that President Obama and Secretary Kerry have placed in me. I hope the committee and the Senate will share that confidence and confirm me. I am accompanied today by my wife, Vonda Delawie, a retired Foreign Service officer, my daughter, Torrence, and my son, Fred, all of whom have shared with me the joys and challenges of a lifetime bouncing from one country to the next. Wherever we have served, we have always remembered what an honor it is to work for the American people and to represent them to the rest of the world.

Our relationship with Europe's youngest democracy is based on a shared vision of Kosovo's legitimate place in a Europe whole, free, and at peace. The government and people of Kosovo deeply respect the United States, and are grateful for our role in ending the ethnic cleansing of the late 1990s. Over the past 16 years, with our strong support, Kosovo has made remarkable progress. Concrete examples of that progress include Kosovo's 2008 Declaration of Independence and the end of international supervision in 2012.

A democratic, fully sovereign, and multiethnic Kosovo must become an integral part of the international community. The United States has worked and continues to work closely with Kosovo toward that end. Although Kosovo faces enormous challenges in the interconnected areas of rule of law, regional security, and economic development, it has made progress. I would like to highlight some successes:

- ♦ With U.S. and international support, Kosovo has drafted and implemented modern laws to bring Kosovo's criminal legislation in line with international standards, to establish the rules of criminal procedure mandatory for court proceedings, and to reform the judicial system. The European Rule of Law Mission, EULEX, is building capacity in the judicial system, with the vital help of U.S. police, prosecutors, and judges.
- ♦ The NATO Kosovo Force, or KFOR, makes a multinational contribution to regional security. KFOR is uniquely trusted by Albanians and Serbs alike and its presence creates an atmosphere that allows the EU-led Dialogue between Kosovo and Serbia to flourish. The United States provides some 700 troops to KFOR.
- ♦ With U.S. guidance, Kosovo has moved up 42 places on the World Bank's "Ease of Doing Business" ranking, from 117th in 2011 to 75th in 2014. We have helped Kosovo privatize its national airport management and energy distribution companies. U.S. technical assistance helped Kosovo conclude a landmark $460 million public-private partnership deal for the Brezovica ski resort complex. Our USAID economic programs in the last 5 years alone have generated 17,500 new jobs, $330 million in increased sales, and $37.6 million in new revenues across multiple sectors.

As impressive as these recent achievements are, Kosovo continues to face many obstacles. If confirmed as Ambassador, I will devote my time and energy to leading a whole-of-government U.S. effort to help Kosovo surmount these obstacles. We will focus on measurable improvement in three central and highly interdependent areas [the three “R”s]: strengthening the rule of law, increasing regional security, and promoting economic reforms to reduce poverty, unemployment, and energy insecurity. I’d like to share just a bit about what I see as our priorities, beginning with the rule of law.

Rule of law

Corruption hampers Kosovo’s democratic and economic development. It deters investment, spurs emigration, and weakens confidence in public institutions. This in turn can create fertile ground for the growth of violent extremism. The Government of Kosovo must develop a more coordinated approach to addressing corruption, engaging all government agencies in the effort. If confirmed, I will intensify inter-agency support for Kosovo’s efforts to combat corruption and restore citizens’ faith in their government.

Kosovo must respond appropriately to allegations of serious crimes committed between 1998 and 2000. Under the auspices of the EU-established Special Investigative Task Force (SITF), an American prosecutor found evidence that indictable offenses were committed by a small number of former Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) senior leaders. Kosovo must resolve these serious allegations if it is to close this chapter of its history and move forward with democratic development and Euro-Atlantic integration. The government is currently adopting the necessary constitutional amendments, legislation, and agreements to establish a Special Court to adjudicate SITF cases in line with international standards. While I hope that these measures will soon be in place, I will, if confirmed, encourage the Government of Kosovo to maintain a high level of support and cooperation throughout the judicial proceedings.

Kosovo confronts a significant human trafficking problem. It has antitrafficking and victim-protection laws, as well as a shelter for victims, but does not yet meet minimum standards for enforcement of antitrafficking laws or victim protection. To improve enforcement, the U.S. Embassy has provided antitrafficking training to Kosovo Government officials, and successfully encouraged the foreign ministry to include training on human trafficking as part of the standard preparation for all of Kosovo’s diplomatic personnel. Kosovo’s fight against trafficking is also supported more generally by U.S.-organized training for law enforcement, prosecutors, and judges in Kosovo. If confirmed, I will continue the Embassy’s work with Kosovo to implement these laws and intensify the fight against this modern form of slavery.

Regional security

Normalization of the Kosovo-Serbia relationship is a fundamental requirement for enduring regional security and is effectively a precondition for Kosovo to be able to thrive over the long term. We continue to support the EU-facilitated Kosovo-Serbia High-Level Dialogue and full implementation of all elements of the April 2013 agreement on normalization, which have been a landmark joint achievement of U.S. and European Union diplomacy in the Balkans. This Dialogue success reflects great credit on the political leaders of Kosovo and Serbia alike for making tough compromises for the good of their two countries. Dismantling parallel structures and integrating the predominantly Kosovo Serb northern municipalities into Kosovo’s legal and institutional framework are key to full normalization of relations. Kosovo has made significant progress: voters of all ethnicities participated in recent municipal and parliamentary elections; municipal governments in northern Kosovo are now elected and constituted under Kosovo law; the main Serb political group, Srpska List, is part of the governing coalition. Outside the Dialogue context, bilateral contacts increasingly take place at all levels, from interministerial dialogue to joint training for customs officers. Some aspects of normalization remain difficult to achieve, such as the planned creation of an Association of Serb Majority Municipalities.

If confirmed, I will champion minority rights and promote integration throughout Kosovo, including more proportional minority representation in the national and municipal civil services. Kosovo must find durable solutions for the thousands of vulnerable persons displaced from Kosovo, many of whom now live in Serbia. U.S. programs assist some of those displaced in Serbia as well as returnees to Kosovo, but additional political and programmatic efforts are needed. Kosovo must also do more to protect the rights of Kosovo's other minorities, including the Roma, Ashkali, and Balkan Egyptian population, and promote their societal inclusion.

I applaud Kosovo for its robust efforts to confront the threat posed by foreign terrorist fighters heading to Syria and Iraq, and its participation in the Counter-ISIL Coalition. Kosovo passed legislation making it illegal for Kosovo citizens to join foreign terrorist organizations. Since November 2013, Kosovo authorities have arrested over 80 suspects for participation in, or recruitment for, terrorist groups in Iraq and Syria. With U.S. assistance, the Government of Kosovo is improving its capacity to prosecute terrorism cases. The U.S. is also supporting Kosovo's effort to develop a "whole of government" approach to countering violent extremism. If confirmed, I will continue our backing for this important work.

As recommended in its U.S.-facilitated Strategic Security Sector Review, Kosovo is in the process of transitioning from the Kosovo Security Force to the Kosovo Armed Forces, with the stated mission of protecting the nation's territorial integrity, providing military support to civil authorities in disaster situations, and participating in international peacekeeping operations. The KAF is expected to develop capabilities in line with EU and NATO standards. If confirmed, I will ensure that the United States continues to guide and support this transition in a manner that is consistent with increasing regional stability, strengthens democratic institutions in Kosovo, and positions Kosovo to qualify for eventual NATO membership.

Energy security and economic development

Mr. Chairman, I can guarantee that one of my highest priorities, if confirmed, will be to continue to press for the reforms needed to develop Kosovo's economy. This is key to reducing high rates of poverty and unemployment, to promoting regional ties, and to expanding opportunities for U.S. exporters and investors. The government's reform agenda includes strengthening the legal environment necessary to attract and retain foreign investors, who are already drawn by Kosovo's relatively young population, low labor costs, and abundant natural resources. Anticorruption efforts are also vitally important.

The lack of dependable electrical power is widely considered Kosovo's greatest obstacle to achieving sustained economic growth. The government has made it a priority to modernize and improve the energy sector through a comprehensive energy development and security plan. If confirmed, I will work with Kosovo to implement its energy strategy, help meet its commitment to join the EU's common energy market, and to have a substantial share of its energy come from renewable energy sources by 2020.

Conclusion

This is a daunting agenda. But I know from my 30-plus years in the Foreign Service that I will not have to pursue it alone. I will be able to draw on the experience of the talented team of Americans and locally employed staff at Embassy Pristina, the experienced partners from multiple agencies in Washington, support from the legislative branch, and the contributions of private Americans and citizens of so many other nations who also want to see Kosovo succeed.

Mr. Chairman, for the past seven decades, the United States has been committed to building a Europe whole, free, and at peace. The work is not complete, but we know that we can achieve success because we have already accomplished so much. The history of the last 25 years has demonstrated how important it is for the United States to be involved in the Balkans. If confirmed, I will do my utmost to promote our mutual goal: a democratic Kosovo whose citizens trust its institutions, which is at peace with its neighbors, and which is making a sustainable contribution to the global economy.

Thank you very much for your attention. I hope you will place your trust in me and confirm me as Ambassador to the Republic of Kosovo. I am happy to take any questions.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Mr. Delawie.

Our next nominee is Ambassador Ian Kelly. He is the nominee for the Ambassador to Georgia. Ambassador Ian Kelly is a career member of the Foreign Service and currently serves as the Department of State's Diplomat in Residence at the University of Illinois—Chicago. Prior to that, he served as U.S. Ambassador to the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe.

Mr. Kelly.

STATEMENT OF HON. IAN C. KELLY, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO GEORGIA

Ambassador KELLY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Senator Shaheen, Senator Kaine. I am deeply honored to appear before you as President Obama's nominee to be Ambassador to Georgia. It is a particular privilege for me to have a second opportunity to be considered by this committee and serve the American people in this way.

If confirmed, I pledge to devote all of my efforts to advancing U.S. interests and promoting the security of the American people.

For all 30 years of my government service, my wife, Francesca, has been by my side, and I am pleased that she is behind me right now.

Nearly 40 years ago, after spending several months studying in the U.S.S.R., I visited Tbilisi and was immediately struck by the vitality and independent spirit of the Georgian people. A few years later, the Georgian people were in the forefront of the movement to free the captive nations of the Soviet Union. We supported their desire for independence then, and we support it now.

The United States stands firm in its commitment to Georgia's sovereignty, territorial integrity, and independence. We condemn the ongoing occupation of Georgia's Abkhazia and South Ossetia regions by Russian forces. Furthermore, Russia's so-called "treaties" with the de facto authorities in Abkhazia and South Ossetia have absolutely no legitimacy.

In Georgia, an important principle is at stake: the right of all sovereign nations to choose their own alliances and associations. The United States and our allies support Georgia's Euro-Atlantic aspirations, including NATO membership and EU integration. No third party has the right to veto those aspirations.

If confirmed, I look forward to working with the Georgian Government and my Embassy colleagues in realizing these aspirations. I will also urge all Georgians who believe in their country's Euro-Atlantic goals to unite in supporting them and move their country forward.

On the road to Euro-Atlantic integration, Georgia has made substantial progress toward becoming a fully democratic state. Its 2012 and 2013 elections resulted in the first constitutional changes of government in post-Soviet Georgia. While progress has been real and substantial, more work needs to be done for Georgia to realize its goal of an environment fully conducive to political pluralism. We will work with all parties in Georgia to help ensure the next parliamentary elections are the freest and fairest in Georgia's history. The United States has been a partner in this effort, with a robust assistance program to help Georgia strengthen accountable government and consolidate its democratic institutions.

If Georgia's quest to integrate with the West is to succeed, it is critical that we improve the climate for trade and investment. This is an area where the government and opposition should be able to come together. Georgia needs to take advantage of the great opportunity that its association agreement with the European Union represents, particularly increased trade between Georgia and Europe through the agreement's deep and comprehensive free trade area.

The United States appreciates Georgia's growing role as a regional business, trade, and logistics hub, and its contributions to the revitalization of East-West trade routes along the New Silk Road connecting European and Asian markets. If confirmed, I will support Georgia's focus on the future, particularly economic development, to create jobs and contribute to the long-term stability of the country and the region.

Mr. Chairman, there is a lot of work to do. And if the Senate confirms my nomination, I look forward to rolling up my sleeves and getting down to it, advancing the mutual interests of the American and Georgian peoples.

Thank you. And I welcome your questions.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Ambassador Kelly.

Our next nominee is Mrs. Nancy Pettit. Am I pronouncing that right? Good. I am generally bad about that 30 percent of the time. [Laughter.]

Mrs. Pettit is our nominee for Ambassador to Latvia. She is currently the Director of the Western European Affairs Office within the State Department and is a career Foreign Service officer. Mrs. Pettit's past positions include the Director of Policy Planning and Coordination of the State Department's Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement and positions at posts in Kiev, Moscow, and Vienna.

Mrs. Pettit.

STATEMENT OF NANCY BIKOFF PETTIT, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF LATVIA

Ms. PETTIT. Mr. Chairman and distinguished members of the committee, I am honored to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to be the next U.S. Ambassador to the Republic of Latvia.

I am deeply grateful to President Obama and Secretary Kerry for the confidence and trust they have placed in me. If confirmed by the Senate, I pledge to devote my time, energy, and expertise to advancing America's interests in Latvia and strengthening relations between our two countries. I commit myself to working closely with the committee, your staffs, and your congressional colleagues to build on our shared interest in a strong and vibrant U.S.-Latvian partnership.

I would like to thank my family, friends, and colleagues for providing encouragement and support throughout my career. In particular, special thanks to my husband, Jim, the current Ambassador to Moldova; daughters, Sarah and Liz Pettit; and son-in-law, Josh Katzenstein, who are watching this online. I would like to introduce my sisters, Ellen Phipps and Barbara Bikoff, and brother, Russ Bikoff, who are here with me today. Thank you for coming.

I have spent the bulk of my 33-year career as a public servant working on issues related to Europe and Transatlantic relations. From my early days as a desk officer in the Office of Soviet Union Affairs to my most recent position as Director of the Office of Western European Affairs, I have devoted my professional life to advancing our shared vision of a Europe that is whole, free, and at peace. I believe these experiences have prepared me well to lead our mission in Riga, and, if confirmed, continue our work with the Republic of Latvia on a forward-looking, ambitious global agenda.

The United States and Latvia share a long history of friendship and cooperation. From the darkest days of the Soviet occupation through the end of the cold war, the United States commitment to the Latvian people never wavered. Following the restoration of Latvia's independence in 1991, the country embarked on an ambitious path toward Euro-Atlantic integration, joining NATO and the EU in 2004, adopting the Euro in 2014, and setting a powerful example for other countries aspiring to be free.

As allies, United States and Latvian troops have fought together and died together in Iraq and Afghanistan. Through our cooperation in Afghanistan, Latvia has become one of only seven countries certified as Joint Terminal Attack Controllers who provide essential targeting expertise for NATO combat missions. With U.S. support, Latvia has also increased its development assistance to countries around the world. Whether it is contributing humanitarian assistance to fight the spread of ebola or supporting international efforts to combat ISIL, Latvia has always stepped up to the plate.

Without a doubt, Russia's continued aggression in Ukraine has challenged the vision of a Europe that is whole, free, and at peace, threatening the security of Latvia and all of our regional allies. This is why the United States has deployed company-sized units to Poland and the three Baltic States since April 2014 under Operation Atlantic Resolve. Through President Obama's $1 billion European Reassurance Initiative, we will maintain this rotational presence for as long as necessary, and fund military infrastructure improvement projects. These efforts embody the United States commitment to Latvia's security under NATO's article 5.

Meanwhile, Latvia has enacted legislation to meet its NATO defense spending commitment of 2 percent of GDP by 2020, and is using its role as the current EU-presidency country to maintain international pressure on Russia while also offering Moscow a diplomatic off-ramp, should it choose peace over further escalation. Mr. Chairman, if confirmed by the Senate, I will continue to grow our partnership with Latvia to the benefit of our shared security and prosperity.

Latvia has made advancing the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership, TTIP, a top priority. If confirmed, I will work with my Latvian counterparts to build Latvian support for a comprehensive TTIP agreement that boosts economic growth, creates jobs, and sets a new standard for trade that reflects our shared values.

While Latvia has made great strides over the past 20 years implementing democratic reforms and rule of law, I believe more work needs to be done in the areas of combating corruption, addressing Holocaust-era legacies, such as Jewish communal property restitution, and taking advantage of Latvia's rich cultural diversity.

Almost 25 years ago, Latvia emerged from captivity seeking the democracy, prosperity, and security that we in the transatlantic community have enjoyed for nearly seven decades. Through sheer determination, sacrifice, and an enduring commitment to the principles of freedom, the Latvian people persevered and succeeded in building a vibrant, flourishing democracy. If confirmed, I promise to further enrich the bonds between our countries and continue confronting global challenges together as close partners and NATO allies.

Thank you again for the privilege of appearing before you today, and I look forward to answering your questions.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF NANCY BIKOFF PETTIT

Mr. Chairman and distinguished members of the committee, I am honored to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to be the next U.S. Ambassador to the Republic of Latvia. I am deeply grateful to President Obama and Secretary Kerry for the confidence and trust they have placed in me in this nomination. If confirmed by the Senate, I pledge to devote my time, energy, and expertise to advancing America's interests in Latvia and strengthening the relations between our two countries. I also commit myself to working closely with the committee, your staffs, and your congressional colleagues to build on our shared interest in a strong and vibrant U.S.-Latvian partnership.

I have spent the bulk of my 33-year career as a public servant working on issues related to Europe and trans-Atlantic relations. From my early days as a desk officer in the Office of Soviet Union Affairs to my most recent position as Director of the Office of Western European Affairs, I have devoted a considerable amount of my life to advancing our shared vision of a Europe whole, free, and at peace. I believe these experiences have prepared me well to lead our mission in Riga and—if confirmed—continue our work with the Republic of Latvia on a forward-looking and ambitious global agenda.

The United States and Latvia share a long history of unbroken friendship and cooperation. From the darkest days of the Soviet occupation through the end of the cold war, the United States commitment to the Latvian people never wavered. Following the restoration of Latvia's independence in 1991, Latvia embarked on an ambitious path toward euro-Atlantic integration: joining NATO and the EU in 2004; adopting the euro in 2014; and setting a powerful example for other countries aspiring to be free.

Today, Latvia is one of our most reliable and valued partners. As allies, U.S. and Latvian troops have fought together and died together in Iraq and Afghanistan. Through our cooperation in Afghanistan, Latvia has become one of only seven countries that are certified as Joint Terminal Attack Controllers (JTAC), providing essential targeting expertise for NATO combat missions. With U.S. support, Latvia has also increased its development assistance to countries around the world. For example, through the State Department's Emerging Donors Challenge Fund, the United States and Latvia are cofinancing a project in Uzbekistan to enhance export control and border security capabilities. Whether it is contributing humanitarian assistance to fight the spread of Ebola or supporting international efforts to combat ISIL, Latvia has always stepped up to the plate. In short, Latvia is a global partner of first resort.

Without a doubt, Russia's continued aggression in Ukraine has challenged the vision I referenced earlier of a Europe whole, free, and at peace, threatening the security of Latvia and all of our allies in the region. This is why the United States has deployed company-sized units to Poland and the three Baltic States since April 2014 under Operation Atlantic Resolve. Through President Obama's $1 billion European Reassurance Initiative (ERI), we will sustain this persistent, rotational presence for as long as necessary. ERI will also fund military infrastructure improvement projects, including at Latvia's Lielvarde airbase and Adazi training grounds. These efforts embody the United States commitment to Latvia's security under NATO's Article 5. Meanwhile, Latvia has enacted legislation to meet its NATO defense spending commitment of 2 percent of GDP by 2020 and is using its role as the current rotating EU Presidency country to maintain international pressure on Russia, while also offering Moscow a diplomatic off-ramp should it choose peace over further escalation.

Mr. Chairman, if confirmed by the Senate, I will continue to grow our partnership with Latvia to the benefit of our shared security and prosperity. Latvia has made advancing the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (TTIP) a top priority of its EU Presidency. If confirmed, I will work hand in hand with my Latvian counterparts to build Latvian support for a comprehensive TTIP agreement that boosts economic growth, creates jobs, and sets the global gold standard for trade that reflects our shared values. In 2014, bilateral trade in goods between the United States and Latvia totaled $702 million. While significant, I think there is a tremendous potential to further cultivate our economic ties. If confirmed, I will work to increase our bilateral trade and investment. While Latvia has made great strides over the past 20 years implementing democratic reforms and rule of law, I believe more work needs to be done in the areas of combating corruption, addressing Holocaust-era legacies such as Jewish communal property restitution, and taking advantage of Latvia's rich cultural diversity.

Almost 25 years ago, Latvia reemerged from captivity seeking the democracy, prosperity, and security that we in the transatlantic community have enjoyed for almost seven decades. Through sheer determination, sacrifice, and an enduring commitment to the principles of freedom, the Latvian people persevered and succeeded in building a vibrant, flourishing democracy. If confirmed, I promise to further enrich the bonds between our countries and to continue confronting global challenges together, as close partners and NATO allies. Thank you again for the privilege of appearing before you today, and I look forward to answering your questions.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Mrs. Pettit.

Our next nominee is Ms. Azita Raji. She is our nominee for Ambassador to Sweden. Ms. Raji has served as a member of the President's Commission on White House Fellowships since 2013. She is also trustee of Barnard College and a member of the advisory board of the Social Enterprise Program at Columbia Business School. As a former investment banker, Ms. Raji specialized in European emerging markets.

Ms. Raji.

STATEMENT OF AZITA RAJI, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE KINGDOM OF SWEDEN

Ms. RAJI. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Senator Shaheen, and Senator Kaine.

I would like to begin by recognizing my parents for their wisdom, strength, and encouragement—which are fundamental to my being here today. I am deeply grateful to my husband, Gary Syman, who is here. And four out of our five daughters are here, and I am grateful to all of them. Our son-in-law, and especially our grandson, Theo—7-year-old Theo is here. And I have to admit that I am a little bit nervous today, because I really have not had a chance to prepare for his questions, which will undoubtedly come afterward. [Laughter.]

Ms. RAJI. I am here as a woman whose family endured the life-altering upheaval of the Iranian Revolution and found new hope and new life in the United States of America. Throughout my life, while working or studying in countries as different as Iran, Switzerland, Japan, and the United States, I arrived at the realization that I had been, in principle and sensibility, quintessentially American all along. So, I have never taken for granted the freedom to speak my mind, the protection of the rule of law, or our belief in unity within diversity, which is expressed in our country's de facto motto, E Pluribus Unum. That is the belief that has made me effective in what I have chosen to do in business, in philanthropy, in the political arena, and even in my own family life.

So, it is specially meaningful for me to find myself here before this distinguished committee, trusted by President Obama and Secretary Kerry to represent the United States of America, and to be asked to do so in Sweden, a valued partner and close friend of the United States, but also a country where respect for the rule of law, individual freedoms, human dignity, and gender equality are hallmarks of national identity and defining pillars of government policy.

So, if confirmed, I pledge and look forward to working closely with you to enhance our cooperation with Sweden by focusing on four priorities:

First, Sweden is an engaged and effective partner of the United States and NATO in promoting global peace and security. Our close cooperation in Ukraine as it fights against Russian aggression and seeks to implement ambitious reforms is vital and greatly appreciated. Elsewhere, whether in Africa, Afghanistan, Iraq, Syria, and Kosovo, or in fighting ISIL, corruption, and global terrorism, Sweden is a valued and reliable partner. So, if confirmed, I will work to further strengthen our bilateral partnership with Sweden in security, as well as supporting their cooperation with NATO.

Second, as a strong and long-standing economic partner of the United States—Sweden is the 11th-largest direct foreign investor and one of the fastest growing and largest investors per capita in the United States. Our economic partnership with Sweden supports over 190,000 American jobs. And, if confirmed, I will continue our focus on promoting bilateral trade and investment, specially focusing on emerging industries like clean energy, biotech, and information technologies.

Third, we have a very strong cooperation on environmental issues with Sweden, including our cooperation in the increasingly important Arctic region. If confirmed, I will continue our focus on addressing environmental challenges with Sweden, stewardship of the Arctic region, and scientific research. I also look forward to engaging with our Swedish partners both in the private sector and the government, to explore opportunities to leverage Sweden's energy leadership in the EU and its global leadership in environmental and clean energy technologies to advance our shared interest in an energy secure Europe.

Fourth, our friendship with Sweden is anchored in the close affinity between our peoples and the shared commitment that we have to democratic ideals and institutions around the world. That is manifested through our development cooperation, where Sweden is a strong and global leader, and we advance our interests in democracy promotion, human rights, gender equality, governance, and transparency around the world. There are—today there are 4 million Americans in the United States who claim a Swedish descent. They contribute to our culture and society and have been part of our economic development and success from the beginning by building successful companies, such as Nordstrom, Walgreens, and Greyhound. If confirmed, I will dedicate myself to advance this enduring friendship by taking a multistakeholder approach to developing partnerships outside of the government between our peoples and institutions and leveraging technology and public-private partnerships to reach new audiences.

Finally, we have an excellent, strong, dedicated, and talented Embassy team in Stockholm. And, if confirmed, I look forward to working with them and facilitating their continued success and being their biggest advocate. Their safety, as well as that of all Americans, will be my first priority, and most important priority.

Thank you very much. I look forward to your questions.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Raji follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF AZITA RAJI

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Shaheen, and distinguished members of the committee.

I would like to begin by recognizing my parents for their wisdom, strength, and encouragement, which are fundamental to my being here today. I am grateful to my husband, Gary Syman, for his unwavering support, and to our five daughters and seven grandchildren, for the joy and inspiration they bring me.

I appear before you as a woman whose family endured the life-altering upheaval of the Iranian Revolution, and found new hope and new life in the United States of America. Throughout my life, while living, studying or working in countries as different as Iran, Switzerland, Japan, Italy, France, and the United States, I arrived at the realization that I had been, in principle and sensibility, quintessentially American all along. And so, I have never taken for granted the freedom to speak my mind, the protection of the rule of law, and the opportunities to benefit from the similarities and differences that create the transformative mosaic that is America. Our country's de facto motto, E Pluribus Unum, speaks to our belief in unity within diversity, a belief that has made me effective in what I have chosen to do in business, in philanthropy, in the political arena, and even in my own family life. And it also speaks to a world that in its differing views has never been in greater need of commonality, kinship, and partnership.

Which is why it is an especially meaningful honor for me to find myself here, before this distinguished committee, and to have the trust of President Obama and Secretary Kerry to represent and serve the United States of America, and to be asked to do so in Sweden, an important partner and close friend of the United States and a country where respect for the rule of law, individual freedoms, human dignity and gender equality are hallmarks of national identity and defining pillars of government policy.

If confirmed, I pledge to serve our country to the best of my ability and to work closely with you to deepen the friendship and expand the cooperation between the United States and Sweden. I will focus on four priorities.

First, security challenges. Sweden is an engaged and effective strategic partner of the United States and NATO in promoting global peace and security. Our close cooperation with Sweden in support of Ukraine, as it fights against Russian aggression and seeks to implement ambitious reforms, is vital and greatly appreciated. Elsewhere, whether in Afghanistan (where Sweden made significant contributions to the ISAF mission, and currently provides assistance to Resolute Support Mission and support to Afghan democracy), or Africa (where Sweden is one of the largest contributors to Power Africa and to the global fight against Ebola), or Syria, Iraq, and Kosovo, or in fighting ISIL, global terrorism and corruption, Sweden is valued and respected as a reliable partner in advancing peace. If confirmed, I will seek to further strengthen our bilateral cooperation in addressing regional and global security challenges, and to support Sweden's partnership with NATO.

Second, economic prosperity. As a strong and long-standing economic and trading partner since 1783, Sweden is the 11th-largest direct investor and one of the fastest growing and largest investors per capita in the United States. Our economic partnership supports over 190,000 American jobs across 50 States. If confirmed, I will continue our focus on promoting bilateral trade and investment opportunities, particularly in emerging industries, such as information technology, biotech, and clean energy.

Today our economic focus must not just be bilateral, but also multilateral. The Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership is an important building block of the wider trade policy agenda between the EU and the United States and will be an important focus of our work in the coming months. Sweden is a strong supporter of TTIP and a logical partner in this effort, having relied on free trade to become one of the world's most globalized, competitive, and innovative modern industrial economies. If confirmed, I will encourage Sweden to highlight and leverage its economic success in creating prosperity through trade to promote our shared objective of a comprehensive TTIP agreement.

Third, environmental challenges. The United States and Sweden have an active partnership on environmental and climate change issues, including our close cooperation in the increasingly important Arctic region. Sweden chaired the Arctic Council from 2011 to 2013, and its accomplishments included a historic marine oil pollution preparedness and response agreement. The United States assumed chairmanship of the Arctic Council in April 2015. If confirmed, I will prioritize our continued bilateral cooperation on environmental and climate change issues, stewardship of the Arctic region, and scientific research. As a global leader in environmental sustainability and clean energy technologies, Sweden derives more than half of its energy from renewable sources, making it less dependent on energy imports than most EU countries. If confirmed, I will engage with our partners in Swedish Government and private sector to explore innovative ways to leverage Sweden's energy leadership in the EU to advance our shared priorities in addressing climate change and European energy security.

Fourth, shared values. Our growing friendship with Sweden remains anchored in the genuine affinity between our peoples and our strong commitment to democratic values and institutions, a commitment expressed in our global partnership to protect and advance human rights and civil society. It is a friendship based on a shared heritage that dates back to 1638, when the first generation of Swedish immigrants arrived on the shores of what is now the State of Delaware. Today over 4 million Americans claim Swedish descent. They continue to enrich our culture and society and have been part of our economic success from the beginning, by building such successful companies as Walgreens, Greyhound, and Nordstrom. If confirmed, I will dedicate myself to deepen this enduring friendship, by encouraging understanding of our similarities and respectful debating of our differences, and by taking a multi-stakeholder approach to building innovative partnerships outside the government between our peoples and institutions and leveraging technology and public-private partnerships to connect with new audiences.

Finally, if confirmed, I look forward to meeting the talented and dedicated professionals of our Embassy in Stockholm. I will support their continued success and be their biggest advocate, as we work side by side to advance our vision of a deeper friendship and stronger partnership between the United States and Sweden. The safety and security of our team, and that of all Americans in Sweden, will always remain my top priority.

Thank you very much for your consideration. I look forward to your questions.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Ms. Raji.

Now, our next nominee is Ms. Julieta Noyes. She is our nominee to become Ambassador to Croatia. Ms. Noyes currently serves as Deputy Assistant Secretary within the Bureau of European and Eurasian Affairs at the State Department, and is a career member of the Foreign Service. Her past positions include Deputy Chief of Mission at the U.S. Embassy to the Holy See and Director of the Office of Multilateral and Global Affairs at the State Department's Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor.

Ms. Noyes.

STATEMENT OF JULIETA VALLS NOYES, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF CROATIA

Ms. NOYES. Mr. Chairman, Senator Shaheen, Senator Kaine, it is a privilege to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to be Ambassador to the Republic of Croatia.

I am honored by the confidence placed in me by the President and by Secretary Kerry. If confirmed, I look forward to working with this committee and with the Congress to advance United States-Croatian relations.

I am a first-generation American, the daughter of Cuban refugees who had to come to this country to build a new life. And I am profoundly grateful for the opportunity to repay that debt with service to our great Nation.

It is a personal pleasure for me to be here with my husband, Nick, a recently retired Foreign Service officer, and our children, Alexandra, Nicholas, and Matthew. With 30 years as a Foreign Service family, we have many happy memories of times spent together overseas and here at home.

For the last 2 years, I have managed U.S. relations with the European Union and worked on trade, energy, security, and other issues with the EU. I have also overseen the work of U.S. Embassies in 15 Western European countries, managing a broad range of political, economic, security, and consular issues, and doing broad outreach. My work with nine NATO countries on security issues and defense sales has provided valuable lessons that I would apply, if confirmed, as the Ambassador in Croatia.

As Deputy Chief of Mission to the Holy See, I learned how to engage the Catholic leadership, which is important in Croatia. And in all my assignments, I have worked hard to develop and empower my teams to foster high performance and high morale. I would do the same in Zagreb.

Mr. Chairman, our bilateral relationship with Croatia is strong and productive. Just last week, Assistant Secretary Victoria Nuland met with Foreign Minister Vesna Pusic to discuss how our partnership can advance our many common interests. In April, Embassy Zagreb and private-sector partners hosted the fifth Brown Forum in Croatia, a regional conference convened to focus on how to spur entrepreneurship and increase trade and investment between our countries and with the region.

Croatia has come a long way since its hard-won independence, becoming a NATO member in 2009 and the European Union's 28th and newest member in 2013. The citizens of Croatia deserve warm congratulations for all that they have achieved.

And Croatia has generously shared the lessons that it has learned assisting its western Balkan partners and neighbors in their aspirations for Euro-Atlantic integration. We encourage the Government of Croatia to press forward and, in so doing, help address the remaining bilateral and regional legacies of the Balkans conflict.

Croatia is an active and committed EU member. A Croatian commissioner leads the EU's work on international cooperation and development. Croatian members of the European Parliament serve on the critical budget, economic, foreign affairs, and other committees. Croatia's leaders have endorsed a U.S./EU Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership.

As a reliable NATO ally, Croatia makes valued contributions to global security. We appreciate its commitment, first, to the international Security Assistance Force and now the Resolute Support Mission in Afghanistan, as well as to the Kosovo Force, where Croatia provides valuable helicopter lift support. Croatia is a member of the global coalition to fight ISIL, and it was among the first countries to send observers into Crimea, and continues to provide monitors in eastern Ukraine for the OSCE mission. Brave Croatian men and women are serving in 11 peacekeeping missions around the world.

Croatia now enjoys a mature democratic society, yet there is more to be done. It continues to be challenged by sluggish growth and far too high unemployment. The Croatian Government has recognized the urgent need for reforms to welcome business investment, eradicate excessive redtape, and increase transparency and predictability for businesses.

If confirmed, I will seek to further solidify our partnership with Croatia, building on the exemplary work of our outgoing Ambassador and my good friend Ken Merten and our terrific country team in Zagreb.

As Ambassador, I will promote several interconnected priorities in Croatia: fostering economic growth and prosperity, helping Croatia realize its potential to become a regional energy hub, strengthening the capabilities of a willing security partner, and advancing regional stability. If confirmed, I will encourage Croatia's contributions to U.S.-EU relations in pivotal areas, such as transatlantic trade, energy security, and collaboration in the digital sphere. I will also actively uphold our strategic alliance in NATO, the Resolute Support Mission in Afghanistan, the Counter-ISIL Coalition, and more.

Mr. Chairman, Senator Shaheen, Senator Kaine, thank you for this opportunity to appear before you. I would welcome any questions.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Noyes follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF JULIETA VALLS NOYES

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it is a privilege to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to serve as the United States Ambassador to the Republic of Croatia. I am honored by the confidence placed in me by the President and Secretary Kerry. If confirmed, I look forward to working with this committee and the Congress in advancing U.S. interests in Croatia.

I am a first generation American, the daughter of Cuban refugees who built a new home in the United States, and I am profoundly grateful for the opportunity to repay that debt with service to our great country. It is a personal pleasure to be accompanied today by my husband, Nick, a recently retired Foreign Service officer, and our children, Alexandra, Nicholas, and Matthew. As a Foreign Service family of 30 years we treasure many happy memories from our time living in Italy, Panama, Spain, Guatemala, and Mexico, as well as here at home.

For the last 2 years, I have managed U.S. relations with the European Union and have worked on trade, energy, security, and other issues in the EU. I also have overseen the work of 12 U.S. embassies and 19 consulates, covering 15 Western European countries, managing a broad range of political, economic, security, and consular issues, and carrying out outreach to publics and governments. My work with nine NATO members on security issues, defense sales, and participation in the Pentagon's review of force realignment in Europe has provided me useful lessons for directing the mission in Croatia. As Deputy Chief of Mission at our Embassy to the Holy See, I learned how to engage the Catholic leadership, which is important in Croatia. In all my assignments, I have worked hard to develop and empower my teams, and to foster high performance and strong morale; I would do the same in Zagreb.

Our bilateral relationship with Croatia is strong and productive. Just last week, Assistant Secretary Victoria Nuland met with Foreign Minister Vesna Pusic to discuss how our partnership can advance our many common interests. In April, the United States Embassy and private sector partners hosted the fifth Brown Forum in Croatia, a regional conference convened to focus on how to spur entrepreneurship and increase trade and investment between the United States, Croatia, and the region.

Croatia has come a long way since its hard-won independence, becoming a NATO member in 2009 and the European Union's 28th and newest member in 2013. The citizens of Croatia deserve warm congratulations for all they have accomplished. And Croatia has generously shared the lessons it has learned, assisting its western Balkan neighbors in their aspirations for Euro-Atlantic integration. The United States supports the strides Croatia has made toward nurturing regional cooperation. We encourage the Croatian Government to continue to press forward and, in so doing, help address the remaining bilateral and regional legacies of the Balkans conflict.

Croatia is an active and committed EU member. A Croatian Commissioner leads the EU's important work on international cooperation and development. Croatian members of the European Parliament participate on the critical Budget, Economic, Foreign Affairs and other committees. Croatia's leaders have endorsed a U.S.-EU Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership, or TTIP.

As a reliable NATO ally, Croatia makes valued contributions to global security. We appreciate its commitment to the former International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) and now in the Resolute Support Mission in Afghanistan, and in the Kosovo Force (KFOR), where Croatia provides vital helicopter lift support. Croatia is a member of the Global Coalition to Counter ISIL. It was among the first countries to send OSCE observers into Crimea, and continues to provide monitors for eastern Ukraine. Brave Croatian men and women are participating in 11 peacekeeping missions around the world.

Croatia now enjoys a mature democratic society, yet there is more to be done. It continues to be challenged by sluggish growth and far-too-high unemployment. The Croatian Government has recognized the urgent need for reforms to welcome business investment, eradicate excessive redtape, and increase transparency and predictability for businesses. The United States will support Croatian reforms that lead to sustainable economic growth and prosperity. We want to strengthen the foundation for mutual economic expansion and trade relations.

If confirmed, I will seek to further solidify our partnership with Croatia, building on the exemplary work of our outgoing Ambassador and my good friend, Ken Merten, and our country team in Zagreb. As Ambassador, I will promote several interconnected priorities in Croatia: championing economic growth and prosperity, helping Croatia realize its potential to become a regional energy hub, strengthening the capabilities of a willing security partner, and fostering regional stability. My experience working directly with the European Union and its western European members has afforded me insights into our highest objectives with Europe. If confirmed, I will foster Croatia's contributions to U.S.-EU relations in pivotal areas such as the transatlantic trade deal, energy security, and collaboration between our countries in the digital sphere. I will also actively uphold our strategic alliance in NATO, the Resolute Support Mission in Afghanistan, the Counter-ISIL Coalition, the State Partnership Program with the Minnesota National Guard, and more.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, thank you for this opportunity to appear before you. I welcome any questions you may have.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Ms. Noyes.

Again, thank you all for your testimony and your willingness to serve our Nation. I would also like to join our ranking member, Senator Shaheen, in welcoming all of the family members here in the committee room, as well as those watching online.

So much of a country's success, whether it is for peace and stability or otherwise, really relies on economic prosperity. What I would like to do is go right down the panel, starting with you, Mr. Delawie. I would like each nominee to talk about the economic opportunities in the countries that you are going to represent the United States to, as well as the economic challenges. What is the greatest opportunity for cooperation between your country and the United States?

Mr. Delawie.

Mr. DELAWIE. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Right now, the economic situation in Kosovo is improving. It is one of the poorest countries in Europe. Gross domestic product is about $7 billion a year. It has significant challenges, as I outlined in my testimony, but it also has significant opportunities. It has a very young population. It has significant natural resources that remain largely untapped. And it has a very, very talented population, which is demonstrated by the fact that the biggest export of Kosovo is its talented population that is elsewhere in—mostly in Western Europe, and that is sending billions of dollars in remittances home every year.

The opportunities for cooperation are, at present, limited by corruption, which I addressed in my testimony. And that is something that we have to work with the Kosovar Government to address. And I will do so, certainly vigorously, if confirmed.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Mr. Delawie.

Ambassador Kelly.

Ambassador KELLY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for that question.

Our bilateral assistance program is very much focused on trade and investment and enhancing opportunities for American businesses to invest in Georgia. And we very much see a growing economy as very much a part of our foreign policy priority promoting stability and security in the region.

I think, in terms of the greatest opportunities for Georgia, I think it is—I mentioned, already, its recent agreement with the EU, to increase trade with the EU. And I think that is a tremendous opportunity for Georgia. And also, I think the—Georgia's strategic position as—between Asia and Europe—and I think that it can really gain a lot from being this East-West corridor for energy, in particular, but also for transporting goods from Central Asia to Europe. And, if confirmed, I look forward to working with you and with the Congress in identifying more opportunities.

Thank you.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Ambassador Kelly.

Mrs. Pettit.

Ms. PETTIT. Thank you, Senator, for that question.

Deepening trade and investment with Latvia is one of the highest priorities in our relationship. Last year, our total bilateral trade investment was about $700 million. If I am confirmed, I will work to expand that.

In terms of opportunities, I think the Northern Distribution Network, where Riga served as a hub for materiel going to Afghanistan, could possibly be developed into a new economic opportunity for Latvia. That is an area I would explore with them, if confirmed.

Thank you.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Mrs. Pettit.

Ms. Raji.

Ms. RAJI. Thank you.

In many ways, we already have a very strong and long-lasting trade and investment partnership with Sweden that goes back to 1783. We have a robust—as I mentioned earlier, they are a strong foreign investor in the United States, and we have a—strong trade relationships.

Bilaterally, the opportunities lie in looking at industries where there is potential. For example, in the smart-grid industry in the United States, we are one of the leaders—export leaders—I think, the third-leading export leader of transmission and distribution equipment, electrical equipment. It is an area that was identified by the National Export Initiative as an area of high growth and potential for the United States to grow. Because of the interest, internationally, in investing in dated electricity infrastructure, that is an area that we can explore with Sweden that they possibly could be interested, as well as energy efficiency in the built environment. So, that is just to pick one sector.

Sweden presents a successful example in building prosperity through trade. It has managed to transform its once agricultural society over the last 150 years into one of the world's most prosperous, competitive, and innovative modern industrial economies, largely relying on trade, where it is now over 50 percent of its GDP.

So, we will explore the bilateral opportunities. But, I think there is also a multilateral opportunity. Because of Sweden's strong example in building prosperity through trade, I will look for opportunities to explore with our Swedish partners to see how we can highlight and leverage that strong example in Europe in reaching our shared objective of a Transatlantic and Pacific partnership.

And finally, I want to just say that my background in business and finance, especially in emerging markets, have made me realize the important connection between economic prosperity and political stability and civil society. So, I share Secretary Kerry's view that foreign policy is—economic policy is foreign policy. And if confirmed, I will use my skills in business and finance towards economic statecraft to open new markets for the United States, encourage foreign investment in the United States, and increase exports.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Ms. Raji.

Ms. Noyes.

Ms. NOYES. Thank you, Senator

Croatia has suffered from recession for the last 6 years, and is only barely now coming to a position of positive growth. Its unemployment rate ranges from about 18½ percent for the general population to about 48 percent for youth. Its deficit is 5.7 percent of GDP, and its debt-to-GDP ratio is about 85 percent. Clearly it has a lot of economic issues that it needs to address in addition to its difficult investment climate.

But, Croatia also has some real advantages. It is breathtakingly beautiful country, very attractive to tourists. If confirmed, I hope that you will come to visit. [Laughter.]

Ms. NOYES. But, it is also—it has an enormously motivated, educated population. Its recent admission into the European Union has given it additional resources and expertise that it can draw upon. And Croatia also has energy resources of its own. It is these energy resources that the Croatian government is trying to expand on, in creating and making itself into a regional energy hub.

If confirmed, I would seek to work with the Croatian Government to tackle some of these very difficult economic issues, working with our government here, but also with the European Union and with Brussels and with other countries in the neighborhood, because a number of these are issues that need to be tackled regionally.

Thank you.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Ms. Noyes.

Senator Shaheen.

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Delawie, I had the opportunity to visit Kosovo in February of 2010 on their Independence Day—their second Independence Day. And I remember the people on the streets waving flags from Kosovo and from America, thanking Americans. It was very moving to see that.

I was very encouraged when I heard that there had been an agreement reached between Kosovo and Serbia to lessen tensions between the two countries. Can you give us an update on how the relationship with Serbia is going and what additional progress has been made since that accord was signed?

Mr. DELAWIE. Thank you very much, Senator Shaheen. And, if confirmed, I certainly hope you will come back and see what has changed since February of 2010.

The relationship between Kosovo and Serbia is going pretty well. We are firm supporters of the EU-sponsored dialogue. There was an agreement in 2013 that lead—is on a path toward normalization of relations between the two countries. There has been a lot of progress in the last couple of years. The police are integrated now. The Serbs and Albanians are integrated in the same police department. Judicial structures are merged. The Serbian parallel courts in the northern chunk of the country are no longer taking new cases. There are liaison offices between the two countries. And the EU has been very enthusiastic in helping to promote this, using the idea of a potential path for both countries ultimately into EU integration.

The new EU High Rep. Mogherini was in Kosovo, actually, in March. She helped initiate some additional progress on judicial issues. So, progress is going pretty well, and I think we can all be happy of the role that the United States has played in promoting that progress.

Thank you.

Senator SHAHEEN. I agree, I think we should be very proud of that.

Can you also talk about the Serbian church? Because, as I remember, one of the concerns was the fact that many of the churches—Serbian churches were a concern, in terms of potential protection in the future.

Mr. DELAWIE. That is certainly one of the issues the Embassy in Pristina pays close attention to. They are talking about it. Protecting the Serbian orthodox heritage in Kosovo is certainly one of the key elements of this normalization dialogue, something our Embassy pays close attention to. And, as far as I know, that has been going relatively well. And I believe the Embassy has even put some money from the Ambassador's fund into remodeling and protecting some of the Serbian orthodox churches in Kosovo.

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you. That is very encouraging.

Ms. Noyes, can you—you mentioned the importance of Croatia in the region, in the Balkans, in terms of its future economic prosperity. Can you talk about what you, as Ambassador, would be able to do to encourage economic prosperity with the region, and also what the United States is doing to promote economic prosperity?

Ms. NOYES. Thank you, Senator.

Yes. One of the things that Croatia is seeking to do is to become a regional energy hub. It has resources of its own. It provides about 60 percent of its own gas for domestic use, but it also has a great geographic location and some infrastructure that already exists that would allow it, if it could build an LNG import terminal—and they are looking at building one on the Krk Island—that would allow it to be a hub for the exportation—or the importation of LNG, and then the exportation to other countries in the region. This would not only help with regional needs, but it would also reduce reliance on Russian gas.

And Croatia has also been very engaged and active within the EU and in NATO in advancing the Euro-Atlantic integration of its partners, and seeking to have greater relations between the EU and other countries in the Balkans.

So, if confirmed, I would certainly seek to promote both of those objectives—the LNG terminal, the creation of the regional energy hub—but also to support Croatia's advocacy and its emphasis on making all of the countries of the Balkans oriented toward the West, both in terms of their democratic behavior, and their economic growth and their free-market orientation.

Senator SHAHEEN. And to what extent has Croatia been affected, or has it been affected, by the financial difficulties in Greece?

Ms. NOYES. Well, Senator, Croatia and Greece are the only two countries in the EU that have suffered from a recession for the last 6 years. In each case—and I know this a bit on Greece because of my current job, working with the European Union—there are factors in each country that are specific to the country, but there is no doubt that both countries were also affected by the greater economic downturn in Europe. As we see now with dropping energy prices—frankly, the drop in the value of the Euro—we are starting to see growth turning around in Europe. And, in fact, we are now seeing Croatia coming out of the recession and doing better.

So, they are not necessarily linked to each other, but they both have been affected by greater trends, as well as by macroeconomic issues that they need to tackle independently, both in Zagreb and in Athens.

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you.

Mr. Kelly, one of the issues that I have had the opportunity to raise with Georgian officials when they have been here is concern about the perception that arrests of some former political leaders raise questions about the rule of law and the judicial system in Georgia. And to what extent do you think it is—what can we do, in the United States, to encourage Georgia to continue to move forward with democracy and to address the potential to see former political opponents as subject to arrest, as opposed to what they are, which is former political opponents?

Ambassador KELLY. Well, thank you very much for that question.

Our top foreign policy priority for Georgia is helping it attain its aspirations, join Euro-Atlantic institutions. And, of course, we would not want to see anything degrade that trajectory toward Euro-Atlantic integration. And in our bilateral contacts, I know that Ambassador Norland has had many good consultations with the Georgian Government, and we have stressed the importance of not even having the perception of any kind of political use of any kind of judicial levers.

Having said that, we also have a very strong cooperation with Georgia to ensure that the judicial process, in all cases, is transparent and accountable. And I think Georgia has made great strides in ensuring the independence of the judiciary.

But, you have put your finger on one of the issues, that, if you do confirm me, that I am going to keep a very close eye on. So, thank you very much for raising that.

Senator SHAHEEN. Well, thank you. And my time is up, but let me just say how much I appreciate the close relationship that America and Georgia have had, and their contributions to our efforts in Afghanistan have been significant. So, I think they have made tremendous progress, and want to see them continue to succeed.

Ambassador KELLY. I second that. Thank you.

Senator JOHNSON. Senator Kaine.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Ms. Noyes, you talked a little bit about the security cooperation between the U.S. and Croatia. And I not—have not been to Croatia, so, when my staff and I were digging—it is pretty impressive. Croatia participates in U.N. peacekeeping operations in the Golan Heights, Cyprus, Sudan, Liberia, Lebanon, Western Sahara, and the Kashmir, supports NATO-led Kosovo Force, and also the ISAF in Afghanistan. Kind of feel funny saying that and saying, Are there things we can do to even strengthen the relationship? I am very impressed with the commitment of Croatia to peacekeeping through U.N. and other multinational organizations. But, are there remaining opportunities for us to deepen that tie?

Ms. NOYES. Thank you, Senator.

Yes, Croatia definitely punches above its weight on the security front. It participates in 11 peacekeeping operations. It is been with us in Afghanistan since 2003. It provided ammunition and weapons to both Iraqi forces and the peshmerga. It assisted with the removal of Syrian chemical weapons. And it is absolutely a critical support to KFOR through its provision of lift support.

That said, there is always more that can be done. And, if confirmed, I would look forward to working further with the forces in Croatia. One of the biggest priorities that we have there is to help Croatia modernize its equipment. It still has too much reliance on Soviet-era equipment, and still relies on Russia for spare parts and, in some cases, servicing of that equipment. So, one of my priorities, if confirmed, would be to help Croatia modernize its forces and its equipment to make them more interoperable with NATO forces, and to continue to support the efforts of this very willing ally.

Senator Kaine. Great.

Ms. Raji, I look forward to working with you on the economic issues. Virginia has a huge amount of direct investment from Swedish companies. The only vehicle manufacturing plant in Virginia is a Volvo truck plant in Dublin, VA.

But, I want to ask you about something else. You talked a little bit about the Arctic Council. I—this is something that I was not too aware of before I came to the Senate, but the United States has just taken on the chairmanship of the Arctic Council for the coming year. Talk a little bit about initiatives that you think the United States and Sweden can do together as the Arctic really changes in its strategic importance.

Ms. RAJI. Senator, thank you for that question.

The Arctic region, in fact, is an area of increasing importance. With the melting of the Arctic ice, there are new opportunities and challenges in shipping, commerce, trade, environmental protection, fishing, hunting, and the livelihood and the living conditions of the 4 million indigenous Arctic people that live there.

Correctly stated, we just took over the chairmanship of the Arctic Council. We have a very strong partnership with Sweden in the Arctic region and other environmental issues that I mentioned. But, focusing on the Arctic Council, we have a scientific cooperation with Sweden. We were cofounders of the Clean Air and—Climate and Clean Air Coalition, which focuses on reducing so-called short-lived climate pollutants, or black carbon, which is a concern in the Arctic. And Sweden has particular expertise and knowledge in that area. We cooperate with them on that, and on that Council. Scientific research is another area.

And, broadly speaking, I would say that we share the values that the Arctic Council is the preeminent intergovernmental forum for cooperation. The Arctic has always been a region of no conflict and cooperation on scientific research and environmental issues. And all of the members are interested in maintaining that practical cooperation in our mutual goals.

Senator Kaine. Great. Thank you so much for that.

Ms. Pettit, I am interested in Latvia, with all of the challenges we deal with on this committee with Russian influence and their sort of more bellicose recent posture. Latvia—I guess, 38 percent of Latvians claim Russian as their mother tongue, and there are strong Russian cultural ties. What is the view of the, kind of, Latvian population about Russian expansionism in the Baltic region and elsewhere in Europe?

Ms. Pettit. Thank you, Senator, for that question.

As you said, there are a large number of Russian speakers in Latvia. However, those Russian speakers are very supportive of Latvia's participation in Euro-Atlantic institutions. For example, the political party that represents these Russian speakers believes that Latvia should be a member of the EU. And there are many advantages to Latvia and all Latvians being members of the EU.

I think one of the areas of concern is Russian propaganda. The Latvian Government is addressing this issue. They are addressing it by increasing the number of Russian-language TV programs. They have a new television studio for their Russian-language programs. The United States is working closely with Latvia on this. VOA and RFE/RL now have a nightly Russian language program that is available online for Russian speakers who are looking for objective, truth-based media. And I—if confirmed—will continue to work with Latvia to address these issues.

I think the message we have to share is—as Azita mentioned and Julieta mentioned—is our strength through diversity. And we have a great message to share with Latvia.

Thank you.

Senator Kaine. Thank you.

Mr. Kelly, talk a little bit about the delicate situation that Georgia's in with Russia in the—a posture that they are in, contrary to international law, on the two areas of Georgia that you described. Georgia still has been a participant with NATO in missions. I think there is one underway, or recently, Noble Partner, on the borders of Russia, 300 American soldiers accompanied by 14 Bradley tanks transported across the Black Sea from Romania. NATO is scheduled to open a training center in Georgia later this year. How does Georgia manage this with the challenge with Russia now? And what can we do to shore them up?

Ambassador Kelly. Thank you very much, Mr. Senator.

I think you actually identified one of the most tangible examples of the way we are shoring up their aspirations to join NATO, and that is the training exercises going on right now, Noble Partner, where we have hundreds of American troops from 173rd Brigade who are helping the Georgians become interoperable with the NATO Response Force. And that is a—it is a real token of our support for this bedrock principle that every nation has the right to choose its own alliances. And Georgia has overwhelmingly chosen to join NATO.

So, much of our bilateral assistance, of course, is designed to help Georgia become interoperable with NATO. You also, I think, very sensitively pointed out the very difficult position they are in, with 20 percent of their territory under occupation and with the Russian troops there, digging in, showing no signs of living up to the terms of the cease-fire agreement in 2008 which called for Russian troops to return to their previous positions. They are actually hardening the border, putting up fences and surveillance cameras. They are denying monitors from—the international community, like the EU monitoring mission, from coming in, which was also agreed to in the 2008 cease-fire.

And I think, in general, we have to keep saying, over and over again, that we support their aspirations to integrate with Europe—to join NATO, to integrate with the EU. And, of course, we need to have tangible support, as well. And we are doing it. The Congress has made Georgia one of the largest recipients of foreign military financing. It is also one of the largest recipients of IMET, the International Military Education and Training. So, we really are, I think, you know, walking the walk as well as talking the talk. And, if confirmed, I will, as I say, continue to make this our priority, to support their Euro-Atlantic aspirations.

Senator KAINE. Thank you.

Mr. Chair, could I ask Mr. Delawie just one brief question? Thank you. I am over my time, but—

Mr. Delawie, I am curious about Kosovo, the number of foreign fighters that go from Kosovo into the ISIL theater in Syria and Iraq—per capita, among the highest in the world. I am puzzled by that. Could you educate the committee about why that is? What is it about Kosovo—it is geographic or sort of ideological positioning that leads that to be the case?

Mr. DELAWIE. I do not think there is one easy answer, Senator Kaine. They are—Kosovo is the poorest country in Europe. Unemployment, around 40 percent; among youth, it is probably in the neighborhood of 60 percent. So, there is this economic factor. There are some—some people are going for ideological reasons. Some people are going for excitement and adventure, unfortunately. So, there are a variety of challenges that Kosovo faces.

Fortunately, Kosovo passed a law, just 2 months ago, in March, that would criminalize many of the aspects of going to Syria and Iraq to join with ISIL. And we are working with the Embassy in Pristina very hard with the justice authorities, the police authorities, to train prosecutors, and to help the government get a grip on the problem.

Senator KAINE. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

Appreciate all of your testimony.

Senator JOHNSON. Senator Murphy.

Senator MURPHY. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Good to see you in the Chair's spot. I enjoyed our 2 years sitting at the head of this subcommittee.

And we have got a really fantastic group of nominees here today, all going to very interesting countries, many of them in transition. So, a few questions.

Maybe, Mr. Kelly, I will start with you to extend this conversation about Georgia's future. So, I am a believer that we are starting to compromise NATO's open-door policy without a real, tangible plan for enlargement that includes Georgia, understanding that it is a very difficult nut to crack with respect to the occupied and contested territories. But, that does not seem impossible. And so, I want to ask you, sort of, What are the preconditions from our standpoint right now, from the U.S.'s standpoint, as to what has to happen in order for Georgia to get NATO membership? And do you foresee a circumstance in which you could give the portion of Georgia that is not contested, is not occupied, membership, or give a type of membership with reservations concerning the extent of the occupied and contested territories?

Ambassador KELLY. Thank you. Thank you very much.

Of course, you know NATO is a consensus organization with all 28 members. I think, you know, the United States has a good story to tell, in terms of our support for Georgia's desire to join NATO. And I think that we really are doing a lot to help them prepare for membership. And so, I think a lot of what we have to do, and what we have to continue to do, because I think the Embassy is already doing it, is highlighting what the United States is doing, in terms of training Georgians, of integrating them into NATO missions. But, you have—you know, you have put your finger on the really hard part of it, of course, which is the fact that Russia occupies 20 percent of Georgia and has compromised its territorial integrity. And so, I think that we just have to stay focused on the overall goal of supporting Georgia in becoming more interoperable with NATO, in reforming its defense institutions—and we have multiple programs through State and through the Defense Department to do that—and also be very steadfast in rejecting Russia's illegal occupation of 20 percent of Georgia's territory.

Senator MURPHY. But, does that not effectively result in Russia having veto power over Georgia's accession to NATO? If we do not hold out the possibility that there is a pathway for them to join while the occupation continues, do we not essentially put the decision in Russia's hands?

Ambassador KELLY. I do not think that Russia or any other country has a veto on a country's desire to join NATO. We do have good—I think, a good dialogue through NATO with Georgia, through the NATO-Georgia Commission. I think that the path is clear to any aspirant to join NATO. Obviously, the occupation of South Ossetia and Abkhazia is a very difficult issue. But, this overarching principle, that all countries should be able to choose their own alliances and associations, is something that has to be really defended, and the United States has to do everything it can—and, of course, is doing everything it can—to help Georgia realize its aspirations.

Senator MURPHY. I think we have been halfhearted in our attempts to lead the way to Georgia's membership in NATO. I hope that we change at least the volume of our tune.

Mr. Delawie, you got big shoes to fill. Ambassador Jacobson has done really important work for us at a very critical time. I visited with her in Pristina last fall at a moment in which I think she showed immense discretion in forcing the different parties surrounding the government to make their own decisions about a coalition moving forward, resisting the temptation that sometimes comes with that position to get too involved.

I also visited the American University there, and one of the answers to the question about the roots of extremism is a real sense of hopelessness amongst young people in Kosovo, you know, large numbers of youth unemployed and very little access to higher education. The American University there is a unique asset that provides a pathway into the middle class for young people in Kosovo. I just hope that you will support their mission, support the work that the new government is trying to do to expand opportunities for higher education. It is really a—it is really stunning, the lack of opportunities to get advanced degrees in Kosovo. AUK is, right now, their best bet to do that, but, hopefully, that experience can be modeled, moving forward.

Mr. DELAWIE. Thank you very much, Senator.

I know Ambassador Jacobson has done an incredible job. And I am looking forward to doing my best to fill her shoes. But, it will be hard.

Fortunately, USAID has devoted a fair amount of resources to supporting the access to higher education for Kosovar citizens. You are right, there is a long way to go. And I certainly agree with you about this—the hopelessness. We have—we saw another example of that, not just in the ISIL direction, but also, in the winter, there were a fair number of Kosovo citizens who were attempting to emigrate, basically, to Germany. Another symptom of that. So—

Senator MURPHY. And I think we need to help the Kosovar Government understand that this is not just about law enforcement. They have really done some impressive things when it is come to standing up law enforcement's capabilities. But, they have, I think, got to understand the holistic strategy.

Just one question, Ms. Raji. Good to see you. I do not know if this question has been asked, but—Sweden stepped up their participation with NATO. They are obviously—have agreements with NATO through memorandums of understanding for training and military exercises. Important, given the forward positioning of Russia in and around the region, to have that dialogue continue. I assume that they are going to continue to be an active participant with NATO in whatever joint exercises are appropriate, and that we will encourage them to increase their level of military integration so that we can send a coordinated message, even with non-NATO partners, to Russia that, if they are going to continue to run submarines and jet planes over our friends' heads and to our friends' shores, that there is going to be a coordinated response.

Ms. RAJI. Great to see you, Senator Murphy, and thank you for that question.

As you know, Sweden is not an ally of NATO, but it is one of the—only five recently designated Enhanced Opportunities Partners. It has made significant contributions to the missions of NATO, and, in fact, other multilateral institutions, such as the EU and the U.N. in peacekeeping and military exercises and so forth.

With regard to NATO, Sweden currently has troops under allied command in Kosovo and Afghanistan, and played a significant role in protecting the no-fly zone in Libya in 2011. And it continues to increase, as you said, some of its involvement with NATO in the exercises. For example, it joined the NATO Response Force in 2013, which will enhance joint capabilities. And it did sign an MOU for a Host Nation Support Agreement in 2014, which will regulate exercises and military transits on its soil, that has not been ratified, however.

We very much have a strong partnership with Sweden on NATO missions. And, if confirmed, I will continue their cooperation and partnership with NATO.

Senator MURPHY. Great.

If I—just one quick question I forgot to ask Mr. Delawie. The Riga summit starts tomorrow. There was an expectation that there might be an extension of visa liberalization for Georgia coming. It does not look like that may happen. I hope I—I ask you whether it is going to be part of your mission to continue to work with Georgia and with the Europeans to try to—I am sorry—Mr. Kelly—I am sorry—to Mr. Kelly—although you can respond to that question, as well, if you would like—

[Laughter.]

Senator MURPHY [continuing]. Mr. Delawie. Be happy to know what the Kosovar's Ambassador's position is on Georgia visa liberalization. [Laughter.]

Mr. Kelly, what is the role that we can play in trying to help them come to a better place on the question of visa liberalization, vis-a-vis the European Union, post-Riga?

Ambassador KELLY. Yes, thank you very much.

Yes, as I said before, the—our—really, our top foreign policy priority is to keep Georgia on a good trajectory. And I think that it will be important that the Euro-Atlantic community sends signals that Georgia is progressing on this path. And I think this will help address some of the concerns you mentioned before, obviously, about NATO's open door, too.

But, we—you know, a lot of our assistance program has been sort of reoriented to help Georgia implement the terms of the Association Agreement. And that is because it is really in our U.S. national interests that Georgia become integrated into the European Union and into European institutions, in general. So, we can help them bilaterally, with the EU, obviously, in pushing Georgia's case forward. But, we can also help them with our bilateral assistance program. And I know that we are doing that.

And if I am confirmed, I will make it a real priority to ensure that that trajectory stays on a nice steep path toward Euro-Atlantic integration. And, of course, that includes the EU.

Senator MURPHY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for allowing me to go over time.

Senator JOHNSON. Not a problem.

I am going to ask one other question before I close it out, so did you have any further questions before—

Senator MURPHY. That is okay.

Senator JOHNSON. Okay.

This question is really directed at Ambassador Kelly and Mrs. Pettit, but if any of the other nominees have anything to add, please do.

My first congressional delegation trip was in the spring of 2011, before I was on the Foreign Relations Committee, and we visited Georgia, Ukraine, Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia. Back in 2011, the representatives from all of those countries were talking about what Russia was trying to do to undermine those fledgling democracies.

We are seeing that, obviously, in spades today. I personally do not think Vladimir Putin is looking for off-ramps. I think Vladimir Putin is looking for on-ramps. I am highly concerned about Latvia. I am not sure what he is going to be doing in Georgia. I was up, by the way, right at the border, and I was able to look through binoculars at the Russians in the occupied areas.

The question I have is, What concerns do you have, in terms of what Russia is doing in Latvia or within the region, to undermine those democracies?

We will start with you, Mrs. Pettit.

Ms. PETTIT. Thank you, Senator.

I do not think I can say it any better than President Obama said it in Tallinn, right before the Wales summit in 2014, when he said that the defense of Tallinn and Riga and Vilnius is as important as the defense of Berlin, London, and Paris. And that is our very strong message.

Latvia is our NATO ally. And, through our bilateral security assistance and through our NATO activities—including the Baltic air policing, the IMET program, our FMF program, Section 2282, all of the Wales commitments that we are in the process of implementing, the establishment of the command-and-control unit in Latvia—each of the Baltic States will get a command-and-control unit, the Very High Readiness Task Force that is also being implemented—there is a lot going on. And I think this sends a very strong message of deterrence.

Senator JOHNSON. Again, that is what we are doing—

Ms. PETTIT. Right.

Senator JOHNSON. I am more interested, in terms of your knowledge of what Russia is doing. And I will throw out there the propaganda. I know I have gone over to Ukraine a couple of times with Senator Murphy, and with the bipartisan delegations, and it has always struck me how the Senators are shocked at how effective Vladimir Putin and Russia's propaganda is without any pushback, or virtually no pushback, on the part of the West.

Ms. PETTIT. Well, I—

Senator JOHNSON. So, again, I guess I am looking just for your knowledge of what Russia—

Ms. PETTIT. Right.

Senator JOHNSON [continuing]. Is doing—

Ms. PETTIT. There—

Senator JOHNSON [continuing]. To undermine—

Ms. PETTIT. There is—

Senator JOHNSON [continuing]. The democracy.

Ms. PETTIT. There is plenty of propaganda directed towards Latvia's Russian-language speakers. This is absolutely true. But, Latvia is addressing this issue. As I mentioned earlier, they have greatly enhanced the number of TV news programs they offer in the Russian language. Russian journalists are leaving Russia and moving to Riga. For example, a former editor of one of the biggest news platforms in Russia opened her own new platform in Riga, where there is press freedom. And she has gotten literally thousands and thousands of hits on her Russian-language Web site. The BBG, here in the United States, is working with—the Broadcasting Board of Governors—is working with Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty and making available new Russian-language programs online. Our goal is provide objective, truth-based media to the Russian speakers in Latvia. This is an issue of concern also within the EU. And I believe, that shortly, the EU will also be working on this matter and addressing this matter.

If I am confirmed, I will travel to the Russian-speaking areas of Latvia and engage directly with this population. And I think this is a great opportunity, again, to discuss or to present the U.S. view that there is strength in diversity.

Senator JOHNSON. Okay, again, I am concerned with the hybrid or ambiguous war. And obviously, propaganda is part of that. Maybe the first part. But, there may be other actions Russia might be taking.

Ambassador Kelly, are you aware of anything not even just in Georgia, but elsewhere in the Baltic States or—that ring of democracies around Russia? We obviously know it is happening in Ukraine.

Ambassador KELLY. Yes, I—you know, as someone who has followed Russia for many, many years, and am a bit of a Russia media junkie, I am appalled by the kind of—well, let us just—let us call it by its real name—by the lies that are being spread about what our intentions are in supporting these countries and about what Russia is actually doing in some of these countries.

And in the case of Georgia, I think that they are ramping up their outreach to Georgia, in terms of media. There are some NGOs that are active in Georgia. And I think this gets back to what Senator Murphy was talking about, about our concern about the—maintaining the level of support within Georgia. And we do not want to see that level fall. And so, we would be concerned about messages that run contrary to our values, that we are seeing in the Russian media. And we need to, as I say, ensure that Georgians appreciate that we stand behind them in supporting their desire to join NATO and to join European institutions.

And I know that Ambassador Norland has been very active in highlighting U.S. assistance for Georgia, in all of our public pronouncements, highlighting our support for their territorial integrity. And, as somebody who has dealt quite a bit in public diplomacy, I, too, will relish being able to go around Georgia and really show the Georgians that we are behind them.

Senator JOHNSON. Okay.

Any of the other nominees want to add anything on that subject? Sure. Mr. Delawie.

Mr. DELAWIE. Thank you, Senator, just very briefly.

Two of the major streets in Kosovo, in Pristina, are named George W. Bush Street and Bill Clinton Street. I do not think there will be fertile ground for any—too much Russian propaganda, in Kosovo at least.

Senator JOHNSON. We rely on you to make sure that remains that way.

Senator Murphy.

Senator MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, one final question that I meant to ask Ms. Noyes.

The Croatians are currently flying Russian-made helicopters and are very interested in buying American-made Black Hawk helicopters, something that I spoke to their Defense Minister about when I was there, on the same trip where I visited Pristina. Can you commit to us that you are going to work with the Croatians to make a significant upgrade to their helicopter fleet, such that they are no longer reliant on Russian technology?

Ms. NOYES. Thank you, Senator.

I am delighted to report that this year we are working with Croatia to get them some Kiowas. And I understand that discussions are underway with regard to the Black Hawks. And, if confirmed, I would be delighted to support those efforts.

Senator MURPHY. Black Hawks are much better than Kiowas. [Laughter.]

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Senator Murphy.

Again, I would like to thank all of our witnesses for your testimony, for your thoughtful questions to our answers, and for your willingness to serve this Nation. I would like to thank your families for their willingness to support your service to this Nation.

If there is anything we can, as a subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, do to help you succeed in your mission as our Ambassadors to those countries, please let us know. We really do not think often enough about how what this committee says, what we do, and resolutions we may be able to pass, how that can actually aid you. Think of this committee and keep in communication with us. Again certainly wish you the best.

With that, the record will remain open for questions and statements until the close of business on Friday.

This hearing is adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 3:40 p.m., the hearing was adjourned.]

NOMINATION

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 17, 2015

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, DC.

Gayle Smith, of Ohio, to be Administrator of the United States
Agency for International Development

The committee met, pursuant to notice, at 2:03 p.m., in room SD-419, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Hon. Bob Corker (chairman of the committee) presiding.

Present: Senators Corker, Risch, Johnson, Gardner, Perdue, Cardin, Menendez, Coons, Murphy, Kaine, and Markey.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. BOB CORKER, U.S. SENATOR FROM TENNESSEE

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

And I am going to go ahead and get rolling, and I am sure that Senator Cardin will be here in just a minute.

USAID oversees 20 billion dollar's worth of aid to over 100 countries. It is a very important organization. Gayle Smith, who has been nominated, will have 18 months to have an impact on this organization. And I will say that I think it is beneficial that she has served with the President's National Security Council and therefore inside the main building. She is someone that is trusted and not coming from the outside, and I know has been involved in these kinds of issues for a long, long time.

I do hope that in your testimony you will talk about some of the priorities that we have had here. I think you know the committee passed out on a unanimous vote an effort to end modern slavery. I know it is something that you for years have been involved in and care about, but I hope you will speak to that in your testimony.

I think you also know that there is a significant effort underway to reform the Food for Peace program. I know we talked about that some in our office. It is very important to many members. I think you know that some of us share the belief that it is a travesty that we are not serving the millions of people that could be served by reforming this program and being held hostage to various groups that benefit in ways that are not beneficial to the people that we are trying to serve.

And then thirdly, Power Africa. There is a significant effort underway to make sure that the millions of people that do not have electricity even in their homes are able to do that in Africa, in particular, as I mentioned. And in the past, we have had some environmental issues that have said that, look, it is more important. We would rather people not have any electricity in their homes if it is going to produce 1 ounce of carbon, which is not exactly, I think, a policy or a value that most Americans adhere to. And I think we have been able to get to a place that achieves a balance between the environmental concerns, which I understand are real, but also the concern for human beings. And hopefully, you will talk a little bit about that.

I am glad that in your testimony you are going to refer to the tremendous need to deal with the organizational issues within the organization. This year we hope to pass into law a State Department authorization. We passed it out of committee unanimously last week. We are attempting, still, to deal with that through NDAA. At some point we need to do the same with USAID, but you internally will be able to do much.

So, I want to thank you for being here. I want to thank you for your willingness to serve. Again, I am glad the executive branch has nominated someone that has the kind of experience that you have.

And when Senator Cardin arrives he may want to make some opening comments, but I think short of that it would probably be best—unless one of the other committee members would like to address—if you would go ahead and give your testimony. We would appreciate it.

STATEMENT OF GAYLE SMITH, NOMINATED TO BE ADMINISTRATOR OF THE U.S. AGENCY FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Ms. SMITH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you for your comments on those important issues.

Chairman Corker, Senators Menendez and Coons, I am honored to appear before you today as the nominee for Administrator of the United States Agency for International Development. It is truly a privilege for me to come before this committee, and I am grateful to President Obama and Secretary Kerry for their trust and confidence.

I would also like to thank my family: my mother who is watching from Columbus, OH; my brother Jay and sister-in-law Marianne; Ben and Sarah; and my father and sister, who though they may not be with us, will always be part of a family that has continued to provide me with support and encouragement.

Since being nominated, I have had the opportunity to consult with several members of this committee, and I have appreciated your guidance and counsel to ensure that USAID remains the world's top development agency.

In this time of great need and opportunity, USAID is working with a diverse array of partners to end extreme poverty, foster sustained and inclusive growth, and promote resilient democratic societies both as an expression of our values and to transform them into peaceful, open, and flourishing partners of the United States. These are principles that have driven my own approach to international development across a 35-year career and principles that I will continue to uphold as Administrator.

If confirmed, it would be an honor and privilege to support the USAID mission alongside the more than 9,000 selfless men and women who serve the American people in some of the world's most challenging environments.

Should I have the honor of being confirmed, I will pursue four priorities.

First, I will focus the Agency on programs that are achieving results and will be selective about initiating new commitments. I will work with Congress to institutionalize successful programs, including Feed the Future, Power Africa, and our efforts in maternal and child health.

Second, I will provide the leadership, guidance, and tools needed to enable USAID staff in Washington and in the field to deliver against our most urgent priorities. This includes expanding the Agency's work on democracy, rights, and governance. This also means expanding the Agency's impact on human trafficking and on corruption, laying the groundwork for the success of a critically important strategy for Central America, and ensuring an equally important transition in Afghanistan.

Third, if confirmed, I will act quickly to ensure that the Agency maintains global leadership and agility in responding to increasingly complex humanitarian crises. When a natural disaster strikes or a humanitarian catastrophe is imminent, USAID should be among the first on the ground to help those in need. I will also work with this committee and other stakeholders to pursue meaningful food aid reform that will enable us, as you, sir, suggest, to reach more people more quickly and while maintaining our historic partnership with U.S. farmers and maritime.

Fourth and perhaps most important, I will focus on further strengthening the institution. This will involve expanding the capacity of the Agency to mobilize resources and engagement from other partners; to draw on science, technology, and innovation to address development challenges; and to increase investment in effective local solutions.

Strengthening USAID also means tackling some of the management and operational challenges facing an agency that manages resources across more than 80 countries, often in complex environments. The Agency must ensure that American taxpayer dollars are spent responsibly. It must identify successful programs, learn from prior mistakes, apply lessons learned, and share best practices, all in an open and transparent way. If progress is not being made, it must take corrective action or terminate projects.

But strengthening USAID also means supporting and listening to its people both here and overseas. These are men and women with knowledge, institutional memory, and invaluable insight. Indeed, they take on some of the most daunting tasks and aspirational missions one can imagine, all on behalf of our Government and our country. It is my goal to give them the visibility, respect, and gratitude that they deserve.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I thank you for considering my nomination, and I look forward to your questions. Thank you very much.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF GAYLE E. SMITH

Chairman Corker, Ranking Member Cardin, and members of the committee, I am honored to appear before you today as the nominee for Administrator of the United States Agency for International Development. It is a privilege to come before this committee, and I am grateful to President Obama and Secretary Kerry for their trust and confidence.

I would also like to thank my family—my mother, who is watching from Columbus, Ohio, my brother Jay and sister-in-law Marianne, Ben and Sarah, and my father and sister, who though they may not be with us, will always be part of a family that has supported and encouraged me—a family from which I draw strength and humor each and every day.

Since being nominated, I have had the opportunity to consult with several members of this committee, and I have appreciated your guidance and counsel to ensure that USAID remains the world's preeminent development agency. From the humanitarian emergency in Syria and ongoing conflict in eastern Ukraine, to the pressing needs in Central America and the Ebola virus in West Africa, today's world demands creative solutions to increasingly complex problems.

Over the past two administrations, we have seen unprecedented bipartisan support for the Agency's key initiatives, from global health and food security to humanitarian assistance and science and technology—as well as a recognition that the Agency's work must be informed by a rigorous use of evidence and data to guide decisionmaking. These are principles that have driven my own approach to international development across a 35 year career, and principles that I will continue to uphold as Administrator, if confirmed.

In this time of great need and opportunity, USAID is working with a diverse array of partners to end extreme poverty, foster sustained and inclusive growth, and promote resilient democratic societies, both as an expression of our values and to help build them into peaceful, open, and flourishing partners of the United States.

If confirmed, it would be an honor and privilege to support the USAID mission alongside the selfless men and women who serve the American people in some of the world's most challenging environments.

With more than 9,000 men and women and a strong field presence in over 80 countries, USAID is uniquely positioned to flexibly respond to humanitarian crises with agility and to provide enduring leadership to solve the world's most intractable development challenges—all for less than 1 percent of the federal budget.

Over the past 5 years, USAID has embraced a new model of development shaped by data and evidence that brings together an increasingly diverse community—private sector companies, entrepreneurs, local civil society organizations, universities, NGOs, and communities of faith—to deliver meaningful results.

By using assistance to support capacity-building and reform critical policies, the Agency has led a government-wide effort to mobilize domestic and foreign private sector investments, including more than $10 billion of private commitments through Feed the Future and more than $20 billion through Power Africa. USAID has worked with entrepreneurs through its Global Development Lab to develop new technologies that address longstanding development challenges. It has partnered with a vibrant implementing partner community here in the United States that has made its own pledges to support reconstruction in Haiti, economic development in Africa, and global food security. And it has elevated the importance of local solutions, investing in the role and wisdom of partners on ground.

Against this backdrop, USAID has responded to an unprecedented number of humanitarian crises spawned by earthquakes and typhoons, droughts and famines, the Ebola epidemic, and chronic and new conflicts. In the past year, the Agency has simultaneously operated an unprecedented five Disaster Assistance Response Teams, bringing new knowledge and creativity to bear, whether by building resilience even while providing emergency relief or adapting data and technology to enable a faster and more efficient response.

USAID has taken great strides to improve operations, increase transparency, embrace accountability and ensure that the Agency is both responsive and responsible. There is much more to be done, but as someone who has worked with and observed this Agency and our foreign assistance programs for decades, I can sincerely offer that it is well on a path of reform and revitalization that is yielding and can yield greater and more potent returns for the United States and millions of men, women, and children around the world.

I believe that we share the view that both development and responding to humanitarian crises are in our national interests and that these pursuits reflect our values. I also believe that we share the view that we need a strong, capable, effective, and responsible USAID to pursue these interests and values. It would be an honor to serve as the USAID Administrator, and to turn my qualifications and experience to the task of leading the Agency.

Over a 35-year career in development and international affairs, I have spent two decades in the field, much of that time well outside capital cities. As a journalist for the BBC, American and European outlets, I spent months at a time in active war zones, covering conflicts that had escaped the world's attention.

I have consulted for the World Bank, UNICEF and major American foundations. I have worked with several NGOs, including members of the World Council of Churches when they mounted a cross-border emergency relief operation during the Ethiopian famine. I cofounded two NGOs, and today, the Modernizing Foreign Assistance Network and the ENOUGH Project remain active and effective advocates for a robust U.S. policy in support of development and human rights.

I have served on a congressional commission—the Helping to Enhance the Livelihood of People around the Globe (HELP) Commission—which was established to review U.S. foreign aid, and I worked for USAID, based in East Africa. I have served two Presidents, as Senior Director for African Affairs on President Clinton's National Security Council staff and as Senior Director for Development, Democracy, and Humanitarian Affairs under President Obama. I have traveled and worked with former President Carter and provided advice and assistance to President George H.W. Bush's National Security Council staff.

Over the last 6 years, as a member of the Obama administration, I have coordinated administration policy on global development and foreign assistance programs, democracy, governance and anticorruption efforts, and humanitarian crisis response.

Early in my tenure, I spearheaded efforts to develop the Presidential Study of Global Development Policy and the first-ever Presidential Policy Directive on Global Development, which elevated development alongside defense and diplomacy as pillars of American foreign policy.

Responding to humanitarian crises has been a significant focus of my time at the National Security Council, including the Nepal earthquake, major typhoons in Asia, the Ebola outbreak in West Africa, and ongoing conflicts in Syria and Iraq.

Working with departments and agencies, including USAID, I have assumed the primary role at the National Security Council for all major development priorities, including Feed the Future, Power Africa, ending the HIV/AIDS epidemic, maternal and child health, the Open Government Partnership, and the Partnership on Illicit Finance. I have co-lead, with colleagues, the development of the Global Health Security Agenda, the U.S.-Africa Leaders Summit, and the President's Stand with Civil Society Initiative.

Should I have the honor of being confirmed, I will pursue four priorities.

First, I will focus the Agency on programs that are achieving results and will be selective about initiating new commitments. Further, I will work with Congress to institutionalize these programs. I will also work with this committee and other stakeholders to pursue meaningful food aid reform that will enable us to reach more people, more quickly, in times of need—all while maintaining our historic partnership with U.S. farmers and maritime.

Feed the Future and the New Alliance for Food Security and Nutrition have together elevated food security on the global agenda, registered direct impact on reducing poverty and improving nutrition, and mobilized billions of dollars in direct assistance and private resources. In 2013 alone, Feed the Future reached more than 12.5 million children with nutrition interventions and helped more than 7 million farmers and food producers use new technologies and management practices on more than 4 million hectares of land. If confirmed, I will ensure that Feed the Future and related nutrition programs continue to deliver these evidence-based results.

With a long-term goal of doubling access to cleaner, reliable, and efficient electricity in sub-Saharan Africa, Power Africa has already brought more than 4,100 megawatts worth of power transactions to financial close and raised over $20 billion from more than 90 private sector partners. At the U.S.-Africa Leaders Summit, President Obama tripled our initial goal to 30,000 megawatts, aiming to bring electricity to 60 million homes and businesses in Africa. If confirmed, I will support Power Africa as it closes more power transactions, partners with additional businesses, and expands into new countries.

If confirmed, I will continue the Agency's leadership in the global effort to end preventable child and maternal deaths. USAID has led an international coalition that developed targeted action plans in 24 priority countries that will save the lives of 15 million children and 600,000 women by 2020. I will also work closely with the Office of the Global AIDS Coordinator, the Centers for Disease Control, the National Institutes of Health, and international and local partners to ensure that USAID does all it can to contribute to a goal that is within reach: ending the HIV/AIDS epidemic.

Second, I will provide the leadership, guidance, and tools needed to enable USAID's staff in Washington and the field to deliver against our most urgent priorities. This includes expanding the Agency's work and impact on democracy, rights, and governance by securing and mobilizing additional resources to strengthen institutions and the rule of law, support and build the capacity of civil society organizations, enable free and fair elections, foster dialogue and promote transparency, and build on the successes of, for example, the recent elections in Nigeria. This also means, as I have discussed with several of you during our consultations, expanding the Agency's impact on human trafficking and corruption, laying the groundwork for the success of a critically important strategy for Central America, and ensuring an equally important transition in Afghanistan.

Third, if confirmed, I will act quickly to ensure that the Agency maintains global leadership and agility in responding to increasingly complex humanitarian crises around the world. In 2014 alone, USAID responded to 49 disasters in 42 countries. In addition to the Ebola outbreak in West Africa, these included major crises in Syria, Iraq, South Sudan, Central African Republic, and, most recently, the earthquake in Nepal.

The Agency has developed an effective relationship with the Department of Defense, which has on multiple occasions deployed in support of USAID. USAID also continues to build the capacity and resiliency of governments to respond to disasters themselves. When a natural disaster strikes or a humanitarian catastrophe is imminent, the Agency is and should be among the first on the ground to help those in need, and in a world rife with crises, I believe it is critical to ensure that USAID remains one step ahead.

Fourth, and perhaps most important, I will focus on further strengthening the institution. That means building on the reform agenda launched by Administrator Rajiv Shah. This will involve expanding the capacity of the Agency to mobilize resources and engagement from other partners; to draw on science, technology, and innovation to address development challenges; and to increase investment in effective local solutions.

Strengthening the institution involves tackling some of the management and operational challenges facing an agency that manages resources across over 80 countries, often in complex environments. It is my view, and one that is shared by the staff of USAID, that the Agency must ensure that American taxpayer dollars are spent responsibly. It must identify successful programs, learn from prior mistakes, apply lessons learned, and share best practices—all in an open and transparent way. If progress is not being made, it must take corrective action or terminate projects.

USAID has already implemented critical reforms to safeguard taxpayer dollars, ensure greater accountability and oversight, and focus on sustainable results. In 2013, the Agency issued new guidance for awarding contracts that increased the weight of past performance in identifying potential contractors. Its new compliance unit has already executed over 200 suspension and debarment actions since its inception in 2011. If confirmed, I will build on these and other components of the reform agenda that strive to make the Agency more accountable to Congress and the American people. I will always be fully transparent about what is working and what is not, and I will ask for your help in solving problems and seeking opportunities.

Strengthening USAID also means supporting and listening to its people, both here in Washington and overseas. These are men and women with knowledge, institutional memory, and invaluable insight. Indeed, they take on some of the most daunting tasks and aspirational missions one can imagine, all on behalf of our government and our country. It is my goal to give them the visibility, respect, and gratitude that they deserve.

Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Cardin, and members of the committee, should I have the honor of serving as Administrator, you have my word that I will be ambitious but focused; that I will not downplay challenges but seek your help; that I will strengthen a growing bipartisan consensus on development that serves us and the world so well; and that I will pass on to my successor an Agency that is strong and effective, responsive and responsible, and transparent and accountable—an Agency worthy of its dedicated men and women and those around the world that they aim to serve.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you for being here.

And our distinguished ranking member—I do not know if you want to make some opening comments. Okay.

As we have mentioned and you have mentioned, we have been working on some human trafficking issues and certainly hope to do something to majorly affect modern day slavery. What approaches has USAID identified and tested that demonstrably contribute to reducing modern day slavery?

Ms. SMITH. Thank you, Senator, for the question and also for your leadership on this issue.

I think USAID to date has done a lot to contribute to this in the areas of training on rule of law, information and education through the media, through NGOs, through new applications, and new technologies, through also responding to the victims of human trafficking.

As you and I have discussed, I think that there is a foundation to build on and that we could actually do much more. If confirmed, I hope that we can expand on the work the agency has done to integrate the fight against human trafficking into its programs around the world to take full advantage of its presence in over 80 countries, to work on, importantly, the supply chains that USAID focuses on frequently as it is working on economic development and which, as you know, are among the places that human traffickers hide and exploit the most vulnerable.

So if confirmed, this is something that I will make a priority. I believe the men and women of the Agency believe it is a priority, and I very much look forward to working with you and others on the committee to explore what more we can do on this important agenda.

The CHAIRMAN. We, as you know, have been working on the Food for Peace program that I alluded to earlier. There is always a tug between working on this and making sure that the United States agriculture community is on board because, obviously, it matters relative to putting these reforms in place.

There are a lot of people out there that are trying to allude to the fact if we create more flexibility, that much of what we will be buying we will be buying from Russia and/or China, which is not true. But I wonder if you could expand on that non-fact?

Ms. SMITH. Senator, I think on this issue the facts show us a few things. One, Food for Peace has been an enormously valuable program for many, many decades. And I think we want to preserve—

The CHAIRMAN. One of your supporters, I guess.

Ms. SMITH. Yes. [Laughter.]

Anyway, if I may continue, Senator. Food for Peace has been a vital program. I have spent a lot of time in the field and have seen cases where food aid made an important difference, but also cases where the greater flexibility to which you allude would be enormously valuable in reaching more people more quickly. It is my belief that in consultation with key partners, constituents, and supporters of that program over time—it is my hope that we can find a way forward that would give USAID and particularly our people in the field that flexibility and ensure that at the same time we reflect and take into full account the very legitimate and important interests of our communities here. I am optimistic that we can find a way forward. I am very encouraged by the number of Senators, yourself included, who have raised this during the consultations prior to this hearing. And so it is my intent, if confirmed, to work very closely with all of you to see if we can get this done.

The CHAIRMAN. Your predecessor had worked on, in essence, a $95 million transfer from food aid to the maritime industry in order to give ourselves the flexibility to feed more people. And as bad as that sounds—I actually wish every American could be aware of that—but as bad as that sounds, if there is a way to phase that out over a period of time so that it got to zero, there may be a way of dealing with this. I just wonder if you might give some editorial comments regarding that?

Ms. SMITH. Senator, I am a little bit hesitant to get too specific on the particulars. But I do think in principle—and I followed very closely Administrator Shah's work on this—that we can find ways to transition toward a program that is mutually beneficial to all involved. And I think considerable time has been given to thinking through how to do that within the Agency, even after Administrator Shah's departure, and I know among members of this committee. So I would be happy to sit down with you and with others to work through what exact calibration might be most appropriate and to consult, again, with all stakeholders so we can find a way to do this.

The CHAIRMAN. On Power Africa—the administration has spent a great deal of time talking about renewables being sort of the base delivery system in Africa. Not unlike our own country, there are places where renewables work decently well and there are places where they just do not. Does the administration support the development of fossil fuel energy as an integral and indispensable part of Power Africa acknowledging that, at its base, it is more important that we ensure that people have access to electricity than promoting goals that just do not agree with the particular area that we are in, and actually are not feasible?

Ms. SMITH. Thank you, Senator, again for your interest in Power Africa.

Let me say a couple of things about how we have structured this initiative and address your particular question.

Power Africa, in identifying priority transactions, looks at a number of things. It looks at private sector demand, the potential for transformational projects, buy-in from the government, opportunities to exploit the vast resources on the continent, project viability, and overall impact.

Now, within that, it is our belief that like any modern power sector, we need to rely on a broad array of generation sources, including wind, solar, hydropower, geothermal, and natural gas.

On the particular issue you raised, except in the poorest countries or where those plants are equipped with carbon capture and storage technology, the United States does not provide public financing for new coal-fired power plants pursuant to President Obama's Climate Action Plan of June 2013.

Now, I want to be very clear that this is with the exception of the poorest countries, many of which are on the African Continent.

The CHAIRMAN. So you are saying in those areas that are very poor, that we are trying deal with the people in most need, that the Obama administration would support coal facilities to produce power?

Ms. SMITH. I think if these met the other criteria that we have designated as key for identifying projects, according to the terms of the Climate Action Plan in those poorest countries, it would be worthy of consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. If you do not mind, what are some of those other criteria?

Ms. SMITH. As I said at the start, we try to look at need, where we are going to have transactions that will have impact, where we have investor interest, buy-in from the government, where our experts take a look and think that the project is likely viable and it can make a meaningful contribution to the ultimate goal of Power Africa to double access to electricity. So those would be the individual project criteria.

The CHAIRMAN. So almost any of the countries we are dealing with would meet that criteria?

Ms. SMITH. Most countries in Africa would meet that criteria. I think there are a few where it is a little bit difficult, given the current conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. And again, natural gas. There are all kinds of other ways of dealing with it. I am not here to push one particular area. But obviously, when you are living in a place with zero electricity, getting that is important, and maybe some of these other criteria need to move away. So I think you have said that you agree with that—that the Obama administration agrees.

Ms. SMITH. I think it is critically important. And I think the other thing that Power Africa has done very well is an initiative called Beyond the Grid, which also looks at people in some of the poorest areas of Africa and the most remote and where new technologies and innovations can be deployed through micro-grid, or off-grid solutions. So that is another option for reaching some of the most vulnerable.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Ms. SMITH. Thank you.

Senator CARDIN. Well, Mr. Chairman, first thank you for scheduling this hearing. I think it is very important that we move forward in the nomination process and have a confirmed Administrator for USAID. This is a critically important position, and I thank you for your cooperation in scheduling this hearing.

I want to thank Mrs. Smith for her willingness to continue to serve and her willingness to step forward with this very important position. And I want to thank your family because we know this is a joint sacrifice, and we thank you very much for that.

We have been debating for 3 weeks on the floor of the Senate our national security budget for the Department of Defense. The role that we play in development assistance is equally important part of our national security budget. So we consider the responsibility of this position to be one of the highest in our national security interests. So we thank you again for stepping forward.

Yesterday under Chairman Gardner, we had a hearing in the East Asia and The Pacific Subcommittee dealing with trade in the region, and USAID was present to talk about capacity-building for trade. If we are going to have successful opportunities there, countries need to have the capacity to deal with modern trade agreements, and USAID plays a very important role there. And I could keep on going on about additional areas in which the responsibilities of the agency that you are being considered to lead plays.

Under Administrator Shah, there were new initiatives that many of us supported, including the Global Development Lab which allowed us to do more with the recognition that our resources are limited, by leveraging the help of private companies, universities, and NGOs. All of that is important. And I know that you understand how critically important it is to prioritize. And you and I had conversations about that, and you mentioned that in your preliminary statement.

I want to talk a little bit about human rights. You are not going to be surprised to learn that, because I think USAID can play a critically important role in advancing human rights, I want to talk about three priorities within that.

First, what efforts do you believe we can make to fight corruption? What will be our anticorruption strategies? When we look at stability globally, we find the countries that have not been able to deal with corruption are going to have a problem. Many believe that the Ukraine revolution was not so much about Russia's influence but more about people who wanted an honest government. We could go on—the Arab Spring was also a condemnation of governments that were corrupt and denied their people basic human rights.

The second issue I want you to talk about is the role of women. We have also found that the way a country treats its women is a good indicator of a nation's strength. And I am interested in your commitment and ideas and vision as to how USAID can be more effective in advancing the rights of girls and women globally as we look for greater stability and more reliable strategic partners.

And the third issue—and I put all three on the table—is that World Refugee Day is coming up. We are approaching 60 million refugees today, one of the highest numbers of refugees in modern history. When you look at the number of displaced people around the world, we have a crisis, and USAID needs to be actively engaged in what we are doing to deal with this humanitarian crisis.

So I would like to hear your vision in regards to how we will advance anticorruption measures as part of any program within USAID, how you plan to make advancing the rights of women and girls the highest priority within your agency, and what are we doing to carry out our responsibility in regards to the world refugee issue.

Ms. SMITH. Thank you, Senator. And I was thrilled when you raised in our meeting and as you raise right now the issue of corruption. I could not agree with you more, that it is perhaps the greatest enemy to development.

The flip side of that, of course, is if we can tackle corruption in meaningful ways, it frees up significant resources for development. This is something that is a priority for the Agency. It is something I would like us to build on through some terrific things the Agency has done over the years.

The first is, obviously, transparency. Now, that means transparency for USAID but also encouraging and calling for greater transparency from its partners. As you know, it makes a huge difference when citizens can see where resources go. So I think that is the first thing.

I think the second area—and this is where I think we are seeing some significant—insufficient but significant—momentum around the world is on greater adherence to norms and standards. We have been able, through multilateral organizations and other means, to work with countries to sign up to the international laws, rules, obligations, and treaties that require norms and standards on corruption.

The third—and I mentioned this to you in our meeting—is something called the Open Government Partnership, which the United States was a founder of with several other countries and has now grown to over 65 country members. What is quite interesting in that initiative is that it requires governments to join in publishing their budgets. Publishing the budget makes a huge difference and breaks the ice, if you will. I think we can build on that. Some countries have used it more effectively than others. A critical piece is that it entails a partnership between governments and civil society where civil society holds the government accountable for meeting the terms of its open government plan.

We are also working on—and this is something we would like to build on—a partnership to deal with illicit finance. There are huge losses in capital to the developing world to illicit finance. So that is also a priority on the corruption side.

Let me turn to your two other issues, if I may.

I think USAID has made the rights and well-being of women and girls a priority for many, many years, and that is a priority I would very much like to build on, whether it be in global health where it is a primary focus, in Feed the Future where there has been a particular focus on women farmers, but also in the areas of rights, access, and critically important, in training. I have traveled around the world and seen a lot of USAID missions. I have seen a lot of leaders in civil society and government. I have been very proud to see that some of those people were trained by USAID. So I think the training mission is critical, and support raising this issue at every opportunity.

Finally, USAID is also participating in the First Lady's initiative called Let Girls Learn, which is about enabling more young women to pursue their secondary education.

World Refugee Day is daunting. The numbers are staggering. USAID works closely with partners in the State Department's Bureau of Population, Refugees, and Migration on this issue. It is my very strong view that we have to give a lot more attention to this so there is a better understanding of the consequences of conflict and violations of human rights. So, again, this is something that I think is in the Agency's humanitarian mission—while my hope is to strengthen the Agency's ability to stay a step ahead and respond, it is also to give much greater visibility to these issues.

Senator CARDIN. Let me just point out—and I appreciate not only your response but the conversations that we have had on these subjects. You give me great confidence that these all will be highest priorities in your agency.

We need to be very strict about how we use our aid programs in countries that have challenges in dealing with corruption. We have got to make sure that the United States aid program is not contributing to a corrupt government or corrupt officials. And it is critically important that the Administrator send a very clear message and have clear directions on how not to participate in or fund corruption within governments.

Ms. SMITH. I could not agree with you more, Senator, and if confirmed, you will have that.

Senator CARDIN. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Gardner.

Senator GARDNER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you for being here today. It is great to have a University of Colorado graduate testifying before the panel. So welcome.

And I just wanted to follow up some of the conversations we had in my office.

Yesterday we did have a hearing—Senator Cardin and I—with Jason Foley, the Deputy Assistant Administrator for Asia for the Agency. It was a good conversation.

One of the things we talked about is just where priorities are for the Asia-Pacific region. If you could just spend a little bit of time talking about that, I would appreciate it.

Ms. SMITH. And I think the greater emphasis on Asia has been reflected in an increase in resources and personnel. As we discussed the other day, I think there are some other things that we can explore in Asia. And I am interested in the reference to trade capacity-building. That is one of them. I think that is something USAID makes huge contributions to around the world whether it is at the level of petty trade, local trade, national, regional, or in fact global trade.

What I would like to do, if confirmed—and Senator, I would love to work with you and others on this—is do more of in Asia and elsewhere of what USAID has done very well in other parts of the world, and that is to help work on the constraints to private capital flows and increase private capital flows in support of development in Asia. That is number one.

Number two, work with governments again to build on what USAID has done to date to build the capacity to run and sustain economies that are inclusive and deliver for their citizens. I think that there is a lot that we can build out on, some of it aided by resources, which are critically important, as you have pointed out; some of it by taking the lessons the agency has learned in other initiatives in other parts of the world and applying them more effectively there.

So these are all things I think we can do. I am quite interested—as I say, I have less experience in Asia than other parts of the world—in consulting with you and with others and obviously our men and women in the Agency here in Washington, particularly those in the field, to see what more can be done.

Senator GARDNER. Thank you.

Last year, the GAO, the Government Accountability Office, produced an assessment of USAID's trade capacity-building efforts and concluded—and I will quote the report. The U.S. Agency for International Development's 2003 trade capacity-building strategy does not directly guide TCB activities and parts of the strategy no longer reflect the current TCB environment.

If confirmed, do you plan to update the TCB strategy?

Ms. SMITH. Yes. I think that is something we can do, Senator—I have worked with USAID on this in my current capacity, and I think USAID has learned a great deal. One of the things USAID has also done a phenomenal job of over the last few years is, again, taking those lessons and then figuring out how to apply them. So I think that could be a very, very good exercise.

Senator GARDNER. Thank you. And I would love to follow up with you on some of the ideas for doing just that.

Ms. SMITH. Great. Thank you.

Senator GARDNER. Thank you.

Mr. Chairman, thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator, I noticed her staff was somewhat alarmed that she would answer a question off the cuff like that. So thank you for doing that. [Laughter.]

There was quite a shock in the back. [Laughter.]

Senator Menendez.

Senator GARDNER. That is the training of a University of Colorado graduate right there. [Laughter.]

Senator MENENDEZ. Well, welcome. All my questions are off the cuff. No.

First of all, as someone who has been and is a huge supporter of USAID, this is an incredibly important nomination. I congratulate you on being nominated. And I appreciate having listened to you here at the hearing describe your priorities in the same way that you did in the private meeting that we had.

And there are a lot of issues I have, some which I will submit for the record. But the one that I want to pursue with you is the question of democracy and governance, and following on to Senator Cardin's questions of human rights.

I am concerned that democracy and governance at USAID under the President's tenure has been cut by 38 percent, and I think there are a lot of critical countries in the Middle East, North Africa, Latin America, and Africa as a whole that have great needs that are woefully underfunded. And part of our challenge is, yes, economic growth and giving people greater opportunities, but in part that comes from more transparent democratic governance at the end of the day in countries, which is a longer term proposition, but nonetheless incredibly important to stop, because when in the Middle East you are facing a future that is so dismal that you can have your mind converted to believe that dying is more glorifying than living, that is a real challenge. It is a challenge to our national security and interests. It is a challenge in the region. And unless we change the dynamics of what is happening in those countries over time, we will continuously be in a perpetual war. And so I think it is important to be thinking about that in the long term, but it has got to start in a more significant way. When you cut democracy and governance by 38 percent, it does not lead us in the right direction.

So, one, I would like to get your sense of how you will try to stem the tide here. Two, I would like to get a sense from you that—and you and I talked about this a little bit, about those who would say that stability is more important than democracy and governance, that we are willing to look the other way on democracy and governance in order to have stability.

And three, do you believe that if a country resists or attempts to thwart our democracy initiatives that we should simply end those programs in that country, as we are seeing such challenges, for example, in Pakistan, where several members of this committee and others of the Senate have written about NGOs, the NDI, The Republican Institute, and Save the Children, and others having challenges in Pakistan? Give me a sense on those issues.

Ms. SMITH. Thank you, Senator, and thank you both for the conversation we had the other day and your leadership on these issues.

I agree with you on the importance of resources, and I believe you are aware that the President's request includes an increase in resources for democracy and governance.

But I think there are several other things we need to do.

One is press others to also increase their resources. I think worldwide, if you look at investments in democracy, governance, and human rights, they are far below where they should be, and I think we are in agreement that this is essentially the backbone that is needed to ensure that the gains of development are sustained.

I would also like to look at the potential impact of having additional personnel on the ground, particularly democracy and governance officers, who often, with technical assistance—but not necessarily large quantities of assistance—can play a hugely important role in training and using their convening power and other tools to build capacity. I think USAID's record on training at the institutional level for civil society and NGOs is something we can build out. I know the Agency is looking at how to make greater use of regional platforms where more people and more organizations can be trained at once and where also, and importantly, networks can be built.

I also believe, sir, that a government that is credible in the eyes of its citizens is a government that delivers transparently and in ways that are meaningful and impact the lives of those citizens. So in the areas where USAID has a very big presence and budget in health and in food security, the Agency has worked on—and I think we can expand—also looking at governance in those sectors. Is it transparent? Are the budgets transparent? Are citizens able to avail themselves of the equivalent of a feedback loop to ensure that, again, those services are delivered but in a way that is effective and transparent?

As I mentioned in response to Senator Cardin the Open Government Partnership, I have been quite impressed by what that has provided in terms of triggering a worldwide debate on what open governance means and what the obligations of governments are, while also exercising the muscles of some governments in transition, with their civil societies to see what it is actually like to both cooperate and have civil society hold governments accountable.

I believe as well that USAID is in a very good position, along with the State Department, to play the role of broker or facilitator in dialogue between governments and civil society.

I appreciate that you also made, sir, the point about this being a long-term proposition. I think the importance of our investing as a nation through USAID and by any other means in institution-building is ultimately the key because it is when we have got strong, effective, and transparent institutions that I think we have the greatest assurance.

Senator MENENDEZ. Let me make one observation before my time runs out, as well as one final question.

Ms. SMITH. Yes.

Senator MENENDEZ. And your answer, which I appreciate, a lot of it was focused on governance, and I agree that is an important issue. But I also think we have to decide whether USAID is going to play a role in democracy-building or not. And if it is, then it needs to be robust, and if it is not, then we need to think about how we move those resources to an entity that would, which brings me to my final question.

I am pleased to see that the administration has its traditional request for Cuba democracy programs at $20 million. And I have clearly a very different view of United States-Cuba policy than the administration. But the one thing, I would think, that we can all come together on are programs that ultimately we pursue worldwide in other countries that are undemocratic, and that we do not allow the entities in those countries, whether they are autocratic dictatorships or other authoritarian regimes, to just stop our programs at the end of the day because they do not like it, otherwise we would have given up a long time ago and would not have been successful in Eastern Europe at the time of Vaclav Havel, Lech Walesa, and so many others.

So the question is, as it relates to Cuba democracy programs, can you make a commitment that you will prioritize programs that strengthen independent civil society, defend human rights, and expand democratic space and increased access to information inside of Cuba?

Ms. SMITH. Senator, yes. Let me address a couple of things you have said.

First, I believe that the U.S. Agency for International Development is and must be an agency that is about supporting democratic institutions, expanding democracy and democratic practices. So I think that is and must remain a priority.

With respect to Cuba, my understanding is USAID is continuing programs in democracy, governance, human rights, and the free flow of information, and intends to do so. And that is certainly my intention if confirmed.

I also believe you make a very important point with respect to the situations where we find that governments reject, close space, or take other measures that constrain the evolution of democracy. I think we need to respond in those cases. I think we may respond differently in different cases and must do what is effective. In some cases, we may not be supporting an actual government. We may be working primarily with local civil society or other groups. But I do think it is something we must respond to, and I will, if confirmed.

Thank you.

Senator MENENDEZ. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Coons.

Senator COONS. Thank you, Chairman Corker.

And welcome, Ms. Smith.

Ms. SMITH. Thank you.

Senator COONS. I very much look forward to your confirmation and to continuing to work with you in what I hope will be your new role in leadership of USAID.

And I appreciate and just want to join with the chairman in questioning about food aid reform and then talk a little bit more about effectiveness, monitoring, and economic development, if I could.

What role do you see for local and regional procurement and for readjusting some of the commodity and cargo preferences in the path forward toward a reasonable and balanced reform to our food aid program?

Ms. SMITH. Senator, again, as you know, the President in his budget made a proposal for food aid reform. So I certainly believe that this is something we need to pursue.

I believe there are ways to do it. I think there is probably some sort of equation that will be the ultimate solution. I am a little bit hesitant to get exactly into the particulars because in my current role I have not been directly consulting with all the parties.

But I do think we can and should find a balance that does a number of things: enables the Agency to respond more quickly and meet the needs of more people while maintaining those very important, vital parts of a program that have served us well over many years and also meet the needs and concerns of a broad range of constituencies. I think it is entirely possible. It is something I would make a priority, if confirmed.

Senator COONS. Great. Well, I look forward to working with you, the chairman, and other members on achieving that right balance between a lot of different interests and concerns.

There is a number of initiatives that you may well get to carry forward that are, in no small part, focused on economic development in a part of the world we have both spent a fair amount of time in, whether Power Africa, Trade Africa, Feed the Future, Global Health Initiative. I have a concern about Power Africa that it has largely been funded out of democracy and governance programming funds, and my hope is that we will get an authorization and then dedicated sources of funding for the long term. But speak to those initiatives, if you would, in terms of which you think has been most successful in the last 5 years and which you would prioritize your focus on, if confirmed as Administrator, to try and advance both economic development and human development.

Ms. SMITH. Thank you, Senator, and thank you for your engagement on Africa, but also your engagement on development.

I believe Feed the Future is one of the most successful initiatives we have seen in a long time. And I would point out that it was originally built as an initiative that started in Africa and has now expanded. There are Feed the Future countries outside of Africa that follow the same model, which include countries having a comprehensive plan and their own investing in that plan. I think this is something we can build on. I think it is something that has influenced the rest of the world. I think we have put food security and agricultural development back on the world's map, both through Feed the Future and support for that initiative. So I think anything we can do to ensure that it not only achieves as much impact as possible over the next 18 months but also well beyond that. I sincerely hope that Feed the Future is an initiative that will be continued, and I think it is worthy of it.

Power Africa—and I would be delighted, if confirmed, to work with you on any resource issues—I think is something that has shown us that the development model that USAID and the other agencies and departments that are part of that initiative, because there are 12 all together, have figured out. I think there has been a search for the silver bullet on energy or infrastructure. I do not believe there is one, but I do think that we have come up with something that allows us to identify viable projects, interested investors, and importantly, break down the constraints and build the capacity that is necessary to get a transaction done that not only yields greater access to electricity but exercises the muscles of trade and investment and also demonstrates success. Because, as you know very well, in Africa, risk perception is a very powerful thing, and I think over time we are reducing it.

I think it is also important that Power Africa is not overwhelmingly assistance-driven. The team has USAID at the lead, but again, all of those agencies and departments have done a phenomenal job of leveraging private sector capital and working with other countries. Sweden has put $1 billion behind this. The World Bank is engaged with us. So, again, using our leadership and a good idea to get others involved has been key.

I think Global Health, if I may, Senator, is and will remain a top priority I certainly hope for this administration, as it has for past administrations.

Senator COONS. Thank you. Across those few, if I might, I am pleased to hear that you think Feed the Future is scalable—

Ms. SMITH. I do.

Senator COONS [continuing]. And can expand just its early success in Africa and is worth working together to sustain and grow.

Second, I hope within Global Health that the development of an HIV vaccine will continue to be an area of priority and focus. Although it has a long trajectory, it would have an enormous cumulative impact.

I also just wanted to recognize that the value of partnering with other development entities from around the world, with the private sector, as demonstrated in your comments, I see real value in. The Millennium Challenge Corporation I think in a number of countries where I have had the opportunity to visit with its sites and when I have had the chance to meet with their leadership has turned me from a skeptic to a real advocate because I think that long-term model of having metrics and accountability and measurable results and of doing development in partnership with other governments in a way that builds their capacity I think is really promising.

Let me, as a last question, just mention the Paul Simon Water for the World Act. I joined a number of my colleagues, Chairman

Corker and Senator Durbin, Flake as a cosponsor. I think access to clean water and sanitation is one of those sort of foundational concerns like access to electricity. Just tell me, if you would, how USAID will seek to improve access to clean drinking water and sanitation in the developing world under your tenure if you become the Administrator.

Ms. SMITH. Senator, let me just echo your endorsement of MCC. I have enjoyed working with MCC and look forward to continuing to do so in a new capacity, if I am confirmed.

On the issue of water and sanitation, that is really one of USAID's strengths, whether it is in the development field or if you look at emergency responses around the world. The Agency is terrific at moving quickly and also on a long-term developmental footing.

My understanding is the Agency has been working on a much broader strategy and identified priority countries where our experts believe that USAID can have the greatest impact. It is something I am very eager to dive into further, including in support of the act. So I think it is something that I would like to come back to you on. I cannot claim to have exhaustive knowledge of it yet, but as I say, it is something the agency does very well. And my understanding is that they have been working very hard on plans to look at how it can be expanded but also how they can prioritize, again, in key countries where they can achieve the greatest impact.

Senator COONS. Well, if I could simply, while Senator Perdue settles in, let me just say in closing that on my trip to Liberia last December, I was really impressed with the DART team and with how USAID was not just delivering disaster relief, humanitarian relief, but helping coordinate across international and private sector and volunteer organizations and how the incident management system that really was, in large part, deployed through the DART team made a lasting and compounding difference in how a complex, broad humanitarian crisis was being dealt with. And I just wanted to commend the great work that USAID has done and I believe will continue to do under your leadership in responding to complex humanitarian crises.

Ms. SMITH. Thank you for that, Senator.

Senator COONS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Senator Perdue.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Ms. Smith, good to see you again.

Ms. SMITH. Good to see you.

Senator PERDUE. Well, thank you very much for your career service. And I find this role of USAID Administrator, as we talked, to be tremendously important. And I was very impressed with our conversation. I appreciate your forthrightness and candor in our brief time together. I look forward to maintaining that open dialogue. I think there is nothing better in trying to establish our foreign policy around the world than what we do with our philanthropy, and I know you share that as well. You said that in our meeting.

In our fiscal environment, obviously, we want to know that every dollar is—we are getting the most productive use out of that that we can. I know you share that as well.

Assuming you are confirmed, though, I would love to have you talk about it—and I am sorry I missed earlier testimony, but I would love for you to talk about your priorities in the next 18 months, if confirmed, and talk about are there private priority areas that you would see yourself focusing on in particularly the first year.

Ms. SMITH. Thank you, Senator. Thanks again for our meeting.

Yes. Let me briefly go through priorities.

The first is achieving maximum impact in the areas where I think we can achieve the greatest scale. And we have talked a bit about some of those, Power Africa, Feed the Future, and Global Health.

The second is a set of urgent priorities, including expanding the agency's work on democracy, human rights, and governance, obviously a critical strategy in Central America, and for transition in Afghanistan.

The third—and Senator Coons just referred to this. I believe that USAID is the best in the world in responding to crises anywhere. They are flexible. They are adaptive. They are creative. I think we need to make sure that the teams are able to keep one step ahead in a world where we are unfortunately seeing too many crises.

The last, but I think in many ways the most important and something you and I talked about, is the management operations of the agency. We put huge expectations on the men and women who serve this agency to operate and manage huge amounts of money often in very complex environments. They do an excellent job. I think they are committed to being fully responsible with taxpayer dollars. I think you will find with me that I will be totally and utterly frank with you about what goes well and what does not, but as I said to you in our private meeting, I will also come to you and ask for help when we need to fix things that may not work so well.

So on the operations and management of the Agency, I think USAID does a terrific job of doing assessments on the front end, looking at risk mitigation, evaluation and monitoring, and responding to oversight. I would like to work with the team—and it is a very dedicated team—to get out in front and ahead of some of these things to see if we can identify problems and challenges earlier, but also again to be able to come to you and other members of this committee with some options we may develop, and ask for your help and partnership in seeing if we can work together to make this agency as effective, as responsive, as responsible and agile as it needs to be in the world we live in.

Senator PERDUE. I look forward to that.

Another thing I want to follow up on is to have you speak to us a little bit about how do we get other partner nations around the world to help us in this role. I know they do now, but there are more needs than we can meet. And as one country, we cannot meet them all. This is not a budget conversation. It is really more of a conversation philosophically. From your role as the leading, I guess, contributor in this effort around the world, how would you use this position to help influence other countries to step up their support of philanthropy the way we are?

Ms. SMITH. First of all, I am not shy about asking for money.

But, Senator, I think there are a couple things. And one great example of this has been the work on food security and agriculture where agencies and departments, including USAID, including the State Department—all of us rallied together to look at what the world was investing in agriculture, looking at what we could do, and then literally going country to country and saying here is what we expect you to put on the table. And we challenged other countries to triple their investments. We were polite, we were evidence-based, and we were relentless. Ultimately we mobilized $33 billion.

Now, I think we can do that as a matter of practice. I think part of it is, again, challenging countries, looking at the evidence of where the investments are lacking, figuring out what is appropriate, and pushing politely until we get there. I think our convening power helps us enormously as does our success. Again, with Power Africa, the fact that Sweden announced last summer $1 billion in support of this enterprise is because it is a good idea and it is working. So I think the power of our example works.

The last thing I would like to mention, Senator—and I think this is a trend we should build on—is that in a number of countries, we are seeing the important recognition by governments that something called domestic resource mobilization is key, that it is critical that they invest more in health, in education, in agriculture, and rely more on their own budgets. Now, some of that means that they need assistance in things like how to manage an effective tax administration. I think we need to capitalize on this trend, build on it where we have got countries that are stepping up and being real leaders on it, and then using that to challenge other countries to meet us at least part way. So I think that is another way that we can mobilize additional resources.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you.

If confirmed as Administrator, what would you do to ensure the priorities identified at the mission level are incorporated into final budget submissions to Congress and that presidential initiatives, while important, do not distort necessarily—I know they are important and they need to be taken into consideration, but they do not distort the type of assistance that you as the Administrator determine to be of utmost importance. I guess what I am looking for is the priorities in making sure that we all agree on those priorities with regard to meeting the needs that USAID is charged to do.

Ms. SMITH. Thank you for that question. And, Senator, I will not fool you. This is not easy. There are huge demands. There are huge opportunities, and it always is ultimately a question of tradeoffs and prioritization.

So I think the first thing is to look carefully at what the Agency's priorities are, to lean in the direction of those places we are getting the greatest impact and meeting the greatest need. Again, that is not easy because it means letting some things go. I am prepared to do that if that is what, again, the people in the Agency and others agree with, but I think that is something we have to look at.

The other is I think listening to the field. We send teams out in the field to run USAID missions. They have got eyes and ears on the ground. They have got a sense and the experience to know what is working and what is not and where we can have real impact. So I think factoring that in at the end of the day is important.

And finally, I think we have got to continue to leverage and draw in other resources because, as you said yourself—and I strongly agree—we cannot do everything. I think something we can do more of is mobilize, quite frankly, other people's resources to match our own.

Senator PERDUE. Well, thank you for your testimony.

Mr. Chairman, thank you.

Ms. SMITH. Thank you, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Murphy.

Senator MURPHY. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Welcome. I look forward to working with you in your new position. You have done very well today. Thank you for taking the time to meet with all of us.

I am glad to hear in response to a question from Senator Perdue, you are not shy about asking for money because I wanted to ask you a question about resources.

Interestingly, you skirted the issue a little bit in response to a question from Senator Menendez. You said resources are important, but let me tell you all the ways that we can get around needing more resources. And it speaks to a fear that I at least have about the aid community.

I mean, the Defense Department is never shy about coming up to Capitol Hill and telling us when they do not have the resources to meet their operational demands, and they tell us routinely the risk at which we are putting the Nation if we do not fund the Department of Defense's budget to the amount that meets their defined objectives overseas.

I do not always feel the same way about the aid community, and often it is just a question of how we allocate scarce resources and how we draw on other partners. And all of that is important.

But does USAID have the resources today to meet its operational demands? How much of this can continue to be just robbing Peter to pay Paul? Do we not have to have a pretty fundamental conversation about the growing number of crises across the world and the fact that today we are spending 1.1 percent of our GDP on foreign aid, when back in the 1950s we were spending 3 percent of our GDP on foreign aid? At some point we have got to reckon with that number. Right?

Ms. SMITH. Senator, I welcome your comments, and I think absolutely that we do. I think, if confirmed, I will also function as a member of the administration that is responsible for putting together an entire budget and take those factors into account.

But I think there is something key that you are getting to. I think we are in a position now to make the case certainly to the American people. I have been encouraged by the conversations I have had with members of this committee that foreign aid is a worthy investment, that we get a return, that it impacts our influence and our standing around the world, and that we can prevent more crises than those to which we have to respond. So I think it would be a wonderful thing to start making the case that this a worthy investment and one that we should consider over time increasing. I would be delighted to work with you on that.

I do also want to say—and I certainly was not attempting to skirt something, but I also believe that assistance is one of the tools we have, but it is not the only one. The Agency has done a phenomenal job at a time when ideally it would have a much bigger budget, of figuring out, again, how do you mobilize other people's resources, how do you work with the NGO community, which has made huge commitments of its own, and how do we, again, leverage what is now billions of dollars in private capital. So I think regardless of where the budget is, that is something that we have got to focus on.

You did mention the word "operational," so I just want to make one quick plug of something that, if confirmed, I hope that we can discuss, and that is USAID's operating budget, which is also one of the key elements of its ability to function around the world and is absolutely critical. I would want to rely more fulsomely on the experts in the Agency to come back to you on that. But that is one of the, if you will, force multipliers to the effectiveness of the Agency over time.

Senator MURPHY. One of the issues that we talked about, which I would love to hear your thoughts on in open committee, is the issue of flexibility. One of the things that I routinely hear from mid-level and upper-level operators in the field is that partially by internal processes, partially by congressionally directed earmarks, that we compartmentalize funding on a geographical basis and then on an operational basis, a categorical basis such that it is hard to move money as fast as the crises move our attention.

Are there things that can be done internally? Are there things that we need to work with you on to make sure that you have the flexibility to move money as quickly as events on the ground demand it?

Ms. SMITH. Senator, that is an issue I would love to come back to you on, if confirmed. I think it is vital.

USAID has a lot of people who are masters of figuring out how you move between the various pieces to move money as quickly as possible, but also respond to requirements that the Agency is obligated to and wishes to respond to, whether they come from the legislative or executive branch. I think if we could talk about how to provide the Agency with greater flexibility, that would be of enormous value. I think part of that equation is also working with you on how USAID can ensure that it will be fully responsible with that greater flexibility.

I have known this agency for a long time. I have watched it go through a lot of permutations. I think it is better positioned today than at any time I have seen in 20 years to assume the responsibility for and act on that greater flexibility. And if that is a conversation that we could have, if I am confirmed, I would be delighted.

Senator MURPHY. And then lastly, I just wanted to get your thoughts about the way in which USAID can be built more tightly into the overall national security infrastructure. There is a really fascinating report that one of your former colleagues, Gen. Jim Jones, headed. It had about a half a dozen former generals and admirals, as well as a number of policy-thinkers, talking about the better ways to integrate both State Department resources and USAID resources into the strategic commands to make sure that we have a more coherent conversation happening out in the field so that we can have a coordinated response to crises.

I think about the movement of an organization like al-Shabaab out of Somalia into Kenya. If we had been able to all think about the ways ahead of time to try to buttress those sections of Kenya which were vulnerable to the movement of al Shabaab, we might have been able to prevent a little bit more of the seepage that ended up happening.

Are there some opportunities to try to connect strategic commands and USAID? They are some of your biggest boosters, frankly, and there seems to be a need to maybe have a little bit more coherence in the field.

Ms. SMITH. Well, I think that is a very good point. And the Department of Defense has been a big champion of USAID largely for the reasons you suggest. USAID is the agency best positioned to pursue the prevention that is needed so we have fewer crises.

I think USAID and the Department of Defense have a very good relationship. It is one that has expanded including because of joint responses in humanitarian crises. I know that on the Sahel and other parts of the world, the two agencies have together looked at roles and responsibilities but also how to think about what might be done on the side of prevention. And I think that is something I am very interested in pursuing further.

Senator MURPHY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Markey.

Senator MARKEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, very much.

Can you give us the 1 minute on geothermal in Ethiopia?

Ms. SMITH. Sure. Thank you, Senator.

Geothermal in Ethiopia has a huge potential. All along the Rift Valley, as you and I discussed, there is the potential to provide electricity for a huge chunk of the continent. It is not easy to exploit, but we are finding that there is increased interest. Power Africa is behind transactions in Kenya and in Ethiopia that we hope to see significant progress on, including in the coming weeks. I think it is something that could be a profound game-changer for the region again.

Senator MARKEY. We were told by the President of Liberia, a country of 6.5 million people, that her whole country only has 40 megawatts of electricity.

Ms. SMITH. Exactly.

Senator MARKEY. What can one geothermal facility in Ethiopia do?

Ms. SMITH. You could go from 500 to 1,000 megawatts.

Senator MARKEY. A thousand megawatts.

Ms. SMITH. Potentially. There are lots of megawatts in that geothermal rift there along the valley, sir.

Senator MARKEY. Right. So ultimately we are looking at something that is potentially 25 times bigger—one plant, one facility—than all of the electricity in Liberia today.

Ms. SMITH. But we are looking at some serious impacts. And again, I think we have got to be mindful of the challenges in exploitation of geothermal. But I think we are seeing increasing evidence of its potential, of the interest by investors, and of the viability of some of these projects. We still have to focus on the Liberias that do not have that potential and have the kind of acute shortages you talk about, particularly at a time when, after having survived decades of war and now an Ebola epidemic, they are able, fortunately, to focus again with our Power Africa team on turning the lights on there.

Senator MARKEY. The numbers are just so exponentially larger that they just match up with the cell phone wireless revolution in Africa. I mean, it is almost like a perfect analogy of how we are not talking about a doubling or a tripling. We are talking about something with one facility in Ethiopia that is 50 times bigger than everything that is going on in Liberia. So that is something that we just, again, continually have to focus on and understand that it is transformational. When a place has all the telecommunications they need and all of the electricity they need, capitalism, commercial activity is going to flourish and similarly the education of the kids, the health of the kids, all the way down the line.

Let us talk about health systems post-Liberia. What can USAID do to make sure that there is a better infrastructure in place on an ongoing basis in these countries so that they can be the front line and effective in making sure that these diseases just do not spike out of control?

Ms. SMITH. That is a really important question, Senator, and thank you for asking it. Senator Coons mentioned the DART team deployed, and even from the initial deployment of that disaster assistance response team, looking at the health systems has been a priority, building on some significant progress made over the years, but obviously insufficient progress given the impact that the Ebola epidemic has had. I think there are several things that can be done.

One is transferring some of the capabilities that have been developed in Liberia out of misfortune to other places and making sure those are retained. There are now people who are trained as lab technicians to track the data on an epidemic, to do some of the treatment and prevention.

The second is part of something called the Global Health Security Agenda, which was launched by the President with an eye to doing two things, both getting countries to adhere to the norms and standards that are required to manage global health threats, but also and importantly build the capacity of countries like Liberia to be able to prevent, detect, and respond to global health threats.

Lastly, I think for USAID, for the Office of the Global AIDS Coordinator for the CDC, and for all the U.S. Government agencies that work in health, there have been some important lessons. I think about the importance of health system strengthening. This has been a priority since the beginning of the administration. I will admit it has not been the easiest thing to market. Health system strengthening really did not capture a lot of imagination I think until we saw the Ebola epidemic. But the teams are working now on how we can do as much as possible—

Senator MARKEY. Can you take tuberculosis as an example—

Ms. SMITH. Yes.

Senator MARKEY [continuing]. And talk about what USAID can do in terms of detection and prevention of tuberculosis in the countries that you have an ability to influence? Can you talk about that a little bit?

Ms. SMITH. I think many of these are the same systems. And what is needed and I think what USAID does very well across the board on health is how do you have the education in place, train the people who you need on the ground, provide the education, and then put in the extra training and capabilities that are needed for diagnostics, for treatment, in TB for sustaining treatment because one of the biggest challenges there is that if people fall off their treatment, you have got a recurrence or even worse. So I think, again, it all comes back to health systems, to training, and to putting in place those things that enable local communities to play a central role.

And one last thing on tuberculosis, if I may. It also means mobilizing other countries to do more because if you look at where the evidence of tuberculosis is today, much of it is in the world's poorest countries. A great deal of it is in the BRICS. And so I think the other piece is going back and pressing other countries to do more.

Senator MARKEY. And finally, USAID has partnered with MIT in working on a comprehensive initiative on technology evaluation in order to ensure that we are using the smartest technologies effectively in order to aid in development in these countries. Can you talk a little bit about that and how we can continue to advance that effort to maximize working smarter, not harder to extract all of the economic opportunities in these countries?

Ms. SMITH. Senator, I am not familiar with that particular project. I am familiar with the extraordinary work that has been done by—if I am confirmed—my predecessor.

Senator MARKEY. You have my vote.

Ms. SMITH. Thank you, sir.

Dr. Shah is a real expert in science and technology and did a great deal to create, as you know, the Global Development Lab.

I think the partnerships with universities are key. Those are already yielding significant results. I think how to use data more effectively both in running the organization but also in terms of tracking solutions and what is working and what is not.

The Grand Challenges that USAID has run have been some of their greatest successes. My personal favorite is one that was to develop a set of protective gear for people who are working in environments like Ebola epidemics where they can work for longer periods than 45 minutes. It was Johns Hopkins and a wedding dress-maker in Maryland that came up with the solution on that.

I think there is enormous potential out of what has been done to bring science, technology, and innovation into USAID. I think the challenge is to look at how we can get some of these things to scale.

Senator MARKEY. I think your whole life has prepared you to sit in that chair, and I think our country and the world is lucky to have you being willing to take on this job. So thank you so much.

Ms. SMITH. Thank you, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. I am sure that Senator Markey knows that his whole life has prepared him to sit in his chair. [Laughter.]

So with that, Senator Cardin I know has some additional questions.

Senator CARDIN. If I could return to a point I raised earlier from the hearing we had yesterday in the East Asia and The Pacific Committee dealing with capacity-building and using USAID programs as they are related to capacity-building for trade, I want to talk a little bit about labor capacity issues and how you see the tools you have available being used to maintain and expand those opportunities.

If we move forward—and I hope we do—with the agreement with the Trans-Pacific Partnership, there are several countries there that have significant challenges as relating to their capacity to comply with a quality trade agreement such as TPP, particularly on labor issues. How do you see your aggressiveness in using the labor capacity tools that are available to help us meet these needs?

Ms. SMITH. Senator, this is something I have talked to USAID about. USAID has a long history of working with labor organizations to build up to both norms and standards and build capacity. I think there is every intention of continuing those programs. If it is possible to expand those, I think that is worth looking at. But this is something I think the Agency has got a long track record of working on around the world and in Asia, and I certainly think in the Asia-Pacific that is a place where, if confirmed, we would certainly want to continue to do that.

I would be happy to talk to you further and get your thoughts and more details on any specific ideas you may have.

Senator CARDIN. Well, I appreciate your commitment on this. I think it is going to require the agency's initiatives in some of these areas, and I look forward to working with you in that regard.

Ms. SMITH. That would be great.

Senator CARDIN. There has been some conversation about the use of the Global Development Lab. I mentioned it and Senator Coons mentioned it. Do you have thoughts as to how that program could be strengthened so that we can leverage the program for stronger involvement from the private sector in helping achieve the missions of USAID?

Ms. SMITH. Sure. I think the partnerships that the Global Development Lab has already built are part of what is going to anchor it and allow it to succeed. One of those is, again, with universities around the country, and also with the private sector. I think there is some real potential in looking at how we can take some of these innovations to scale. There is the capacity within USAID to provide some initial small capital to entrepreneurs, for example, or to ideas that seem to be viable enough to work. I think part of the challenge will be then getting with the private sector to figure out how we can take some of these things to market. And that is something I would very much like to do. I will rely on its experts, if confirmed, to determine what the best examples might be.

But I genuinely believe that this kind of lab, that kind of innovation, those kind of entrepreneurs or the ideas that have come out of grand challenges—that if we use our convening power, the relationships that the Global Development Lab already has to work with the private sector to take these solutions to market—we will not only innovate, but do something the lab was built for and that is to get to scale.

Senator CARDIN. I think it is excellent. I would also urge you to put a bigger spotlight on what you are doing. I think this is a story that is not well understood yet, particularly in our country. So I think you should. This is a success, and you should really put a spotlight on it.

One last point. Senator Corker and I have had many conversations about moving the President's nominees through our committee in an efficient way. And today's hearing is an indication of us moving forward on nominations.

It is my understanding that there are several senior positions in USAID that require Senate confirmations where nominations have not been yet submitted to the United States Senate, including the top position in Africa and some others. If you are confirmed, can we have your commitment that you will do everything you can to make sure that we get these appointments in a timely way? It is frustrating for many of us who are pushing to say we need to confirm positions when the administration has not submitted their nominees.

Ms. SMITH. Yes. I will happily make you that commitment, sir.

Senator CARDIN. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. I am glad to see that he is pushing in two directions, not just one. [Laughter.]

Senator Perdue.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I do have one last question.

Ms. Smith, with your operational background, I cannot resist this and I ran out of time earlier. But Senator Murphy reminded me just how important it is that we set priorities. We mentioned that we are only spending about 1 percent of our budget as opposed to maybe 3 percent in the past. I want to look at that. I am not knowledgeable about the 3 percent.

But I do look at the last 6 years where we have spent $21 trillion in our Government. We borrowed $8 trillion of that. That means of the $20 billion, which I believe is in 2015's budget for USAID—and put that in perspective. The State Department is $51 billion. So this is $20 billion of the $51 billion. That means that we borrowed $8 billion in order to meet needs around the world.

And this goes back to my question about how do we get other players to step up and how can we leverage what we are doing. But the reality is right now we are borrowing 40 percent of what we are using to support philanthropy around the world. I do not know any other country in history that has ever done that.

And so the question I have that comes behind that is, operationally how do you look at the priorities? Right now, five efforts, as I understand it—and I would love to be corrected, but I think this is right. Five programs represent 90 percent of that $20 billion. Health, humanitarian needs—health is the third. Humanitarian needs is about 20 percent. Democracy and governance is 13 percent. So those three things are about two-thirds of the money we are spending, or about $13 trillion. Economic growth and agriculture are only about 20 percent, a little more than 20, about 23 percent.

So the question is—you do not have to answer today because you have not had a chance to get into the budget and all that. But one of the things I would look forward to is an active conversation about what you see the allocation needing to be relative to the needs that are out there, the objectives and the mission of USAID, given that 40 percent of what we are funding is borrowed. I mean, that puts a perspective on it I think that makes—it just puts every dollar in play relative to how important it is that we make every dollar count. So would you respond to that please?

Ms. SMITH. I will. I also took note of your saying that you would be happy to talk to me about this later when I have had a chance to review the budget in great detail.

I think this issue of prioritization is key. And again, I do not want to understate how difficult it is. USAID has a lot of important initiatives and programs.

What I would really like to do is sit down with the men and women who run these programs both here in Washington and in the field, get their honest assessment of what they think is the most effective, what they think should be prioritized, how they think about that, be able to work that through with the agencies, with others in administration who have views on this, and come back to you and talk it through.

Senator PERDUE. That is acceptable. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

If there are no other questions—do you have any, Senator Markey? You are good? I just have a couple and we will close.

Ms. SMITH. Sure.

The CHAIRMAN. Again, thank you for your testimony and your willingness to serve in this capacity.

I was interested in your exchange with Senator Markey and just the order of magnitude change that can take place when we have power production of that magnitude in a country with so little. And we have so many countries in Africa that have that kind of situation. Sometimes administrations on both sides of the aisle try to tout the amount of output that is created, but as you know—and we talked about this in the office—what is important is to ensure you have a distribution system, and you have that power, and you have a cost recovery mechanism or a tariff system in place so that it can be sustained for the long haul and will be there. So many of us have seen—I know you have seen—projects that were completed but they serve no purpose.

I wonder if you could just talk a little bit about that?

Ms. SMITH. Yes. I think there a couple of issues there, Senator. And thank you for the question.

One of the things that Power Africa also focuses on is some of the policy issues, which are key to sustainability. So I think that is vital.

I also think that something, if confirmed, we can do more of and a better job of is looking at that sustainability up front and making sure that the policies are in place, figuring out things like recurrent expenditures that sometimes are not factored in are factored in so that we know that we are not investing in something that 5, 10, 15 years later is going to prove to be dormant or ineffective. So I think that is critically important. It is something that is a priority of mine.

With respect to Power Africa in particular, one of the great things about having not only USAID but all of these other departments and agencies involved is that it is a real opportunity to get to the policy issues that are necessary alongside those very exciting investments to make sure that these are sustainable over time, and that the investments include all of the other cost recovery and pieces that you mentioned.

The CHAIRMAN. While you were at the NSC, you praised the administration's transparency efforts. And we noticed that with the foreign assistance website, we still are not getting full reporting from all Federal agencies relative to that. And while I am sure our friends in China have access to that data, I wonder if you would—

The CHAIRMAN [continuing]. If you would commit to going ahead and bringing that up to a full-scale basis and make sure that all of that reporting is taking place?

Ms. SMITH. Sure. Senator, I will continue to work on that. And I will confess to you that several colleagues and I made a priority of really looking at foreign aid transparency. I think in all honesty, we were not fully aware of what we were getting into when you look at the complexity of the full range of departments and agencies that provide foreign aid and their different systems and how one translates all of that information. That is a work in progress. It is something I will certainly lend my support to and continue to work on. And I appreciate your support for it because I think it is absolutely vital.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, thank you for being here today. I appreciate the time you took with committee members in advance.

Without objection, if the record could remain open until close of business Friday and if you would respond to those questions, we would appreciate it.

Ms. SMITH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And without further ado, the meeting is adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 3:23 p.m., the hearing was adjourned.]

ADDITIONAL MATERIAL SUBMITTED FOR THE RECORD

RESPONSES OF GAYLE SMITH, NOMINATED TO BE ADMINISTRATOR OF THE UNITED STATES AGENCY FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

ADMINISTRATOR-DESIGNATE SMITH'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CORKER

Water, sanitation, and hygiene

Question. The 2012 U.S. National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) determined that a lack of access to clean water in the developing world will increase the risk of state failure and global instability over the next decade, which in turn will pose strategic issues for the United States. In light of the recent passage of the Water for the World Act and its emphasis on prioritizing help for the most in need, what efforts would you undertake to ensure water and sanitation funding is not used as a strategic bargaining chip but that appropriate prioritization takes place as required by law, increasing access to clean drinking water and sanitation where it's needed most, as part of a global strategy to engender goodwill toward the United States and reduce the risk of global instability?

Answer. Thank you for your leadership on this issue, including your sponsorship of the Senator Paul Simon Water for the World Act, which I was pleased to see signed into law.

It is my understanding that the act aligns with USAID's 2013 Water and Development Strategy, in that both prioritize USAID's water investments based on (1) country needs (targeting countries with the least access to safe drinking water, improved sanitation and hygiene, and highest rates of death of children under 5 due to diarrheal diseases); and (2) opportunities (focusing on countries with host-government commitment to supporting water, sanitation, and hygiene).

As you may know, the majority of USAID's priority WASH countries and the majority of the Agency's WASH funding can be found in sub-Saharan Africa, a region that has historically suffered from the lowest rates of access to safe drinking water and sanitation in the world.

The country prioritization and funding trends both demonstrate USAID's commitment to supporting the water needs of the very poor, and providing a foundation for sound governance of water resources that helps contribute to stability in priority countries.

If confirmed, I will focus on sustainably expanding access to safe water, sanitation, and hygiene to the neediest countries in an increasingly water scarce world and look forward to consulting with the Congress and relevant stakeholders to ensure we are meeting the intent of the Water for the World Act.

Freedom promotion

Question. Where do you see democracy and liberty promotion fitting into the agenda of USAID?

- ◆ a. What percentage of USAID funds and staff time should be spent on democracy and liberty promotion?
- ◆ b. How does that compare to the current allocation of staff time and funds for democracy and liberty promotion?

Answer. Democracy promotion is central to development, and an integral part of the U.S. national security strategy. This is highlighted in the President's two published strategies as well as in the two Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Reviews issued by the State Department and USAID. Within USAID, a new strategy on democracy, human rights, and governance (DRG) frames the importance of an integrated approach to programming within the sector, and equally on a holistic approach between this sector and the economic and social sectors. If confirmed, I intend to make democracy promotion a top priority.

As stated during my testimony, to advance implementation of the new DRG strategy, if confirmed, I will support a greater presence of DRG officers in the field. Democracy officers are on the front lines each day, convening and networking civil society organizations, finding innovative ways to promote human rights, and working to ensure our programs in health, food security, climate change, and economic growth incorporate elements of citizen participation and government accountability.

With respect to USAID managed and comanaged accounts, the President's FY 2016 request includes a substantial increase in democracy funding when compared to the FY 2015 request. If confirmed, I look forward to reviewing funding and staffing levels and working with Congress to ensure appropriate resources are available for this critical area.

Question. As space for civil society continues to shrink globally, how will you put President Obama's "Stand with Civil Society" initiative into action?

Answer. USAID has been a key player in the President's Stand with Civil Society agenda, a global call to action to support, defend, and sustain civil society amid a rising tide of restrictions on its operations globally. As a result of Stand with Civil Society, USAID has augmented programs that strengthen legal and regulatory environments for civil society; held numerous consultations all over the world with civil society; and made bold calls to strengthen regional coalitions, improve donor coordination and promote innovative partnerships, and engage local governments to collaborate with civil society to solve community problems.

USAID is also exploring innovative ways to support civil society. For example, in partnership with the Government of Sweden and private philanthropy, the Agency is supporting an effort to connect civil society across the globe through the Civil Society Innovation Initiative. Through a constructive, cocreation process with civil society, USAID and its partners will work together with local and regional CSOs to design up to six regional Hubs that will be connected at the global level. These regional Hubs, intended to add value to and augment existing support to civil society, will encourage cooperation, innovation, research, learning, and peer-to-peer exchanges. They will feature virtual and physical components that can aggregate existing tools and resources, including on leadership capacity and regionally based resource mobilization, as well as serve as a support platform for civic activists that could provide on-demand legal aid.

These are the types of activities I will continue to support to ensure that USAID is supporting the U.S. Government's efforts to respond to the backlash on democratic principles occurring around the world.

Program impact

Question. U.S. assistance has had many successes, but too often USAID is focused on dollars spent, rather than impact. If confirmed, how will you push USAID to be focused on development outcomes?

Answer. In order to maximize the impact of every development dollar, and as part of the USAID Forward reform agenda, USAID has introduced new operational policies related to strategic planning, program design, and monitoring and evaluation. As you know, this suite of reforms was designed to increase the Agency's strategic focus and development impact by ensuring that programs are designed to respond to local contexts, and that USAID learns from experience and adapts programs accordingly for better development outcomes.

USAID's Evaluation Policy, released in 2011, is one of the key operational policies that is bringing new methodologies for measuring impact to the design and evaluation of development activities. Since 2011, over 950 evaluations, and expanded training in evaluation for over 1,400 USAID staff, have bolstered active management by missions and operating units in evidence-based decisionmaking.

USAID has strengthened its ability to plan and implement strategically, to monitor and evaluate impact, and continuously feed what is learned back into planning and implementation processes to improve outcomes. Another operational reform that has strengthened strategic planning for improved outcomes is the use of Country Development Cooperation Strategies (CDCS) to ensure analysis of changes in country situations and status in the medium term, and support evaluations and interim Agencywide assessments to inform decisions about adjustments in resource allocations. If confirmed as Administrator, I will work to further institutionalize these reforms across the Agency.

Question. What are your thoughts on innovative pay-for-performance contracts, such as Cash-on-Delivery Aid, where U.S. taxpayers would only be footing the bills for measurable achievements?

Answer. I understand that USAID is committed to utilizing the most effective and efficient means for incentivizing, attaining, and sustaining development results.

Examples include:

(A) Acquisition and Assistance: For acquisition (contracts), USAID has several options to incentivize contractors by tying payment to performance, including cost plus award fee, fixed price award fee, cost plus incentives fee, and fixed price incentive fee contracts. For assistance (grants and cooperative agreements), a fixed amount award, which was previously referred to by USAID as a fixed obligation grant, is the main pay-for-performance mechanism. I understand that USAID strives to use these mechanisms when appropriate.

(B) Government-to-Government (G2G) Assistance: Most of USAID assistance to local governments is "projectized" which means that the Agency's funding is for a specific project, not simply budget support, and financed via either cost reimbursement, fixed amount reimbursement, or resource transfers (i.e., cash transfers in a few select countries).

If confirmed, I would be interested in looking at other innovative pay-for-performance approaches, including Cash on Delivery.

If confirmed, I am committed to achieving results that sustain in the most efficient and effective way. However, in pursuing this results focus, I also want to ensure that the approaches we use do not undermine or distort current systems such that the countries on their own are not able to sustain this assistance.

Africa

Question. At a time when China and other countries are making huge inroads into Africa, often displacing American influence, how would you advance American interests in this competitive environment?

Answer. I believe America can continue to assert influence as a global leader in Africa, even as sub-Saharan Africa attracts significant investment from China and many other countries. At the U.S.-Africa Leader's Summit (ALS) President Obama told the largest gathering of African leaders ever held in Washington, “We don’t look to Africa simply for its natural resources. We recognize Africa for its greatest resource which is its people and its talents and its potential.” The United States relationship with Africa is about much more than extracting minerals from the ground for our growth. The United States seeks to build partnerships that create jobs and opportunity for all our peoples, and unleash the next era of African growth. The U.S. approach provides a mix of investments in Africa representing a comprehensive American agenda that promotes influence in the forms of democracy, individual liberties and respect for the rule of law as well as soft power influence where we have a significant undisputed edge in working with African governments.

USAID can demonstrate leadership and advance American interests in Africa through development programming that engages and empowers Africans. USAID invests heavily in programs that ensure Africans have a stake in their own development and continues to engage in Africa on a large scale. In its first year, the Power Africa initiative made significant progress toward achieving its initial goal of adding 10,000 megawatts (MWs) and 20 million business and household electrical connections in six countries in sub-Saharan Africa. During the ALS, President Obama announced a tripling of Power Africa’s goals—Power Africa partners would work together to add 30,000 MW and 60 million connections across all of sub-Saharan Africa. Through Power Africa, USAID is coordinating a total of 12 U.S. Government agencies and working with over 100 private sector partners, multilateral development institutions, bilateral partners, and African governments to increase power generation across sub-Saharan Africa. To date, Power Africa has helped projects expected to generate over 4,100 megawatts of electricity generation capacity reach financial close.

Through the Feed the Future initiative, USAID is working with African governments, the African Union, and the private sector in Africa and abroad to address the root causes of hunger, poverty, and food crises. U.S. leadership is ensuring that the fight against hunger and poverty is a global endeavor. Indeed, our L’Aquila commitment of $3.5 billion over 3 years, which the United States met and surpassed, spurred other partners to pledge more than $18.5 billion. And the United States was instrumental in the development of five key principles that were subsequently adopted at the Rome World Summit on Food Security in November 2009. Now known as the Rome Principles, they constitute the foundation for collective, global action on agricultural development and food security. If confirmed, I will ensure that USAID continues to show such leadership on the continent through bilateral and regional partnerships with African institutions, and through the USG’s power to convene global responses to African challenges.

Through the Young African Leaders Initiative (YALI), the U.S. Government is empowering a new generation of young Africans to contribute to solving challenges in their communities and around the world. YALI works in partnership with a robust network of stakeholders from across the continent and in the United States to support young African leaders as they spur growth and prosperity, strengthen democratic governance, and enhance peace and security across Africa. This initiative also builds lasting linkages between the United States and Africa in government, business and civil society.

At the same time, since China is the largest single trading partner with the African region, it is important that the United States engage the Chinese to channel global development resource flows toward more transparent, accountable, and transformative development objectives in line with our values. Through this engagement, the USG has an opportunity to encourage compliance with international standards for environmental and social risk assessments. If confirmed, I will work with the Department of State on developing a strategic framework for enhancing this engagement.

As outlined in the President Obama’s U.S. Strategy toward sub-Saharan Africa, the United States commitment to Africa is long-standing and deep. The United States has invested in development partnerships with Africans to foster sustained economic growth, promote food security, increase resilience to climate change, and improve the capacity of countries and communities to address HIV/AIDS, malaria and other health threats. This is the foundation of a continuing strong relationship between the U.S. and African nations.

Yemen

Question. Earlier this year, USAID suspended its conflict resolution programming in Yemen due to an escalation of conflict. What are your views of the proper role for USAID in Yemen and how USAID might be able to restart these important programs?

Answer. As you know, USAID supports local, civilian-led conflict mitigation programs and efforts to foster dialogue throughout many countries worldwide. Yemen currently faces a humanitarian crisis, with conditions deteriorating rapidly, and USAID is focused on addressing this crisis through its continued life-saving humanitarian assistance. Since FY 2014, the Agency has provided $158 million in humanitarian assistance to conflict-affected and vulnerable populations in Yemen. USAID works through trusted humanitarian partners that are seasoned professionals with many decades of experience working in conflict zones and difficult operating environments, such as Somalia and Afghanistan.

In light of the extremely difficult security and operational situation in Yemen, some USAID programs, including social and economic development programs, have been suspended. The safety and security of USAID implementing partners, beneficiaries, and local staff in Yemen is USAID's first priority and the Agency does not want to put them at risk unnecessarily. I understand that USAID has worked diligently to ensure that this suspension will allow the Agency to keep programs in place so that it can quickly restart activities—including conflict management and mitigation activities—at any point when the situation is permissive, civil society partners can meet in a safe environment, and USAID can ensure sufficient program oversight.

Risk assessments missing in program planning

Question. While USAID has increased its partnerships with local partners in country-led programming, the Government Accountability Office reports risk assessments that are carried out by USAID are many times not used during program planning in order to mitigate those risks. How would you address this as Administrator?

Answer. It is my understanding that USAID has addressed the concerns raised in the GAO report regarding the alignment of its fiduciary risk assessments with its program planning process. If confirmed as Administrator, I am committed to creating the conditions whereby countries can lead, resource, and sustain their own development. To the extent that effective government systems are key to sustaining desired results, under my leadership, the Agency will continue to invest directly in those systems to improve their function. I will ensure that the Agency continues to conduct in-depth fiduciary risk assessments at the country level, as well as at the institutional level for those organizations in which the Agency is directly investing.

My understanding is that in 2014 USAID revised its internal regulations to align its processes for fiduciary risk assessment and program planning, and accompanied that revision with a worldwide training program. If confirmed, I will work to ensure that USAID staff worldwide are familiar with and implementing these regulations so that these fiduciary risk assessments are used in program planning in order to mitigate such risks.

Grants vs. contracts

Question. In order to achieve maximum accountability for results, efficient use of resources, and the incorporation of lessons learned from prior development efforts, what do you think the appropriate balance is between contracts, grants, and cooperative agreements in acquisitions associated with development?

Answer. To achieve maximum accountability and results, I believe that the appropriate choice of instrument will vary from activity to activity. The decision to use a grant, contract, or cooperative agreement should be based on a rigorous program design in which intended results, efficiencies, and lessons learned are incorporated.

I understand that USAID has a history of robust use of all three mechanisms with assistance instruments such as grants and cooperative agreements receiving 60–70 percent of USAID obligations and contracts receiving 30–40 percent. I also understand that USAID's official policy states that there is no preference for acquisition instruments over assistance instruments or vice versa.

In addition, I believe it is important to ensure that the choice of instrument is made in accordance with principles found in the Federal Grant and Cooperative Agreement Act.

Please be assured that if confirmed, I will ensure that results, efficiencies, and lessons learned are used in each of these implementing mechanisms.

ADMINISTRATOR-DESIGNATE SMITH'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CARDIN

Country ownership

Question. Americans are proud that our country is the world's most generous provider of assistance to save lives in emergencies and help people and countries work their way out of poverty. Over the years this assistance has helped other countries achieve some incredible results—including 1 billion people being lifted out of poverty in this century.

- ◆ How do we make sure that our aid is leaving lasting results that countries can build upon, so they can grow their economies, strengthen their institutions and the rule of law, and get to the point where they are eventually funding their needs with their own economic growth?
- ◆ What administrative reforms can we expect you to prioritize to ensure that we make sure we are getting the furthest mile on every U.S. taxpayer dollar going overseas—and what can Congress do to alleviate the pressure to burn money too quickly, measure quantitative outputs versus impact, etc.?
- ◆ How would you invest to increase the impact of successful efforts like the Local Solutions initiative?

Answer. USAID is committed to creating the conditions whereby countries can lead, resource, and sustain their own development, a commitment that I share and will prioritize, if confirmed. I agree that country ownership—mutually agreed-upon priorities, direct implementation through local systems as the default choice, and domestic resourcing by local governments, civil society, and the private sector—should be at the core of how USAID does business. My understanding is that the Agency is delivering on this commitment through the following organizational and programmatic reforms, which I will prioritize if confirmed:

- ◆ The Agency has put in place policies and a program planning process that enable it to project results over a longer timeframe and align its staffing and resources accordingly.
- ◆ USAID is ensuring that its country strategies and project designs prioritize and measure sustainability through country ownership, regardless of the sector. This increasingly entails broad local stakeholder involvement in the Agency's planning processes. It also entails analysis (e.g. political economy analysis) and action (i.e. improved governance) on the constraints to sustainability, all of which may not be fully in the Agency's manageable control.
- ◆ The Agency has put in place the appropriate controls to prudently invest directly in local governments, civil society, and bolstering the private sector (as relevant) to ensure that those stakeholders are accountable, effective, and can sustain results on their own.
- ◆ USAID has introduced new guidance and methodologies for monitoring and evaluating project performance. USAID programs are closely and actively monitored in-country—including through the use of objective, third-party evaluations—to track results at every level (input, output, outcome) and to make room for midcourse correction when changes are needed. In addition, through the use of rigorous methodologies the Agency is able to evaluate the impact of its programs and the extent to which outcomes can be attributed to USAID interventions.
- ◆ The Agency has almost doubled its Foreign Service staffing to increase its ability to engage directly with local governments, civil society, and private sector; negotiate policy reforms; leverage the local private sector; build capacity; innovate; and manage its assistance programs.
- ◆ USAID is promoting the mobilization of local resources in countries where it works through tax modernization; coinvestments and guarantees with the local private sector; budding philanthropy; and alternative business models such as social enterprises and social impact investment.

Health workforce

Question. What is the overarching vision and strategy for helping the Ebola-affected countries and other developing country partners to build a well-trained, well-equipped and well-supported health workforce that can stop threats like Ebola, and at the same time help achieve other major priorities like ending preventable child and maternal deaths?

Answer. USAID has worked closely with the national governments of the Ebola-affected countries as well as with other U.S. Government agencies and bilateral and multilateral donors to develop a health country plan for each country, which directly supports national strategies and reaches the most vulnerable populations. USAID's programs focus on restoring non-Ebola essential primary health services delivery while supporting the rehabilitation of health systems, including the capacity to prevent, detect, and respond to future outbreaks before they become epidemics, in line with our Global Health Security Agenda.

To support service delivery, USAID will focus its efforts on health promotion and behavior change and communication at the community level. These efforts will help to reduce the fear of returning to health clinics and promote primary health services, particularly maternal and child health services. Support will also focus on the reopening of community health facilities in USAID-targeted communities which follow new established standards and norms for infection prevention and control, training of health care workers, and ensuring the availability of essential health commodities at the facility level. Additional support will also be provided for service delivery through existing nontraditional, community platforms, such as national health weeks and immunization campaigns, which will help to serve as a stop-gap measure until community-based facilities are up and running.

USAID will focus on a variety of activities to improve health systems in both the short- and long-term in each country. Priority programs will include capacity-building for health care worker training programs to better support the recruitment, training, supervision, and retention of health care workers at all levels. Support will also be provided for curriculum development, training tools and materials, helping to develop a professional training track for community health care workers, and integration of new health workers recruited and trained during the crisis. Significant efforts will also be made to support the supply chain management efforts from forecasting and procurements to storage and delivery at the community level. Additional efforts will be considered to help support the local Ministries of Health on governance, health care financing (to help manage the additional influx of resources from donors), management and oversight. All three affected countries have requested support in setting up an infection prevention and control unit within the Ministry of Health to ensure the quality control and implementation of standards and norms for infection prevention and control implementation throughout all clinical settings.

USAID-supported recovery efforts will build upon systems and activities put in place during the emergency response efforts to further enhance each country's capacity in detecting, preventing, and responding to further outbreaks of Ebola and other infectious disease threats.

These efforts, combined with the efforts of other donors, will collectively support the national recovery strategies in each country and help to support overall efforts to end preventable maternal and child death.

Maternal and child health

Question. In 2012, the United States led on the Survival Call to Action roadmap that identified key barriers that we needed to address to bend the curve on ending child deaths and increase child survival and health.

- ◆ How is the United States moving this agenda forward?
- ◆ How can you deepen or expand that commitment or vision?
- ◆ How will you ensure that we are working with the highest-burden countries and promoting equity for children across the globe to ensure we are reaching all children?

Answer. Since 2009, the Obama administration has been strategically focusing its maternal and child health programs on countries with the highest burdens of maternal, newborn, and child deaths and where the United States had the opportunity to make a difference in this outcome. By focusing on countries and populations with the highest need, U.S. programs have helped save millions of lives, contributing to greater equity and more inclusive development. In USAID's 24 priority countries that account for more than 70 percent of global child and maternal deaths, nearly 800,000 more children survived in 2013 than in 2008, contributing to a cumulative total 2.4 million lives saved.

USAID's 2014 report "Acting on the Call: Ending Preventable Child and Maternal Deaths" outlined an evidence-based plan to accelerate progress in USAID priority countries-sharpening field programs, realizing efficiencies, and improving accountability to yield the greatest number of lives saved, while building systems and partnerships to sustain progress. Building on this momentum, USAID appointed a Child and Maternal Survival Coordinator in 2015, focused on: (1) continuing to sharpen the Agency's work toward Ending Preventable Child and Maternal Deaths; (2) intensifying external engagement with Congress and partners, advocates, civil society, faith groups, and partner country leaders that are critical to progress; and (3) increasing financing for EPCMD.

USAID is working to accelerate its action through a new framework to track success, support missions, and ensure that resources are in place to sustain the effort.

By enhancing existing internal processes such as the annual operational plan development, USAID can improve its performance and ensure that our investments are focusing on the highest priorities. Dashboards have been developed to rigorously measure progress at both the outcome level and input level. The dashboards facilitate a more organized, coordinated system for tracking, and managing progress, and are a supporting tool in a comprehensive approach to measuring progress.

I understand USAID is working to release the second “Acting on the Call” report in summer 2015, following up on commitments and targets set in the 2014 report. Through dashboards and these annual reports, USAID is holding itself and its partners accountable for accelerating our impact on ending preventable child and maternal deaths.

Ending Preventable Child and Maternal Deaths cannot be accomplished by USAID alone. In 2012, the Governments of Ethiopia, India, and the United States, in collaboration with UNICEF, hosted the Call to Action to unite the global community around this achievable goal. The same partners convened again in 2014 to assess progress and identify challenges. This year, the Government of India will host a followup global conference in August, cohosted by the Governments of Ethiopia and the United States, and UNICEF. Since 2012, 20 governments have committed to—and most have developed—national plans to accelerate progress, set clear priorities and costs and scorecards to systematically track outcomes.

Since the beginning of the Obama administration, the U.S. Government has increased investments in global child and maternal survival with the strong, bipartisan support of Congress. Worldwide, government health expenditures and donor contributions have seen meaningful growth. There still remains a gap in financing needed to build on progress to date and bridging that gap will require strategies that incorporate domestic resource mobilization, global engagement, USAID’s Health Financing Framework, and targeted country-specific interventions. As countries experience unprecedented economic growth, a new transitional model of aid can better mobilize domestic public, private, and other innovative sources of funding to create a bridge toward equity, sustainability, and self-sufficiency. If confirmed, I am committed to building on the successes of USAID’s efforts to end preventable maternal and child deaths.

Question. As you know, land tenure is a critical element of food security. However, smallholder farmers, particularly women farmers, are often at risk of having their land seized without their consent in large land acquisitions. This has been a challenge in efforts to promote food security and helped drive the development of the land tenure guidelines, which I am pleased that the United States supported.

- ◆ What are your thoughts on how USAID can ensure a strategy that includes participation of small-scale farmer’s organizations and prioritizes their needs?
- ◆ Will USAID continue to support policies favoring large agribusiness and large-scale land acquisition in Africa?
- ◆ How will USAID avoid being involved in projects that fail to respect the legitimate tenure rights of local people, especially in post-disaster or post-conflict assistance where communities are especially vulnerable?
- ◆ What role do you see for the U.S. Government/USAID in fostering increased investments by donor and host governments in the agricultural sector of countries facing food insecurity, specifically investments geared toward benefiting smallholder farmers?

Answer. I fully agree that land tenure is a critical element of food security. Indeed, smallholder farmers, particularly women farmers, are often at risk of having their land seized without their consent in large land acquisitions. This has been a challenge in efforts to promote food security and helped drive the development of the land tenure guidelines you reference.

USAID has taken steps to ensure that land-based investments are responsible, inclusive, and sensitive to the interests and concerns of local communities. USAID supports efforts to combat hunger, poverty, and malnutrition through the U.S. Government’s Feed the Future initiative, which prioritizes improving smallholder farmer access to tools, technologies, and markets as they are the backbone of rural economies. If confirmed, I will ensure that Feed the Future continues to prioritize country ownership, and backs strategies developed by host country governments with input and ongoing engagement across a range of important stakeholders, including smallholder farmer organizations, local private sector, and research organizations, to ensure inclusive agricultural growth.

USAID, through Feed the Future, supports the principles of the New Alliance for Food Security and Nutrition, a shared commitment among African governments, donors, development partners, and the private sector that was launched in 2012 to encourage responsible private sector engagement in promoting inclusive growth in the agriculture sector for sustainable impact against poverty and malnutrition. If confirmed, I will ensure that the Agency continues to reinforce efforts to create an enabling environment for responsible investment that include commitments among participating parties to adhere to the Voluntary Guidelines on the Responsible Governance of Tenure of Land, Fisheries and Forests in the Context of National Food Security.

I understand that USAID has developed Operational Guidelines for Responsible Land-Based Investment, which serve as guidance to the private sector on how to ensure that land-based investments protect local communities and do not displace or disadvantage local populations. Through training and technical assistance, research and evaluation, policy reform, and pilot projects, USAID is committed to implementing the principles set forth in the Principles for Responsible Investment in Agriculture and Food Systems and Voluntary Guidelines for the Responsible Governance of Tenure of Land, Fisheries, and Forests. These international law instruments create important standards of practice that protect people and communities and create an enabling environment that promotes broad-based economic growth and reduces extreme poverty. If confirmed, I will promote the full utilization of these instruments in all USAID's economic growth programs.

USAID plays a lead role globally in promoting agriculture sector and food security investments through development partnerships at all levels. Data indicate that the agriculture sector is more than twice as effective in reducing poverty and increasing food security as other economic growth activities. A focus on reducing poverty and undernutrition requires a clear focus on improving the status of smallholder farmers. If confirmed, I will ensure that USAID investments focus clearly on the needs and opportunities of small-scale farming families and communities, where the great majority of the poor and food-insecure live. With its emphasis on sustainability through country-led partnerships, I understand that Feed the Future has helped spur significant increases in host-country investments in agriculture and food security. At their recent summit in Malabo for example, Africa's leaders adopted agriculture and food security as a main development focus, committing to invest 10 percent of national budgets in agriculture. Evidence-based partnerships are occurring in other food-insecure regions as well. Feed the Future is clearly contributing to reductions in both poverty and child stunting in countries where USAID works. If confirmed as USAID's Administrator, I will strengthen partnerships with both beneficiary countries, donor countries, and other investors to ensure that a clear priority on agriculture and food security continues to emphasize gains in small-farm communities.

USAID is uniquely placed to drive gains for smallholder farmers, producers, and rural families that work in goods and services around agriculture-based value chains. Through partnerships with the U.S. university community for example, Feed the Future Innovation Labs are leading the way in developing new technologies and sustainable management practices that focus on increasing productivity and reducing risk in small-scale farming. Through global research alliances that link scientists and students in the United States with counterparts in partner countries and key international research organizations, USAID is leveraging the best of global science to enhance the lives and livelihoods of rural producer communities across Africa, Asia and Latin America. If confirmed, I will continue and enhance a focus on increasing both productivity and profitability of their enterprises and the private sector value chains that depend on them. I will work to ensure that USAID investments continue to drive agriculture and food security gains in ways that also enhance employment opportunities for the young—men and women—both on farm and off.

Countering violent extremism

Question. Countering Violent Extremism (CVE) has emerged as a top White House priority, as evidenced by the February summit. And the State Department just released the Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review, which highlighted a CVE strategy that stressed the need for good governance and the importance of addressing corruption.

- ◆ What were the key outcomes/take-aways of the Kenyan CVE summit?
- ◆ How will the strategies discussed there inform broader prevention efforts in sub-Saharan Africa?
- ◆ In your view, what are USAID's strongest tools when it comes to CVE? How does USAID plan to utilize tools to address the root causes of radicalization in the West African and Sahel contexts to counter the ideology of groups such as Boko Haram and al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM)?

Answer. The Kenya Countering Violent Extremism (CVE) summit will be held in Nairobi on June 25–28. This will be one of several regional summits held in the wake of the White House summit in February and in the leadup to the Senior Leader summit to be held in New York around the U.N. General Assembly.

This summit builds on a foundation of existing engagements aimed at building cooperation in the East Africa region, such as the Global Counter Terrorism—Horn of Africa Working Group and the Partnership for Regional Counterterrorism in East Africa. The participants for the Kenya CVE summit will represent a broad spectrum of government and civil society from throughout the region. The objective is to enhance further regional cooperation and coordination, as well as develop a joint understanding of how violent extremists gain and sustain support among some local populations. By sharing knowledge and best practices, the conference will help strengthen the response to violent extremism in the East Africa region and beyond. USAID is a key member of the U.S. delegation to the Kenya summit and will participate in all the other planned regional summits.

The White House CVE summit and the regional summits have highlighted the value of USAID's approach to addressing violent extremism as part of a whole-of-government response to terrorist threats in Africa and worldwide. In 2011, USAID released an agency-level policy, the Development Response to Violent Extremism and Insurgency, that outlines best practices from several years of CVE programming, as well as from research on the factors that drive violent extremist recruitment and how development assistance can help mitigate these root causes. A critical aspect of effective CVE programming is building community resilience, which is particularly key in areas at recurring risk of exploitation by violent extremist groups. At its core, USAID's approach is based on understanding the legitimate concerns of minority populations in areas most at risk to violent extremism; working with local community organizations and government officials to address those concerns; building respect for human rights and the rule of law among all parties; and promoting respected, moderate voices who can encourage peaceful solutions to expressed grievances. I understand that based on evaluations of USAID programs in Chad, Niger, Mali, and Kenya, these programs have made a measurable impact among local populations by undermining support for violent extremist rhetoric and activities.

It is my belief that the United States needs a broad array of tools in its toolkit to counter terrorism effectively. USAID's programs attempt to address problems at their source by decreasing the momentum and rationale behind violent extremist recruitment while reducing local sympathies and support for extremists. These efforts complement our Nation's ongoing diplomatic, defense, and intelligence assets aimed at reducing the terrorist threat to ourselves and our partners.

The Europe and Eurasia Bureau

Question. With the rise of a belligerent Russia, the E&E Bureau has taken on new prominence and significant budget responsibilities especially with respect to Ukraine, yet the E&E Bureau does not have offices in the main headquarters building. This sends a bad message and hampers the Bureau's ability to coordinate with the rest of USAID.

- ♦ What can be done to address this issue?
- ♦ Would you consider at least moving the leadership of the E&E Bureau into the main USAID building?

Answer. I have not been involved in any decisions related to space within USAID's headquarters. If confirmed, I look forward to receiving a briefing from the relevant personnel on the Agency's plans with respect to the allocation of space and will ensure that our plans are consistent with Agency priorities and staffing requirements.

MENA

Question. In 2011 the Arab Spring protests and calls for nonviolent reform offered tremendous hope for the potential of the Middle East region. Four years later we face a long, cold winter with many states reverting to old bad habits of closing off all avenues for nonviolent political expression or economic opportunity. Worse yet, we are facing failed or close to failing states in Yemen, Libya, and Syria. In the face of such unpredictability, instability, and violence the U.S. diplomatic presence and USAID field offices have been forced to draw down or close. In other areas, governments are actively confronting USAID funded programs and projects.

- ♦ How are you thinking about U.S. assistance and development engagement in the Middle East and North Africa against this depressing and alarming backdrop?
- ♦ Do we need to change the way we do business, or the missions we pursue, in the region?

Answer. USAID works with local and international partners to address the tremendous needs in the Middle East and North Africa. USAID recognizes that capable and accountable governance institutions are crucial to the sustainability of our development investments, which is why the Agency seeks to integrate democracy, human rights and governance principles and practices across all programming.

USAID's approach in the Middle East is twofold; the Agency works not only with governments, but also at a grassroots level, changing the lives of individuals and transforming communities. USAID works closely with national governments where that is possible, and where national-level governance institutions are lacking, USAID works at the local level, with municipal councils or local civil society, to help meet the immediate needs of the people in the region as well as build sustainable local governance structures that can support a move to resilient democratic societies. Local- and municipal-level governance issues are an increasingly important component to USAID's work in the region, especially in communities affected by conflict and crisis. Key elements in all USAID programs are a deep analysis of the political context, supporting citizen engagement in policymaking and service delivery, and promoting the rights of all citizens and groups to ensure equitable development gains. USAID programs represent a long-term investment in the people and communities of the Middle East and North Africa and build on the Agency's mission to partner to end extreme poverty and promote resilient, democratic societies while advancing our own security and prosperity.

USAID is constantly reassessing the way it does business and the specific programs in which it invests. Each country and regional program begins with a careful assessment of local needs and capacity for reform. Once programs are implemented they are carefully monitored and evaluated for effectiveness and lessons learned. Security concerns remain a significant challenge, and the security of USAID staff and implementing partners is paramount. In places where USAID has no direct-hire staff on the ground, the Agency uses local and international partners as well as remote management techniques to continue and ensure close oversight of USAID programs.

If confirmed, I look forward to working with Agency personnel, the Congress, and our implementing partners to ensure our programming is achieving maximum impact and effectiveness.

Humanitarian response (Syria)

Question. In addition to the recently closed $10 million USAID/DCHA/OFDA Annual Program Statement to support local capacity-building and emergency response efforts in Syria, in what other ways can USAID best support long-term efforts to more effectively reach the over 12.2 million IDP's inside Syria that are in need of humanitarian assistance?

Answer. USAID continues to work through all channels—including the United Nations (U.N.), international organizations, nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), and local Syrian organizations and networks—to maximize the reach of critical, lifesaving assistance to conflict-affected populations throughout Syria. This includes assistance that originates in Syria as well as cross-line and cross-border assistance. By using all means possible to get lifesaving assistance to those in need throughout the country—including in regime, contested, and opposition—held areas—USAID is reaching all 14 governorates of Syria.

The administration's ultimate humanitarian priority is to provide lifesaving assistance to all that we are able to reach and continue to push for consistent, safe, and secure access for humanitarian aid workers. As part of ongoing efforts to address the increase in humanitarian needs in an extremely fluid conflict, USAID continues to identify and support opportunities to strengthen and maximize the reach of humanitarian assistance throughout Syria. As part of all humanitarian programs, including USAID's Office of U.S. Foreign Disaster Assistance (OFDA) Annual Program Statement, USAID partners provide technical assistance to local organizations to strengthen their ability to meet the needs of affected populations. USAID works with other donors and implementing partners to identify opportunities to transition from emergency response to longer term early recovery and development programs. The Agency's humanitarian experts coordinate closely with development counterparts to help ensure that, when humanitarian assistance programs end, basic social services can be maintained.

The needs in Syria are significant and USAID has had to balance these needs with those of other crises around the world, prioritizing the most immediate lifesaving assistance first. I understand that USAID is working closely with the State Department as well as other international donors to encourage countries to follow through on pledges made at the Kuwait conference, especially Gulf States.

Egypt

Question. President Sisi has made economic stabilization a priority for his administration and has committed to creating employment through megaprojects like the expansion of the Suez Canal. U.S. assistance has focused supporting education, entrepreneurs, and small and medium-sized enterprises, most notably through the Higher Education Initiative and the Egyptian American Enterprise Fund.

♦ In what ways do U.S. assistance and Egyptian economic development initiatives complement each other?

Answer. U.S. economic assistance to Egypt is designed to work across all sectors to support and strengthen Egyptian actors who advance democratic ideals. Improved employment and economic opportunity are cornerstones of stability in Egypt. Poverty and economic exclusion, when unaddressed, inhibit the ability of individuals to invest in their own future and make them vulnerable to forces of instability as they struggle to provide for their daily needs.

I understand that USAID supported Egypt's Ministry of Planning in developing the country's Sustainable Development Strategy, released in March 2015. The strategy has four principal goals: (1) improved economy, including macroeconomic, tax, and subsidy reforms to reduce the deficit and lower inflation; (2) improved business enabling environment through regulatory and institutional reforms; (3) better access for all Egyptians to services and employment opportunities; and (4) increased investment in human capital, specifically reforming education and health systems. The strategy also emphasizes improving social safety nets and promoting opportunity for women and youth.

USAID is positioned to support the Government of Egypt's vision outlined in its Sustainable Development Strategy. USAID programs in economic growth, education, health, and democracy and governance are designed to address the core development issues identified in the Government of Egypt's strategy. USAID supports major themes of the strategy, including macroeconomic policy reform, small and medium enterprise development, vocational and technical education, and social justice and inclusion.

For example, building skills in Egypt's private sector workforce, particularly in small business, tourism, and agriculture, is a key component of USAID's development approach. USAID also recognizes the need to work within the health care system to provide better care in rural community clinics and promote infection control programs in hospitals. USAID's technical and vocational school interventions and programs that support science, technology, engineering, and mathematics education promote private sector growth and enterprise development. Many of USAID's activities target underserved areas, mainly in rural Egypt. All of these interventions are supportive of the Government of Egypt's Sustainable Development Strategy.

Answer. Consistent with U.S. foreign policy objectives, assistance activities in Egypt are designed to promote both political and economic reform. U.S. assistance focuses on various aspects of the enabling environment needed both for inclusive economic growth and improved governance. Support also assists in making public institutions more accountable and effective, and in empowering Egypt's citizens.

If confirmed as Administrator, I will ensure USAID's continued commitment to promoting essential democracy and governance principles in Egypt. While advancing certain democracy, rights and governance issues is a challenge in the current environment, the Agency is moving forward with support to civil society organizations to combat gender-based violence, promote women's empowerment, counter trafficking in persons, promote religious tolerance, and support rights of people with disabilities. Many international and Egyptian civil society organizations remain committed to working with USAID. The Agency also works to empower Egyptian civil society actors across its assistance programs, including in education, economic development and health.

The Egyptian Government has also specifically requested USAID assistance in key areas such as election administration reforms, training Egyptian judges, and decentralizing Egypt's Government in line with provisions of Egypt's new Constitution. USAID also has mechanisms in place to support parliamentary strengthening once a new Parliament is elected.

Question. There is solid evidence that early malnutrition, especially during the 1,000 day window from pregnancy to age 2, is an obstacle to cognitive and physical development. It affects long-term health, learning and earning potential. Malnutrition, in other words, is a constraint to economic growth.

Malnutrition is also the underlying cause of half of all deaths of children before they reach their 5th birthday. Having the benefit of the recently launched USAID Multi-Sectoral Nutrition Strategy and the soon-to-be launched U.S. Whole of Government Nutrition Coordination Plan, how would you build upon global momentum on maternal and child nutrition to achieve and increase U.S. nutrition commitments and high impact interventions that help children to survive and thrive?

Answer. USAID's multidisciplinary approach to addressing malnutrition works across the Agency's programs, including the U.S. Government's Feed the Future and Global Health activities, the Office of Food for Peace development programs, resilience efforts, and nutrition investments through economic growth, water and sanitation, and other sectors. USAID's focus is primarily on the prevention of under-nutrition during the first 1,000 days—from pregnancy through a child's second birthday—through comprehensive programs in health, humanitarian assistance, and food security. Last year, the Agency's efforts reached over 12.5 million children under 5 with nutrition interventions. Over the past 18 months, USAID has led the development of a consolidated U.S. Government Nutrition Coordination Plan to harness the power of the diverse investments across the U.S. Government through better communication and collaboration, and to create stronger links between research and program implementation. This plan is expected to be launched this fall.

The Agency's high level goal to End Preventable Child and Maternal Deaths has nutrition at its core with renewed investments to promote breastfeeding, improve maternal nutrition for mothers' health and for the healthy growth and development of babies, and for better feeding practices for infants and young children. Better nutrition includes clean water, better hygiene and sanitation to prevent the vicious cycle of infection and chronic undernutrition.

Multisectoral attention in nutrition interventions is producing positive results. In Bangladesh, 2014 survey results show an almost 15 percent average reduction in stunting during the past 3 years across priority geographical areas where Feed the Future programs are concentrated. In Ethiopia, through Feed the Future and Food for Peace development and emergency programs, USAID is supporting progress toward achieving real reductions in stunting, with rates declining by 9 percent over the past 3 years, resulting in 160,000 fewer stunted children despite a growing population.

If confirmed, I will continue to scale up USAID's successful multisectoral programs and exercise strong leadership, including through its critical role in the global Scaling Up Nutrition—or SUN—Movement, to leverage the combined efforts and commitments of multiple donors and countries to drastically reduce chronic malnutrition globally. SUN is a global movement comprised of 55 country governments, civil society, private sector, and donors and provides a global spotlight on the challenges and progress in eliminating undernutrition.

TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR BOXER

Question. Supporting Women Globally.—This year marked the 20th anniversary of the 4th World Conference on Women. Over the past 20 years, the international community has made important progress on advancing the rights of women worldwide. However, as long as women and girls around the globe continue to face violence and discrimination and are denied the opportunity to exercise their most basic rights, the United States must continue to focus on women and girls as a cornerstone of its foreign policy and development.

◆ If confirmed, how will you work to ensure that USAID programs continue to advance women's equality, health, political participation, and rights globally?

Answer. Throughout my career, I have been dedicated to initiatives that empower women and girls. Gender equality and women's empowerment must be at the core of all of our development programs. Water, energy, agriculture, health, and education all affect men and women differently. These differences are not barriers but opportunities to maximize the impact of our work by delivering development in a more targeted, effective and sustainable way.

Over the past several years, the Agency has made important strides to elevate women and girls in its approach and programming. The U.S. National Action Plan (NAP) on Women, Peace, and Security (2011) and the subsequent USAID Implementation Plan are an integral part of the Agency's architecture for advancing gender equality and female empowerment. In 2012, USAID released the Gender Equality and Women's Empowerment Policy, which mandates that gender equality be integrated throughout all programs and initiatives. To help facilitate integration, USAID developed accompanying policy implementation guidance, a series of in-person and online gender training courses to build staff capacity, and a suite of technical resources and tools that have been disseminated to staff worldwide.

Now that the foundation has been established, the remaining challenge is to ensure that gender is truly integrated across all of the sectors in which the Agency works, including global initiatives such as eradicating extreme poverty, resilience, countering violent extremism, and responding to climate change. Doing so will require a deeper understanding of the challenges in each sector through in-depth gender analysis and impact measurement as well as the necessary resources to advance the solutions.

USAID has a major role in the White House's new Let Girls Learn initiative, which addresses the complex and varied barriers preventing adolescent girls from attending and completing school, and from realizing their potential as adults. USAID's Let Girls Learn approach is comprised of three main pillars: Increasing Access to Quality Education; Reducing Barriers such as school fees and the threat of violence; and Empowering Adolescent Girls.

If confirmed, I will work with Congress and with the talented men and women of USAID to build on this important progress.

Question. Improving Education for Adolescent Girls.—Globally, 62 million girls are not in school and approximately 17 million will never go to school. Of these girls, 35 million are adolescents who should be in or nearing secondary school. Statistics show that increased levels of girls' education support improved health, economic status, and political participation.

In 2013, I introduced legislation, named for Malala Yousafzai, which was designed to expand scholarship opportunities for disadvantaged young women in Pakistan through USAID's Merit and Needs Based Scholarship Program. In response to this legislation, I was pleased that USAID committed to provide 50 percent of all future program scholarships to women and is on track to meet that goal in calendar year 2015.

♦ If confirmed, how will you work to continue to expand educational opportunities for women and girls in Pakistan?

Answer. Pakistan's ability to educate its population is critical to the country's long-term stability and prosperity. I understand that, despite recent measures taken to expand Government of Pakistan spending and performance in this sector, Pakistan's challenges remain daunting. School-aged girls, specifically, face additional challenges; 55 percent of children out of school are girls. For those who do attend school, many are not learning what is needed to find employment and function in Pakistan's economy.

In line with Pakistan's Vision 2025, U.S. assistance helps Pakistan address obstacles to accessing quality basic and higher education, including for women and girls. Programming also provides ample opportunity to build collaborative relationships between U.S. and Pakistani individuals and institutions, which will have a long-term impact on Pakistan's trajectory and U.S.-Pakistan cooperation. If confirmed, I will ensure USAID's basic and higher education programs will continue to work to improve access to education for young Pakistanis, including women and girls. For example, I understand that in basic education, the Pakistan Reading Project (PRP) is USAID/Pakistan's flagship reading program, and will continue to support Pakistani-led efforts to introduce and institutionalize improvements in reading instruction and reading assessment in the first and second grade levels in public schools across Pakistan. The project will train more qualified female teachers for girls' and mixed gender primary schools, and will reach approximately 754,000 students, of which half are girls and, of the girls, 27 percent are adolescents.

In Sindh, I understand that USAID's Sindh Basic Education Project will continue to strengthen the capacity of the Government of Sindh to deliver quality education and empower communities to become more involved in their children's education. To improve educational outcomes and increase community involvement in education, the project will help construct schools, train teachers in early grade reading and mathematics instruction and provide basic reading and math skills to students. The program is projected to benefit over 82,000 adolescent girls.

In higher education, I understand USAID has seen an increase from 48 percent to 58 percent of university scholarships under USAID/Pakistan's Merit and Needs-Based Scholarship Program awarded to women. To date, 507 scholarships have been awarded to students; of these, 293 were given to female students. Pakistan also remains the largest Fulbright Scholars program country in the world, with half of all scholarships going to women.

- ◆ Will you commit to make girls' education—especially adolescent girls' education—a priority during your tenure at USAID?

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure that USAID will remain strongly committed to ensuring that girls succeed and stay in school. Advancing girls' education can unlock human potential on a transformational scale. Girls' education is key in the global effort to end extreme poverty. Investing in girls' education could boost agricultural output in sub-Saharan Africa by 25 percent, and if 10 percent more girls attend school, a country's GDP increases by an average of 3 percent.

Advancing girls' access to, and success in, education is integrated throughout the Agency's education portfolio. By integrating gender considerations across all USAID's education programs, the Agency has the potential to transform gender norms and achieve equality for all learners in a scalable and sustainable manner. USAID provides substantial support and funding aimed at ensuring that girls and adolescent females have increased equitable access to quality education, particularly in crisis and conflict-affected environments. Specifically in education, I understand that promoting gender equality remains a top priority in each of the three Education Strategy goal areas: increasing primary grade reading; youth and workforce development; and education in crisis- and conflict-affected areas.

One of the first USAID programs announced under Let Girls Learn is the one the First Lady announced during her trip last week in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, where USAID has partnered with the United Kingdom's Department for International Development (DFID) to provide girls who are not in school with access to accelerated and alternative learning programs in the conflict-affected areas of North Kivu, South Kivu, and Katanga. This program aims to benefit more than 755,000 girls ages 10 to 18 over the next 5 years, providing up to $180 million (up to $125 million by USAID and £36M committed by DFID). Through programs like this, and throughout the Agency's portfolio, USAID supports adolescent girls in getting the education they deserve.

Question. U.S. Efforts to Support International Family Planning.—Statistics clearly show that a woman's ability to decide when, whether, and how many children to have is fundamental to her ability to thrive and fully realize her rights and potential.

- ◆ How do you see access to voluntary family planning services as part of broader efforts to support women's health and rights?

Answer. Access to voluntary, affordable, and high-quality family planning services is an essential part of USAID's broader effort to support women's health and rights. When women are able to delay their first birth until at least age 18 and to space subsequent births at least 2 years apart, both mother and baby are more likely to survive. Some 225 million women in the developing world say they want to delay their next pregnancy or stop childbearing altogether but are not using a modern method of contraception. Fully meeting this unmet need by expanding access to, and use of, voluntary family planning would result in 52 million fewer unintended pregnancies, 70,000 fewer maternal deaths, and 500,000 fewer infant deaths annually. In addition, girls who can avoid pregnancy while in school are more likely to finish school.

Question. U.S. Efforts to End Preventable Maternal and Child Deaths.—In your testimony, you mentioned that continuing efforts to end preventable child and maternal deaths would be a priority for you if you are confirmed to be the Administrator of USAID.

It is more important than ever that the United States continue to make robust investments in maternal and child health. As a result of U.S. leadership, real and measurable progress has been made. In the 24 countries where U.S. involvement has been the greatest, maternal mortality has declined an average of 4 percent each year, faster than the global average.

- ◆ With this progress in mind, if confirmed, how will you work to continue and expand these effective investments to work toward achieving the global goal of ending preventable maternal and child deaths by the year 2035?

Answer. Since 2009, the Obama administration has been strategically focusing its maternal and child health programs on countries with the highest burdens of maternal, newborn, and child deaths and where the United States had the opportunity to make a difference in this outcome. By focusing on countries and populations with the highest need, U.S. programs have helped save millions of lives, contributing to greater equity and more inclusive development. In USAID's 24 priority countries that account for more than 70 percent of global child and maternal deaths, nearly 800,000 more children survived in 2013 than in 2008, contributing to a cumulative total 2.4 million lives saved.

USAID's 2014 report "Acting on the Call: Ending Preventable Child and Maternal Deaths" outlined an evidence-based plan to accelerate progress in USAID priority countries—sharpening field programs, realizing efficiencies, and improving accountability to yield the greatest number of lives saved, while building systems and partnerships to sustain progress. Building on this momentum, USAID appointed a Child and Maternal Survival Coordinator in 2015, focused on: (1) continuing to sharpen the Agency's work toward Ending Preventable Child and Maternal Deaths; (2) intensifying external engagement with Congress and partners, advocates, civil society, faith groups, and partner country leaders that are critical to progress; and (3) increasing financing for EPCMD. USAID is working to accelerate its action through a new framework to track success, support missions, and ensure that resources are in place to sustain the effort. By enhancing existing internal processes such as the annual operational plan development, USAID can improve its performance and ensure that our investments are focusing on the highest priorities. Dashboards have been developed to rigorously measure progress at both the outcome level and input level. The dashboards facilitate a more organized, coordinated system for tracking, and managing progress, and are a supporting tool in a comprehensive approach to measuring progress.

I understand USAID is working to release the second "Acting on the Call" report in summer 2015, following up on commitments and targets set in the 2014 report. Through dashboards and these annual reports, USAID is holding itself and its partners accountable for accelerating our impact on ending preventable child and maternal deaths.

Ending Preventable Child and Maternal Deaths cannot be accomplished by USAID alone. In 2012, the Governments of Ethiopia, India, and the United States, in collaboration with UNICEF, hosted the Call to Action to unite the global community around this achievable goal. The same partners convened again in 2014 to assess progress and identify challenges. This year, the Government of India will host a followup global conference in August, cohosted by the Governments of Ethiopia and the United States, and UNICEF. Since 2012, 20 governments have committed to—and most have developed—national plans to accelerate progress, set clear priorities and costs and scorecards to systematically track outcomes.

Since the beginning of the Obama administration, the U.S. Government has increased investments in global child and maternal survival with the strong, bipartisan support of Congress. Worldwide, government health expenditures and donor contributions have seen meaningful growth. There still remains a gap in financing needed to build on progress to date and bridging that gap will require strategies that incorporate domestic resource mobilization, global engagement, USAID's Health Financing Framework, and targeted country-specific interventions. As countries experience unprecedented economic growth, a new transitional model of aid can better mobilize domestic public, private, and other innovative sources of funding to create a bridge toward equity, sustainability, and self-sufficiency. If confirmed, I am committed to building on the successes of USAID's efforts to end preventable maternal and child deaths.

TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR RUBIO

On democracy, rights, and governance

Question. What guarantees can you give the committee that you will consult the democracy, rights, and governance (DRG) community on USAID's strategic objectives and program implementation? Are you willing to provide the committee with periodic reports on your consultations with the DRG community?

Answer. The community of implementing organizations—including grantees, contractors, universities, private sector organizations, labor, human rights and women's rights advocacy groups and other organizations—is essential to accomplishing USAID's mission to promote prosperous, resilient democratic societies. I believe that consultation with international and local partners is fundamental to the successful implementation of the Agency's programs. In developing strategies, programs, and implementing strategies, USAID policy calls for consultation with stakeholders and if confirmed, I will strongly support these efforts and will commit the Agency to providing periodic reports to the committee on our consultations with the democracy, rights and governance community.

Question. The United States has developed a strong nonprofit sector to implement, through cooperative agreements, programs in support of those seeking freedom and genuinely participatory governance. How will you ensure that funding for DRG programming will be maintained through the cooperative agreement mechanism?

Answer. I understand that cooperative agreements, as one form of assistance, are widely used and represent a successful approach for accomplishing objectives across many development sectors, particularly in the Democracy, Rights and Governance (DRG) sector. I further understand that contracts also have an appropriate role to play in implementing DRG assistance. My understanding is that the Agency is currently working to develop supplemental guidance for the DRG sector to assist field officers in determining the choice of mechanism in light of what they are trying to achieve and what in their judgment will produce success in that country setting. If confirmed, I look forward to consulting with Congress and our implementing partners to ensure we are getting this mix right.

Question. USAID has attempted to “mainstream” democracy and governance by claiming to incorporate it into traditional development programs (e.g., health, education, environment), yet the record is mixed on whether that actually works. What are your intentions to work with the DRG community on the incorporation of participatory mechanisms in traditional development programming?

Answer. “Mainstreaming” or what the Agency has defined as “Democracy, Rights and Governance (DRG) integration” involves the use of DRG approaches across other development sectors. This initiative is based on the understanding that technical solutions alone may be ineffective or unsustainable without a strong foundation based on good governance and effective, transparent, and accountable institutions. Indeed, the Agency’s programs in health, food security, climate change, economic growth all need to have components of citizen participation and government accountability to be successful.

If confirmed, I am committed to consulting partners in the DRG community on an ongoing basis to maximize the effectiveness and impact of our programs and ensure that democratic principles underpin all of our work.

Question. Specifically in the case of closed societies or countries where space for political activity and civil society is closing, what is your vision for USAID’s role in providing support in those instances? What specific steps would you implement to achieve your vision?

Answer. I believe that USAID has a critical role to play in supporting reform within closed societies. In doing so, however, the Agency must maintain an appropriate balance between the transparency of USAID’s programming on the one hand and the security of our implementing partners and program beneficiaries on the other hand. It is my understanding that over the past year, and in consultation with Congress and implementing partners, USAID has formulated and begun to implement a new policy in this area, which is available on its public Web site. The new guidance sets out core principles and detailed processes to govern the Agency’s work in this small set of countries. For example, USAID will work with prospective partners to identify all possible sources of risk to a proposed program. And the Agency will undertake senior-level quarterly reviews to ensure that all of our programs in these countries are sufficiently addressing risk and sufficiently fulfilling our obligation to transparency.

I think this represents a sensible approach, and if confirmed, look forward to working with the Agency, Congress, and our implementing partners to provide careful stewardship of these critical programs.

On Central America

Question. The State Department is asking for $1billion dollars for 1 year to improve security, advance good governance and stimulate the economy of El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras which are collectively known as the Northern Triangle Countries.

Answer. Much of USAID’s assistance in recent years has focused on crime and violence prevention through the Central America Regional Security Initiative (CARSI). Results from a Vanderbilt University impact evaluation of USAID’s CARSI community-based interventions in Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, and Panama show that USAID’s programs are reducing crime victimization and residents’ sense of insecurity. For example, in communities with USAID interventions, compared to control communities with no USAID intervention, there was a 51-percent decrease in residents’ awareness of murders in their own neighborhoods, 51-percent decrease in residents’ reports of extortions, 25-percent decrease in residents’ reports of illegal drug sales, and 19-percent decrease in residents’ reports of robberies.

USAID's governance programs focus on strengthening institutions at the national and subnational levels and improving citizens' and civil society's public participation. USAID has supported efforts to improve delivery of basic services, to incorporate citizen participation into public policy, to increase citizens' access to justice, to decrease impunity, and to improve governments' capacity to generate and collect their own revenue. For example, USAID/El Salvador's tax administration and expenditure management programs set up automated audits, one-stop shops for taxpayers, improved enforcement of tax policies, which have resulted in a 30-percent overall increase in revenue collections from 2010–2013. In terms of revenue collected as a percentage of GDP, USAID has helped El Salvador achieve an increase from 13.5 percent in 2010 to 15.5 percent in 2014.

Current USAID economic growth programming in Central America is limited in scope. In Guatemala and Honduras, USAID's Feed the Future programs promote food security, increase incomes, and enhance nutrition by improving production of staple and higher value crops, linking producers to markets, and supporting targeted nutrition interventions. In Honduras, over 3 years, USAID has helped to double incomes (from $0.62/day to $1.21/day) of over 22,000 farming families or 125,000 people in one of the poorest regions. Programs in El Salvador support the Partnership for Growth Joint Country Action Plan and include improvements to the business enabling environment, support to small and medium enterprises (SMEs), and efforts to boost market relevant skills in the labor force. In El Salvador, over 3 years, USAID has helped SMEs generate over $57 million in new sales and exports. Central America Regional programs are helping to reduce the time and cost to trade goods across borders. The Central America Strategy envisions greater investments in areas such as promoting regional integration, improving the business climate, supporting SME development, creating a productive workforce, and reducing poverty.

The Strategy for U.S. Engagement in Central America broadens USAID's vision for how it achieves security. USAID will balance its previous and ongoing citizen security-focused investments with proportional investments in prosperity and governance. USAID has prioritized three interconnected objectives: prosperity, governance, and security. A secure, democratic, and prosperous Central America will provide an environment in which all of its citizens choose to remain and thrive.

Question. Considering the history of corruption in some Central American countries, how does the administration plan to account for the $1 billion dollars?

Answer. My understanding is that all foreign assistance programs administered by USAID are required to have oversight processes in place to ensure the effectiveness of activities, to monitor funds spent by our partners, and to ensure compliance with federal regulations. USAID regularly evaluate its activities. Nearly all of its current resources are programmed through nongovernmental organizations and development companies, which are audited on a regular basis.

Going forward, I understand the Department of State and USAID intend to calibrate assistance in response to real reform efforts to send a clear message at the outset that resources will follow reform, and that they will reward the countries that are the most serious about reform. In my view, USAID programming cannot succeed without the right policy environment. Funding flexibility will enable the Department and USAID to support programs with the greatest potential and to ensure senior U.S. Government officials can press partner governments on the needs to make tough reforms.

USAID is developing a results framework for the U.S. Strategy for Engagement in Central America that identifies the key goals the strategy will advance. The framework will assess progress on three levels: programmatic, political will, and national level trajectory. USAID will prepare regular reports for U.S. Government principals to inform ongoing policy discussions.

Programmatic: The Department and USAID use both formal and informal methods to continuously monitor and evaluate the performance of its programs. A program tracker will allow USAID to determine what works and where its programs face obstacles. If necessary, principals will be able to intervene in order to accelerate or adjust implementation and to remove obstacles.

Political Will: While the United States is investing significant resources, success in Central America is first and foremost dependent on the Central American governments themselves taking ownership for creating the conditions for positive change in their countries. U.S. engagement and the possibility of a new U.S. approach to assistance has already leveraged greater efforts by Central American nations, and they are solidifying their 2016 budget plans to include significant financial contributions to programs. Initial political will indicators are derived from the March 3, 2015, Joint Statement between the Vice President and the Presidents of El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras as well as from the “Alliance for Prosperity.” This category will reflect an ongoing conversation with senior U.S. officials and leaders from the region; new indicators will be added based on these conversations.

National Level Trajectory: I believe it is important to bear in mind the desired outcome of a deepened and sustained U.S. engagement in Central America. While national-level indicators will not likely change on a quarterly basis—and may not change year to year—USAID is ultimately seeking to advance the most important indicators such as GDP growth, poverty rates, homicide rates, and perceptions of corruption throughout the region.

USAID measures good governance in a number of ways, and over the long term will rely on indicators from respected organizations such as Transparency International, Freedom House and the World Bank. Citizens’ trust in state institutions, increased collection and effective and transparent use of public revenue, and actions by the government that hold officials accountable are all indicative of the strength of government institutions.

USAID’s prosperity interventions will be measured by such illustrative indicators as income levels and the ability of citizens to participate in the formal economy.

On Haiti

Question. The planned funding by USAID for Haiti in fiscal year 2015 is $274 million. According to foreignassistance.gov, approximately $64 million has been obligated in the first 9 months of the year.

- ◆ Why has less than a quarter of the aid budgeted been spent when many Haitians continue to sit in emergency camps and desperately need our help?

Answer. As with all of our assistance programs, I believe it is critical that we strike the right balance between ensuring that our interventions are carried out in a timely manner while also performing appropriate due diligence, oversight and planning. I understand that as of March 31, 2015, USAID had approximately $1.8 billion available for long-term reconstruction and development in Haiti, of which $1.5 had been obligated; with disbursements totaling $1.3 billion or 72 percent of overall funds provided. In addition, I am told that 100 percent of the $1.2 billion provided for humanitarian assistance has been disbursed.

Regarding internally displaced persons, it is important to note that, as of March 2015, nearly 94 percent of the 1.5 million internally displaced people have left temporary camps for alternative housing options. USAID, for its part, provided shelter solutions to more than 328,000 people through transitional shelters (t-shelters), repairs to damaged houses, financial support to host families who housed displaced people, and provided short-term rental vouchers to affected families. USAID’s long-term strategy for the shelter sector is to support cost-effective ways to increase durable housing stock through private sector engagement and urban planning. This includes providing low-income households with access to housing finance and better infrastructure, and working in existing neighborhoods, and the Government of Haiti to expand access to basic services.

Question. As Haitian nationals are being repatriated by the Dominican Republic, is the aid currently being sent sufficient to help Haiti resettle these nationals? Or will additional funds be requested?

Answer. The administration continues to press for a diplomatic solution to the repatriation issue that will mitigate the need for a humanitarian response related to repatriated persons.

I understand that USAID is closely monitoring this situation but is not at the point of requesting additional funding.

Palestinian steps at the United Nations and the ICC

Question. On April 1, 2015, the Palestinians formally became a member of the International Criminal Court (ICC). Under current U.S. law, the administration is required to cut off Palestinian aid if the Palestinians pursue or support charges against Israel in a judicially authorized ICC case at the ICC.

The Palestinian Authority has also taken a series of detrimental steps at the United Nations over the past year, including an effort last year to push for a one-sided United Nations Security Council (UNSC) resolution that called for a final agreement within 12 months requiring total Israeli withdrawal to the pre-1967 lines by 2017, regardless of Israeli security concerns.

- ◆ If confirmed, will you continue to oppose the ICC’s politicization of these issues, as is current U.S. policy?
- ◆ What impact do you think President Mahmoud Abbas’s move should have on current U.S. aid to the Palestinians and America’s willingness to provide future assistance?

- ◆ What role is USAID currently playing in Gaza and what do you believe is the appropriate role for USAID going forward?
- ◆ There are troubling reports that some of the money that has made it into Gaza for reconstruction has been diverted for continued construction of Hamas terrorist tunnels. Is this true? If confirmed, what mechanisms will you put in place to ensure U.S. aid reaches its intended recipients?
- ◆ What steps will USAID take to employ proper auditing requirements on aid to the Palestinians? Will you ensure proper strict procedures are in place to ensure U.S. aid reaches its intended targets and is not abused to support Hamas or other Palestinian entities that support violence?

Answer. I understand that USAID, in conjunction with the State Department, continues to review U.S. assistance to the Palestinians. Although the administration's view is that the legislative restrictions related to Palestinian initiation or active support for an ICC judicially authorized investigation have not been triggered to date, we are deeply troubled by Palestinian action at the ICC and continue to voice our opposition to further actions to both the Palestinians and the international community.

The administration continues to believe that U.S. assistance to the Palestinian people is an important tool in promoting regional stability, economic development, and increased security for both Palestinians and Israelis.

Since the onset of the July–August 2014 conflict in Gaza, the United States has committed more than $231 million in humanitarian assistance to Gaza. This assistance has been provided to established U.N. and nongovernmental organizations, including the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA), the World Food Program, the United Nations Development Program, UNICEF, the International Committee for the Red Cross, and others. My understanding is that USAID is not currently aware of any reports that U.S. assistance for humanitarian aid in Gaza, including reconstruction, has been diverted for other purposes. The United States takes very seriously any reports of diversion of its assistance, and USAID has long required its partners in Gaza to take appropriate steps to prevent U.S. funding from being diverted for nonintended purposes.

Consistent with statutory requirements, USAID has appropriate procedures in place to ensure that Economic Support Fund (ESF) assistance for the West Bank and Gaza is not provided to or through, or diverted to, any individual or entity that is known to be involved in or advocating terrorism, including Hamas. USAID's vetting process checks non-U.S. individuals and entities within certain thresholds against law enforcement and intelligence community systems prior to local prime or subaward issuance. Worldwide, USAID requires grantees to sign its Certification Regarding Terrorist Financing in order to receive funds. In the West Bank and Gaza specifically, the annual Appropriations Act requires annual audits of all USAID direct awardees, as well as an annual Government Accountability Office audit of the use of all ESF assistance. USAID will continue providing humanitarian and other assistance to Palestinians in Gaza, in line with the administration's national security objectives, and in compliance with U.S. law.

I am committed to strong oversight of and accountability for the administration of foreign assistance funds entrusted to the Agency and preventing waste, fraud, or abuse, and if confirmed, this will be a top priority.

Egypt

Question. What is the current status of U.S. economic aid to Egypt? How can our aid to Egypt be better targeted to strengthen Egyptian actors that support democratic ideals? How will economic assistance to Egypt be used? Do you support current conditions on U.S. aid to Egypt, including the maintenance of the Egypt-Israel peace treaty?

Answer. U.S. economic aid to Egypt is designed to work across all sectors to support and strengthen Egyptian actors who advance democratic ideals. Poverty and economic exclusion, when unaddressed, inhibit the ability of individuals to invest in their own future and make them vulnerable to forces of instability as they struggle to provide for their daily needs.

Economic assistance to Egypt aims to help foster rapid, inclusive, and sustainable economic growth. USAID's economic growth programs focus on supporting sound macroeconomic management, improving the climate for private sector businesses, developing small and medium enterprises to create jobs, and promoting bilateral trade. Assistance in the education sector will strengthen basic skills in elementary school and adult literacy to increase the employability of young Egyptians. The U.S.-Egypt Higher Education Initiative provides scholarships to economically disadvantaged men and women and builds the capacity of Egyptian higher education institutions to meet the demands of a modern global economy. Programming across sectors in Egypt supports access to quality social services, including those related to education and health. Funding also aims to strengthen democratic governance in Egypt by working with civil society, improving the rule of law and enhancing efficiency of service delivery and transparency in government.

U.S. aid to Egypt across all sectors is targeted to strengthen Egyptian actors and institutions that support democratic principles, transparency and offer access to government services inclusively to Egyptian citizens. USAID works with the Government of Egypt on institutional reform initiatives in several sectors in order to improve transparency, accountability, and access. For example, to support more inclusive economic growth—essential for a stable and democratic Egypt—the Agency works with public and private actors to strengthen the enabling environment to allow Egyptian firms, particularly smaller ones, to take full advantage of profit opportunities in the market. At the request of the Government of Egypt, USAID also supports decentralization of the Egyptian public sector through work reforming Ministry of Finance and Ministry of Planning systems to increase transparency and allow for inclusion of Egyptian citizens at the local levels, including in budget oversight. This program seeks to identify reform leaders in the legal sector in order to build capacity and provide Egyptian citizens improved access to justice.

Support for a vibrant civil society is a cornerstone of any strong democracy, and an important priority across the USG, in line with President Obama's Stand with Civil Society agenda. USAID works to empower Egyptian civil society actors across all sectors of its assistance programs, including in education, economic development and health. Education programming supports the active leadership role of parents in communities through parent teacher associations which allow for engagement and advocacy with schools and the government. Through a one-stop-shop model piloted by USAID and managed by Egyptian business associations, business owners can register businesses with local government in a transparent and efficient manner, which minimizes opportunities for corruption. USAID also supports advocacy groups working to facilitate the enabling environment for small and medium entrepreneurs.

All of this work helps the USG build productive relationships with key public and private actors while supporting the foundations for an inclusive, democratic society. If confirmed as Administrator, I will ensure USAID's continued commitment to promoting stability through fostering rapid, inclusive, and sustainable economic growth and essential democracy and governance principles in Egypt.

On Cuba

Question. Recent media reports indicate that the Cuban Government has objected to the use of free Internet and the training of independent journalists, pursuant to USAID's democracy programs, at the U.S. Interests Section in Havana. Moreover, that this is one of the current obstacles in the establishment of diplomatic relations.

- ◆ a. Can you ensure the committee that the legally mandated U.S. democracy programs will not be restricted or readjusted pursuant to the ongoing negotiations with the Cuban Government?
- ◆ b. Can you ensure the committee that the legally mandated U.S. democracy programs will not be subject to any preapproval or collaborative process with the Cuban dictatorship?

Answer. As I mentioned in my testimony, I remain committed to programs that promote democracy, empower civil society, and foster independent media in Cuba. As you know, the Agency helps facilitate the free flow of uncensored information to, from, and within the island, as well as provide connectivity to the Internet for the millions who remain without access.

USAID works to promote free expression by supporting independent journalists around the world, particularly in closed countries where freedom of the press is lacking or independent journalists are under threat.

USAID democracy programs in closed societies around the world, including in Cuba, are not and will not be subject to preapproval by governments.

Question. As you are aware, Section 109 of the LIBERTAD Act authorizes the use of funds "to support democracy-building efforts for Cuba." These include:

- (1) Published and informational matter, such as books, videos, and cassettes, on transitions to democracy, human rights, and market economies, to be made available to independent democratic groups in Cuba.
- (2) Humanitarian assistance to victims of political repression, and their families.
- (3) Support for democratic and human rights groups in Cuba.
- (4) Support for visits and permanent deployment of independent international human rights monitors in Cuba.

- ♦ Can you ensure the committee that none of these funds authorized for “democracy-building efforts” will be used to support business promotion activities, of any sort, in Cuba?

Answer. USAID will continue with its traditional program areas of humanitarian assistance to political prisoners, marginalized groups, and their families, support for civil society and human rights, and the free flow of uncensored information to, from and within the island.

It is my understanding that the Agency does not anticipate supporting any new programs focused on business promotion activities. If confirmed, I commit to continuing to work with your office as well as others in the Congress to ensure the effectiveness and impact of these programs.

Supplementary question

Question. Do you believe that USAID has a role to play in supporting a democratic transition in Cuba? If so, what types of programs in Cuba would you support as Administrator?

Answer. My understanding is that USAID will continue to support efforts to promote democracy in Cuba, which is in keeping with the USG’s enduring objective—the emergence of a democratic, prosperous, and stable Cuba.

If confirmed as Administrator, I will support programs for democracy, civil society, and independent media in Cuba. These programs are consistent with the administration’s desire to empower the Cuban people to exercise their fundamental civil and political liberties by providing humanitarian assistance and support to civil society, and through promoting the increased flow of information to, from, and within Cuba.

If confirmed, I commit to continuing to work with your office and others in the Congress to further our shared goal of enabling the Cuban people to freely determine their own future.

On family planning

Question. If confirmed, can you guarantee there will be no change in USAID’s policy toward family planning services? In particular, continued strict adherence to the Helms amendment?

Answer. As you know, this is a complex issue and there are deeply held views among a diverse array of stakeholders. This administration and I are committed to improving the health and safety of women and girls around the globe, including survivors of sexual violence. If confirmed, I can guarantee that I will listen to your concerns.

Supplementary question

Question. Can you clarify your views on existing law? If confirmed, will you faithfully execute the law as it pertains to the Helms amendment?

Answer. Let me assure you that, if confirmed as Administrator, I will listen to your concerns, I will consult with you and other Members of Congress, and I will faithfully execute the law across the full range of my responsibilities, including all laws pertaining to restrictions on the use of foreign assistance funds.

Supplementary question

Question. Please elaborate.

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure that USAID fully abides by U.S. law, including the Helms amendment, which precludes USAID from using its resources to pay for the performance of abortion as a method of family planning or to motivate or coerce any person to practice abortions.

TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR MENENDEZ

Question. U.S. Assistance is not a blank check, especially not to the Palestinian Authority. I am concerned that our assistance seems to continue as usual, when the reality is that Palestinian leaders will still not commit direct negotiations for a two-state solution and even undermine them through maneuvers at the U.N. and the International Criminal Court.

- ♦ What will be your approach to U.S. assistance for the Palestinian Authority and how you will address this with your Israeli and Palestinian counterparts, if confirmed? What changes can I expect to see in how we are reprogramming our assistance in FY15 to make clear that this is not business as usual?

Answer. Let me begin by saying that the administration is deeply troubled by Palestinian action at the ICC and we continue to voice our opposition to further actions to both the Palestinians and the international community.

I understand that USAID, in conjunction with the State Department, continues to review U.S. assistance to the Palestinians. In FY 2014, I understand that a majority of USAID assistance for the West Bank and Gaza went to programs that directly support the Palestinian people, including humanitarian assistance following the conflict in Gaza. In FY 2015, USAID programs will focus on sectors that the administration believes support our national interest and benefit average Palestinians such as education, healthcare and water infrastructure programs.

Building the institutions of a viable future Palestinian state is a core U.S. national security objective and the long-term focus of our programs. The administration continues to believe that U.S. assistance to the Palestinian people is an important tool in promoting regional stability, economic development, and increased security for both Palestinians and Israelis.

Question. Last year Congress unanimously passed the Ukraine Freedom Support Act, which authorized assistance in support of democracy, civil society, and energy security to Ukraine and throughout in the region. The bill authorized $50 mil to help improve Ukraine's energy security; $20 mil to strengthen civil society, support independent media, and reduce corruption; $10 mil for Russian language broadcasting throughout the region; and $20 mil to support democracy and civil society in Russia. I would urge the appropriators to fully fund these efforts as we look to bolster Ukraine in the face of Russian aggression. I've seen reports that there is some apprehension, especially in Europe, but perhaps within our own government, to provide more robust assistance to Ukraine for fear that it will fall victim to endemic corruption. As the lead on this important legislation, I am supportive of this critical assistance but it must be held accountable.

Answer. Ukraine remains the USAID'S top priority in the Europe and Eurasia region. The Agency continues to allocate resources to support the reforms that the Ukrainian Government and civil society have prioritized, including anticorruption, local governance and decentralization, and deregulation and competitiveness of the private sector, especially agriculture and energy reform. USAID integrates anticorruption activities into every project design in Ukraine. For example, anticorruption measures are included in programs to support the judiciary, education, health/pharmaceutical procurement, e-governance, permitting, financial disclosure, and energy.

USAID is starting to see progress on implementation of anticorruption reforms in Ukraine. More than a dozen key pieces of legislation have been passed, including laws to establish the National Anti-Corruption Bureau (NABU) and the National Anti-Corruption Prevention Agency (NAPC). The Ukrainian Government is in the process of standing up these two agencies, which are critical to fighting corruption.

USAID has bolstered monitoring and independent evaluations in the region by organizing monitoring workshops for implementing partner staff, and contracting for independent evaluations of its programs to ensure intended impact, including three such evaluations in Ukraine last year. If confirmed, I will continue to ensure that USAID continues to build on its efforts to strengthen monitoring and evaluation of the Agency's programs, including in Ukraine.

Question. In light of the recent news reports of human rights and labor rights in Southeast Asia, in particular the modern slavery camps along the Thai-Malaysian border, and the anticipated completion of negotiations on TPP, please provide an account of any USAID labor capacity programs and funding that are currently in place to raise the labor standards in Malaysia and Vietnam, anticipated TPP partners, and Thailand, a prospective TPP partner.

Answer. USAID works across the Asia-Pacific region to protect and promote fundamental human rights, such as the freedoms of expression and assembly, to ensure that citizens have a voice and the ability to choose their own leaders and influence the decisions that affect their lives. These efforts help ensure that the solutions to the challenges facing the region ultimately come from the people of the region.

The Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) offers the United States Government an opportunity to make progress in human rights, but to also help reduce poverty and promote environmental and labor safeguards in the Asia-Pacific, a region that is inextricably tied to our own future stability and prosperity.

In Vietnam, the TPP is both strategically important to U.S. Government relations with Vietnam, and also very important to Vietnam's own development, as it serves as a force for important reforms and improved accountability and transparency. As part of broader TPP-related assistance, USAID's work complements robust technical assistance provided by other U.S. Government entities, such as the Department of Labor. USAID provides technical assistance to the Government of Vietnam and the legal community to increase understanding of TPP commitments including international labor standards and the enforcement of laws and decrees in areas such as social dialogue, while also supporting civil society efforts. USAID continues to closely coordinate with the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative and the inter-agency to assess and identify future labor-related assistance needs.

Additionally, through USAID's Global Labor Program, the Agency is supporting labor rights across the broader Asia region through programs that work to reduce child labor, improve industrial relations, support labor monitoring and training in apparel factories, and promote freedom of association and collective bargaining. For example in Cambodia, USAID supports union leaders and activists and works to improve working conditions and protect freedom of association for vulnerable workers in the garment, hotel and hospitality, and construction industries. In part due to USAID facilitation, garment worker unions negotiated a 28-percent increase in the minimum wage that was approved in November 2014. In addition, a new health project in Cambodia focused on garment factory workers will improve worker-management dialogue on factory compliance with health standards.

USAID also works to combat labor trafficking, a significant issue for the Asia-Pacific, where incidents of migrants on land and sea in need of humanitarian protection remain a serious concern for the U.S. Government. The Asia-Pacific region also suffers from the largest forced labor and sex trafficking market in the world. USAID is working to address these issues on several fronts. Through its assistance to regional institutions, the Agency stands ready to help Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) member states meet the standards for protection of victims and other areas outlined in the ASEAN combating trafficking in persons convention—expected to be endorsed in November 2015.

USAID is also addressing issues surrounding labor trafficking in the fishing industry through assistance for repatriation and victim support services for fishermen, many of whom have spent years working on boats in harsh conditions and without pay. Last month, the Agency provided such assistance to 59 Cambodian fishermen, who, along with hundreds of others from Cambodia, Burma, Laos, and Thailand, were rescued after being stranded in Eastern Indonesia. These efforts will be supplemented by the new USAID OCEANS project, which will improve the conditions of workers in the fishing industry.

Finally, through regional programming to counter trafficking in persons, USAID is continuing a partnership with the International Office of Migration to support a project that builds upon years of successful interventions to prevent trafficking in persons through the use of social media and information and communications technology. This project will raise awareness among the general public and inspire social action to prevent the most vulnerable from being trafficked.

All USAID antitrafficking efforts are closely aligned and coordinated with prosecution and law enforcement efforts implemented by the U.S. Department of State and other governments.

Question. In light of the anticipated completion of TPP negotiations, are any plans in place to meet increased demands on the Global Labor Program?

Answer. I understand that USAID is currently working with the State Department to identify any gaps related to programmatic needs and resource requirements in this area, and that new activities will depend in part on proposals received in response to a solicitation for a new 5-year program.

With respect to the USAID Global Labor Program specifically, since 2011, the program has supported country programs in 10 countries (Colombia, Brazil, Mexico, Honduras, Liberia, South Africa, Cambodia, Bangladesh, Ukraine, and Georgia), as well as regional and subregional programs in Central America/Latin America, southern Africa, south Asia/Asia, and Eastern Europe. It has strengthened capacity of trade unions and other labor-focused CSOs, supported legal representation for workers to promote access to justice, and facilitated advocacy on gender, labor migration and countertrafficking. If confirmed, I will recommit the Agency to ensuring that there will be no gaps in programming, the follow-on will be awarded competitively and budget permitting, the program will be funded robustly.

Question. Please provide an outline of the current Global Labor Program activities administered by USAID, by country and expenditure—no detail requested at this time.

Answer. USAID has a strong tradition of supporting global labor programs designed to foster democratic development and inclusive economic growth. The Agency's labor programming directly serves these priorities by strengthening independent and democratic worker organizations and other labor-related civil society organizations, and promoting international labor standards. The current Global Labor Program is a 5-year (2011–2016) award implemented by Solidarity Center. In FY 2015, USAID is programming $7.5 million for work in nine countries and also regional and subregional programs in Latin America, southern Africa, and South and Southeast Asia. This funding supports four thematic research and advocacy programs on gender, migration and trafficking, informal work, and rule of law. This core programming is supplemented by an associate award in Colombia, administered by USAID/Colombia.

The breakdown of expenditures for FY 2015 by country, region and for the global thematic programs is as follows:

Africa regional: $332,661; Liberia: $325,905; South Africa: $810,249; Americas regional: $187,570; Brazil: $626,200; Mexico: $592,708; Honduras: $392,230; Central America subregional: $91,623; Georgia: $562,262; Ukraine: $654,611; Asia regional: $181,620; South Asia subregional: $207,836; Cambodia: $527,427; Bangladesh: $516,102; Global Technical: $816,343; Operating Expenses: $674,653.

Question. As you know, the labor and environmental chapters of our free trade agreements are particularly important to me and a lot of my Senate colleagues. But I am afraid that USAID does not take the issue of trade capacity-building seriously enough. With the exception of a few places where Congress requires it, USAID has chosen to spend little or no money called for in our trade agreements to support labor capacity-building. USAID has an opportunity to use trade capacity-building funds to support labor capacity-building within its Global Labor Program, which is currently funded only with democracy, rights, and governance funding. I need your assurance that trade capacity-building funds will be used as we intended—to support labor rights on the ground with our trading partners who lack the capacity and sometimes the will to take that on themselves. I believe we need to step up and use trade capacity-building funds to increase USAID's Global Labor Program from its current $7.5 million to $10 million.

- ♦ If confirmed, will you agree to work with my office to ensure that the appropriate funds are disbursed and included in the Global Labor Program so that we can implement the labor provisions in our trade agreements?

Answer. I strongly share your view of promoting labor rights in the context of our trade priorities and if confirmed, I would be pleased to work with the committee to see that USAID's Global Labor Program is responsive to these priorities.

I understand that in response to congressional direction to provide labor capacity-building support for countries in the Western Hemisphere with which the United States has free trade agreements, USAID has supported projects that have worked with business and civil society to strengthen the demand for effective implementation of labor standards. USAID's review of these programs confirmed that the Agency's strengths are best deployed in demand-side programming with industry to build the case for better labor practices that enhance competitiveness, and with civil society to strengthen the ability of workers to play a constructive role in monitoring and improving labor standards.

If confirmed, I will review the current level of funding with your recommendation in mind and will consult with the committee as we determine the appropriate funding levels for current and future global labor capacity building.

Question. The Review on Antimicrobial Resistance, convened by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, has projected that of all the antimicrobial infections, TB is projected to account for a quarter of the 10 million deaths expected from these infections due to antimicrobial resistance by 2050. The G7 Group of Countries recently highlighted Antimicrobial Resistance (AMR) as a top priority, and there is growing momentum for a United Nations High-Level Meeting on AMR to be held at U.N. Headquarters in New York in 2016.

- ♦ Will you commit to working to ensure, if confirmed, that drug resistant tuberculosis (TB) has a prominent place on the agenda of this High-Level Meeting as well as any political declaration coming out of the meeting?

Answer. Yes, if confirmed as USAID Administrator, I will commit to working to ensure drug-resistant TB has a prominent place on the agenda. Drug-resistant TB is the one of the largest antimicrobial resistance issues globally. If confirmed, I will ensure USAID, as the lead U.S. Government agency for international TB, continues to lead coordination of U.S. Government global TB efforts, support for global initiatives, and support to countries to ensure the further development and expansion of quality programs to address TB and drug-resistant TB using the best tools and treatments available.

Question. The White House is leading the development of an interagency action plan on drug resistant tuberculosis as a companion to the White House's National Action Plan for Combating Antibiotic-Resistant Bacteria.

- ◆ How will USAID's contribution to this plan ensure accountability and specify clear and ambitious milestones for reducing drug resistant TB? Will you commit to ensuring, if confirmed, that the USAID proposal specifies the additional funding necessary to reach these milestones and get ahead of the growing crisis of drug resistant TB?

Answer. The White House action plan on drug-resistant tuberculosis (DR-TB) will have clear and ambitious milestones. The plan will build on the current USAID TB portfolio and the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, TB, and Malaria. TB grants will accelerate progress toward achieving the goals laid out in the U.S. Government TB Strategy and contribute to the global effort to end the pandemic. USAID will be leading the international part of the plan. It will focus on the development and implementation of faster and better quality diagnostics and treatment regimens, prioritizing countries with the highest burdens of drug-resistant TB to maximize limited resources and to end TB as a major cause of morbidity and mortality, and as a global health security threat. The rollout of new drugs and regimens will be critical to saving lives and preventing the development and transmission of deadly drug-resistant TB. The next step in this fast-track process is a stakeholder forum to ensure input from a wide spectrum of partners. While I cannot guarantee future funding levels, I will, if confirmed, help ensure USAID continues its efforts to curb the epidemic by ensuring good quality TB programs that appropriately treat and cure patients of the disease, and prevent the emergence and spread of drug-resistant strains.

Question. According to Freedom House, after a decade and a half of increasing democratic trends, Africa experienced significant backsliding between 2005 and 2013. It is clear the White House is interested in, and committed to, maintaining good relations with Africa as evidenced by initiatives such as Feed the Future, Power Africa, the Young African Leadership Initiative, and the Partnership for Growth, which includes two African countries. I am concerned, however, that we are not focused enough on traditional development priorities, specifically in the area of Democracy and Governance.

- ◆ a. To your knowledge, does USAID have a medium to long-term democracy and governance strategy for Africa? If so, what is it, and does it need to be updated or changed in any way in your estimation?
- ◆ b. If confirmed, will you commit to work with the committee to devise a robustly funded democracy and governance strategy for Africa?
- ◆ c. Elections are an important indicator of the democratic health of a country, but support for elections alone does not build the institutions that support democracy. What has been our approach to ensuring the investments we are making to support key elections in Africa, such as those made in Nigeria earlier this year, are followed by programs and activities that help citizens ensure that those they elect are accountable to the people they are supposed to represent?
- ◆ d. If confirmed, will you commit to ensuring that the elections support we provide in Africa is incorporated into a broader governance strategy?

Answer. USAID has been a leader in supporting the President's policies on human rights and democratic governance as fundamental objectives of a whole-of-government strategy toward Africa. I am aware that during this administration USAID has issued a new strategy on democracy, human rights, and governance. The new strategy codifies a more holistic approach to USAID's programming in this sector by focusing on participation, inclusion, and accountability, while elevating human rights and integration of programming across economic and social sectors.

One of USAID's unique strengths is its field-based orientation, in which its missions abroad are the incubators and operational nerve centers of its work. With policy guidance and technical support from Washington, USAID bilateral missions in Africa develop their own multiyear country development cooperation strategies. They do so in close collaboration with U.S. Embassy counterparts, host-country partners, and often with other donors, foundations, and the private sector. To my knowledge, virtually every USAID mission in Africa has a medium to long-term strategic objective focused on supporting democracy, human rights, and governance. These objectives vary significantly based on the specific challenges faced in each country, while aligning with the new strategy on democracy, human rights, and governance. They can also change over time in response to democratic breakthroughs or backsliding.

For example, in Ghana, one of the models of democratic governance in Africa, USAID works in close partnership with national government officials and civil society to strengthen local district government institutions and improve service delivery. In post-conflict countries such as the Democratic Republic of the Congo, USAID programs reconcile communities separated by war, support key governance reforms, and help extend state authority to the people. In Zimbabwe, under constant threat of closing political space, USAID and its partners provide critical support to human rights defenders and civil society activists who are trying to maintain their basic freedoms.

And in Nigeria, as well as more than a dozen other African countries, USAID focuses and concentrates its resources to ensure that election assistance is embedded in long-term democracy, rights, and governance strategies. Doing so allows USAID to support reformers who can seize the window of opportunity provided by free, fair, and credible elections to promote policy changes, strengthen governance institutions, expand basic freedoms, and improve the systems of checks and balances that hold leaders accountable to the people who elected them.

In my estimation, USAID's current process for achieving its democracy strategy in Africa is appropriate: setting broad policy and strategy goals in Washington, and allowing USAID missions to develop their own country-specific responses to achieving those goals, for which they are then held accountable. I also believe that USAID's election assistance programs are most effective and appropriate as part of a holistic democracy, human rights and governance strategy.

If confirmed, I will make this area one of my priorities and I look forward to working with Congress to maximize the impact and effectiveness of this program.

Question. As I am sure you are aware, I have been working with State Department and USAID to ensure that our Foreign Service adequately represents the diversity of our population. With 18 months left in this administration, do I have a commitment from you that you will make recruitment and retention of diverse candidates a priority at USAID?

Answer. Recruiting and retaining a diverse and skilled workforce is critical to meeting the mission of USAID, and is of great importance to me personally. If confirmed as Administrator, I will work with USAID leadership to strengthen efforts to ensure that USAID's workforce is reflective of our population.

I am pleased that the 2015 Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review (QDDR) specifically addresses the need to increase our diversity and provides specific focus areas that I fully support. These areas include enhancing work requirements for USAID managers about the need to foster diversity and inclusion in the workplace, increasing outreach to our veterans, sustaining the numbers of fellowships offered, and initiating an early identification program, focusing on students from underrepresented communities who have an interest in public service.

USAID is engaging in targeted outreach activities and programs that are focused on building a diverse workforce, which I will look to support and expand. This outreach is designed to increase the diversity of applicants who apply for direct-hire positions at USAID, as well as to other qualified applicants who may apply through the Disability Employment Program, the Veterans Employment Initiative, and USAID's Internship Program.

The Donald Payne International Development Fellowship Program (Payne Fellowship Program) has resulted in three classes of fellows with a highly diverse representation. These fellows enter USAID's Foreign Service upon completion of the program.

If confirmed, I will work with USAID leadership to improve retention of diverse employees (and all employees) through several actions including: (1) increasing training for managers and employees tailored specifically to the issues of diversity and inclusion; (2) implementing exit interviews and surveys to provide the Agency with data regarding why employees resign, as well as their impressions of diversity and inclusion at USAID, so that the Agency can take appropriate action; and, (3) piloting programs that focus on diversity and inclusion, such as the Office of Personnel Management's Diversity and Inclusion Dialogue Program.

If confirmed, I am committed to making recruitment and the retention of diverse candidates a high priority of my tenure with USAID.

Question. I am very concerned by the state of civil society in Egypt. At a time when analysts are reporting that the suppression of nonviolent political dissent in Egypt is now worse than at any time during the Mubarak regime, only $5 million out of a total of $150 million in Economic Support Funds to Egypt is designated for democracy and governance in the administration's FY 2016 request. In comparison, the administration has requested $47 million for democracy and governance programming in Jordan, a country whose population is roughly 8 percent of Egypt's.

- ♦ If confirmed, how would you be able to support democracy and governance in Egypt and counter the erosion of civil society there, given the subject's seemingly low priority in the administration's budget request?

Answer. USAID resources in Egypt are targeted toward supporting democratic principles and civil society across all sectors. The Agency works to empower Egyptian civil society actors throughout its assistance program, including in education, economic development and health. USAID programming works to reinforce democratic principles, transparency and provide access to government services by all parts of Egyptian society. USAID supports decentralization of the Egyptian Government through work reforming the Ministry of Finance and Ministry of Planning systems to increase transparency and allow for inclusion of Egyptian citizens at the local levels, including in budget oversight. This program seeks to identify reform champions in the legal sector and provide Egyptian citizens improved access to justice. Education programs support the active leadership role of parents in communities through parent/teacher associations which allow for engagement and advocacy with school principals and local government officials. Through a one-stop-shop model piloted by USAID and managed by Egyptian business associations, business owners can register businesses with local government in a transparent and efficient manner, which minimizes opportunities for corruption. USAID also supports advocacy groups working to facilitate the enabling environment for small and medium entrepreneurs.

While advancing certain democracy, rights, and governance issues is a challenge in the current environment, USAID is moving forward with a significant direct grants program to advance the role of civil society in promoting human rights. Civil society organizations are working to combat gender-based violence, promote women's empowerment, counter trafficking in persons, promote religious tolerance, and support rights of people with disabilities. Bilateral programs include support to civil society organizations that promote youth empowerment and youth engagement in leadership roles in the communities in which they live. For example, civil society organizations offer students the opportunity to participate in programs that promote youth values of tolerance and peace within the Egyptian identity and teach principles of sustainable development and citizenship.

If confirmed as Administrator, I will ensure USAID's continued commitment to promoting essential democracy and governance principles in Egypt as consistent with President Obama's Stand with Civil Society agenda.

Question. Continued progress in Tunisia's democratic transition is critical and economic reform will be essential to the ongoing success of that transition. Tunisia needs assistance in building a regulatory environment that facilitates both foreign and domestic investment, especially in providing access to capital for small- and medium-sized enterprises.

- ♦ In your view, how can U.S. assistance most effectively help create this environment? If confirmed, how will you prioritize this assistance?

Answer. I share your interest in ensuring that the U.S. Government provides robust and targeted assistance during this critical period in Tunisia's history. I believe Tunisia demonstrates great potential for a successful transition, and last year, USAID reopened its office in Tunis after 20 years—a clear demonstration of the U.S. Government's continued support for a democratic Tunisia.

USAID is supporting the Government of Tunisia's economic reform agenda in tax and customs policy which will help create a more attractive investment climate for both domestic and international investors. During President Caid Essebsi's visit, Secretary of Commerce Pritzker convened a roundtable of CEOs from top U.S. corporations, including Google, Bechtel, and General Electric. Encouraged by the Government of Tunisia's progress, U.S. companies are poised to take advantage of investment opportunities in Tunisia. Additionally, USAID's work with the Government of Tunisia on customs policy reform will advance the implementation of the World Trade Organization's Agreement on Trade Facilitation (Bali, 2012) which expedites the movement, release and clearance of goods.

USAID programs support the Tunisian people as they lay the foundation for economic prosperity and democratic governance. USAID is creating job opportunities for Tunisian youth by helping small- and medium-sized enterprises to increase productivity and expand employment; and then matching and coaching young Tunisian men and women to fill these new jobs. USAID is also providing financing to small- and medium-sized enterprises through the Tunisian-American Enterprise Fund.

Question. Hundreds of thousands of Christians, Yezidis, and other religious minorities have been made homeless by ISIL's depravity and continue to live as displaced persons without adequate access to shelter, food, medical care or education.

Many women from these communities have been kidnapped and subjected to horrific sexual violence.

- ♦ If confirmed, how will you work with host governments to ensure that assistance reaches these communities and that survivors of sexual violence at the hands of ISIL are given the help they need to rebuild their lives?

Answer. USAID strives to include and be sensitive to the needs of religious and ethnic minorities in all of its programming. All U.S. Government humanitarian assistance is delivered on an impartial basis and is open to every household and community in acute need, regardless of ethnicity or faith. If confirmed as USAID Administrator, I will ensure that the Agency continues to uphold these principles.

In both Syria and Iraq, USAID humanitarian assistance is provided on a country-wide basis and is focused on the populations in greatest need who can be reached by the Agency's humanitarian partners. USAID has provided over $2 billion in humanitarian assistance for displaced Syrians since fiscal year 2012 and nearly $76 million in humanitarian assistance for displaced Iraqis since the start of FY 2014.

In Syria, USAID humanitarian assistance reaches into all 14 governorates and 63 districts, including those in which religious minority communities reside or are hosted as internally displaced persons (IDPs). In Iraq, the majority of humanitarian assistance is provided to address acute needs among the IDP population in the Iraqi Region of Kurdistan (IRK), which accounts for over 40 percent of that country's total displaced population. For example, approximately 70 percent of all humanitarian aid provided by USAID's Office for U.S. Foreign Disaster Assistance since FY 2014 has served Iraqi IDPs in the IRK—where the majority of displaced Iraqi religious minorities are seeking shelter.

USAID humanitarian assistance inside Syria and Iraq is focused on provision to vulnerable IDPs of food and other relief commodities, shelter (including repairs), water and sanitation, health care, education, protection (including specialized services for women, children, and survivors of sexual and gender-based violence), and humanitarian coordination and logistics.

In all its programs in Syria and Iraq, the Agency strives to address the protection needs of the most vulnerable—including women, girls and boys in displaced communities. For example, in Iraq, USAID supports humanitarian assistance programs that both mainstream protection and deliver direct, specialized services to vulnerable communities.

Specific activities include recruitment of female health workers, to ensure health services are equally accessible for women and girls as well as men and boys, mobile “child-friendly” spaces and psychosocial first aid for traumatized children, emergency aid focused on the immediate needs of pregnant women in vulnerable conditions, and provision of specialized counseling and referral services to survivors of sexual and gender-based violence.

USAID has also provided funding to the International Organization for Migration (IOM) to support its wider protection activities, which reached nearly 1 million IDPs in Iraq. As a component of outreach to the wider IDP population, this included direct psychosocial support to Christian and Yazidi IDPs in transit sites in northern Iraq.

In those neighboring countries hosting large numbers of displaced Syrians and Iraqis, USAID's nonhumanitarian programming also seeks to address the needs of religious minority communities within the context of the wider crisis. The Agency views inclusion of minorities as a key component of advancing democracy and stability.

For example, I understand that since 2007 USAID has provided over $40 million in economic and development assistance directly benefiting Iraq's minority communities including Christian, Yazidi, Shabak, and Sabean-Mandaean groups. The Agency's Jordan community engagement program works with communities hosting Syrian refugees, and, in Egypt, USAID works with faith-based organizations to promote religious tolerance and diversity.

In addition, USAID has hosted various delegations of Iraqi religious minorities to discuss and coordinate the U.S. Government humanitarian response to their displacement as a result of ISIL actions. This has included, inter alia, representatives of the Assyrian, Chaldean, Orthodox, Catholic, and Yazidi communities. In the field, USAID humanitarian assistance teams meet regularly with representatives of ethnic and religious minority diaspora and local groups serving displaced communities, as well as with international partners serving IDPs. They also coordinate closely with the U.N. and relevant government institutions in Iraq and those host countries for displaced Syrians and Iraqis in order to ensure all IDP communities' needs are taken into account.

Question. In 2011 the Arab Spring protests and calls for nonviolent reform offered tremendous hope for the potential of the Middle East region. Four years later we face a long, cold winter with many states reverting to old bad habits of closing off all avenues for nonviolent political expression or economic opportunity. Worse yet, we are facing failed, or close to failing, states in Yemen, Libya, and Syria. In the face of such unpredictability, instability, and violence the U.S. diplomatic presence and USAID field offices have been forced to draw down or close. In other areas, governments are actively confronting USAID funded programs and projects.

- ◆ How are you thinking about U.S. assistance and development engagement in the Middle East and North Africa against this depressing and alarming backdrop? Do we need to change the way we do business, or the missions we pursue, in the region?

Answer. USAID works with local and international partners to address the tremendous needs in the Middle East and North Africa. USAID recognizes that capable and accountable governance institutions are crucial to the sustainability of our development investments, which is why the Agency seeks to integrate democracy, human rights, and governance principles and practices across all programming.

USAID's approach in the Middle East is twofold; the Agency works not only with governments, but also at a grassroots level, changing the lives of individuals and transforming communities. USAID works closely with national governments where that is possible, and where national-level governance institutions are lacking, at the local level, with municipal councils or local civil society, to help meet the immediate needs of the people in the region as well as build sustainable local governance structures that can support a move to resilient democratic societies. Local- and municipal-level governance issues are an increasingly important component to USAID's work in the region, especially in communities affected by conflict and crisis. Key elements in all USAID programs are a deep analysis of the political context, supporting citizen engagement in policymaking and service delivery, and promoting the rights of all citizens and groups to ensure equitable development gains. USAID programs represent a long-term investment in the people and communities of the Middle East and North Africa and build on the Agency's mission to partner to end extreme poverty and promote resilient, democratic societies while advancing our own security and prosperity.

USAID is constantly reassessing the way it does business and the specific programs in which it invests. Each country and regional program begins with a careful assessment of local needs and capacity for reform. Once programs are implemented they are carefully monitored and evaluated for effectiveness and lessons learned. Security concerns remain a significant challenge, and the security of USAID staff and implementing partners is paramount. In places where USAID has no direct-hire staff on the ground, the Agency uses local and international partners as well as remote management techniques to continue and ensure close oversight of USAID programs.

If confirmed, I look forward to working with the Congress and our implementing partners to maximize the efficacy and impact of our work in the Middle East and elsewhere throughout the world.

Question. In response to the question about USAID's contribution to the U.S. Government TB strategy, you mentioned that you would "help ensure USAID continues its efforts to curb the epidemic by ensuring good quality TB programs that appropriately treat and cure patients of the disease, and prevent the emergence and spread of drug-resistant strains." As its contribution to the interagency action plan on drug-resistant tuberculosis, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention submitted recommendations that clearly identify the funding needed to carry out the activities.

- ◆ Has USAID identified funding needs, given the objectives of the plan? If not, why not?
- ◆ How meaningful can a strategy be unless resources needs are identified, to enable the agency to not only continue efforts but intensify them and rapidly build country capacity to have a much greater impact on TB?

Answer. The White House National Action Plan on multidrug resistant tuberculosis (MDR-TB) will have clear and ambitious milestones. USAID will lead the international component of the plan, building on the current USAID TB portfolio and the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis, and Malaria. It will focus on the development and implementation of faster and better quality diagnostics and treatment regimens, prioritizing countries with the highest burdens of drug-resistant TB to maximize limited resources and end TB as a major cause of morbidity and mortality and as a global health security threat. The rollout of new drugs and regimens will be critical to saving lives and preventing the development and transmission of deadly drug-resistant TB.

The process includes critical opportunities to receive feedback from the broader global health community, including a stakeholder forum, on important aspects to include in the plan. Guided by the strategy, stakeholder feedback, and data and evidence, USAID will do its part to identify the resources needed to implement the plan and focus on how to maximize the effectiveness of those resources. However, combating TB is a global problem and a shared responsibility that requires commitments from other donor partners and countries themselves to do more. As I testified, it is also critical to mobilize other countries to do more in this area—both with respect to TB and to health systems more broadly. If confirmed, I will play a leadership role in this regard and ensure that USAID continues its efforts to curb the epidemic by ensuring good quality TB programs that appropriately treat and cure patients of the disease, and prevent the emergence and spread of multidrug resistant strains.

TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR FLAKE

Question. In addition to the devastating loss of life and breakdown of the affected countries' health care systems, we have seen the economies of these countries near collapse as economic activity ground to a halt, investors and contractors fled, farming ceased, and building and maintaining of key infrastructure projects was suspended. As private investments in airports, roads, seaports, and electricity generation and distribution will be vital to for economic recovery, what is USAID doing in these areas to reinvigorate private economies that will be necessary for the long-term stability of affected countries?

Answer. Having coordinated the USG's international response to the Ebola epidemic while at the National Security Council, I am personally committed to working in the Ebola-affected countries to help reinvigorate their economies, using both Ebola emergency funds and base development assistance funds. If confirmed, I will ensure USAID continues these important efforts. Examples of USAID's support to revive the economies of the Ebola-affected countries include:

- ◆ Through the Power Africa Initiative, USAID is engaging in a variety of areas that will improve electricity generation and distribution.
 - USAID/Liberia replicates appropriate scale private models to supply energy to unserved rural areas through the design and build of small-scale facilities that demonstrate renewable energy technologies. This work is buttressed by a cooperative agreement with the National Rural Electrification Cooperative of America (NRECA), which is working with rural communities to manage electrical generation and distribution.
 - USAID/Liberia is working to engage in active diplomacy and dialogue with local governments, other donors, and their implementing partners to encourage and facilitate the rapid completion of work on the Mt. Coffee hydropower station; three new power plants to add 38 MW of affordable electricity to the grid; the extension of the West Africa Power Pool; and other key public sector infrastructure projects.
 - USAID/Liberia is working with local banks to demonstrate the business case for affordable, sustainable, renewable energy solutions beyond the grid. Furthermore, USAID technical assistance has helped with the development of draft legislation that will allow for the entry of private sector actors in generation and distribution.
 - USAID/Guinea is exploring public private partnership (PPP) opportunities in the energy sector in both Guinea and Sierra Leone through collaboration with the member agencies in Power Africa.
- ◆ In addition, USAID is supporting efforts to rebuild critical infrastructure in the Ebola-affected countries in order to attract private investment and improve the lives of those impacted by the crisis.
 - USAID/Liberia is working to rehabilitate rural farm to market roads and build the capacity of the Ministry of Public Works to maintain them, which will stimulate broader private sector activity in agricultural value chains, including transportation and marketing.
 - In all three countries, USAID is supporting investments in digital infrastructure by working with donors and partners to adopt a "dig once" strategy for appropriate road construction projects intended to reduce the combined costs of road construction and broadband connectivity access and - advancement. Investments in digital infrastructure support roads, airports, seaports, and electricity generation.

- Through advancement in e-payments platforms, USAID/Liberia is working to enable and increase ease of payments for on-grid electricity, as well as pay-as-you-go models in all three countries using emergency funds. In order to advance infrastructure, policy reforms are required to support the development of public-private partnerships (PPPs) across all infrastructure. USAID is collaborating with multiple teams and stakeholders to define a combined vision and requirements for the affected country governments in order to catalyze and spur PPPs that will create infrastructure growth.
 - USAID/Liberia's efforts to increase access to potable water in three cities will contribute to a healthier and more productive workforce attractive to the private sector, as well as facilitate development of industry and agriculture in those locations.
 - USAID/Liberia and partners are completing the construction of 85 kilometers of feeder roads in support of other USG-funded agricultural activities designed under the Feed the Future Initiative and food security programs.
- ◆ USAID is also actively engaging the private sector to leverage their ideas and encourage private sector investment in the three affected countries.
- USAID recently published two new calls for proposals under its Global Development Alliance that focus on all three countries to prioritize co-investment with the private sector to harness ideas, capacity, and private resources to bolster economic activities and investments in infrastructure, improve local health systems, and promote global health security, all of which are aimed at accelerating recovery and building resiliency in the West African communities affected by the Ebola epidemic.
 - In addition, the Agency seeks to harness capacity and resources from the local, regional, and international private sector around partnerships that strengthen information and communications technology, energy infrastructure, social programming, health care, and education.
 - Through the Feed the Future initiative, the Agency is working to engage the infrastructure, and resources of the private sector, foundations, and other partners, including in-country partners, to foster broad-based food security in the short, medium, and long term.
 - The PPP strategy in 2015 focuses on reestablishing private sector confidence to resume business operations through continuous communication and updates about market conditions. USAID is also providing technical assistance to help Liberia develop a PPP policy that will attract investment across a range of industry and infrastructure projects.

TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR PERDUE

On Smith's priorities

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, you will only have 18 months in office once you come into office, and there are certainly a host of issues you could dive into. Can you talk about some of these priority areas where you would really like to make a change?

Answer. Should I have the honor of being confirmed, I will pursue four priorities.

(1) If confirmed, I will focus the Agency on programs that are achieving results and will be selective about initiating new commitments. I will work with Congress to institutionalize successful programs, including Feed the Future, Power Africa, and our efforts in maternal and child health.

(2) If confirmed, I will provide the leadership, guidance, and tools needed to enable USAID's staff in Washington and the field to deliver against our most urgent priorities. This includes expanding the Agency's work and impact on democracy, rights, and governance. This also means expanding the Agency's impact on human trafficking and corruption, laying the groundwork for the success of a critically important strategy for Central America, and ensuring an equally important transition in Afghanistan.

(3) If confirmed, I will act quickly to ensure that the Agency maintains global leadership and agility in responding to increasingly complex humanitarian crises around the world. When a natural disaster strikes or a humanitarian catastrophe is imminent, the Agency is and should be among the first on the ground to help those in need, and in a world rife with crises, I believe it is critical to ensure that the Agency remains one step ahead.

I will also work with this committee and other stakeholders to pursue meaningful food aid reform that will enable us to reach more people, more quickly, in times of need—all while maintaining our historic partnership with U.S. farmers and maritime.

(4) If confirmed, I will focus on further strengthening the institution. That means building on the reform agenda launched by Administrator Rajiv Shah. This will involve expanding the capacity of the Agency to mobilize resources and engagement from other partners; to draw on science, technology, and innovation to address development challenges; and to increase investment in effective local solutions.

Strengthening the institution involves tackling some of the management and operational challenges facing an agency that manages resources across over 80 countries, often in complex environments. The Agency must ensure that American taxpayer dollars are spent responsibly. It must identify successful programs, learn from prior mistakes, apply lessons learned, and share best practices—all in an open and transparent way. If progress is not being made, it must take corrective action or terminate projects.

Strengthening USAID also means supporting and listening to its people, both here in Washington and overseas. These are men and women with knowledge, institutional memory, and invaluable insight. It is my goal to give them the visibility, respect, and gratitude that they deserve.

On leveraging partners to make American aid go further

Question. Ms. Smith, how do you recommend we use our leadership to work with other nations to do more?

Answer. If confirmed, I will encourage other nations to join USAID in addressing the world's development and humanitarian challenges—especially in this time of unprecedented need when no country can—or should—singlehandedly meet global demands.

Leveraging our development resources is a key step to successfully achieving USAID's goals as a 21st century development agency. If confirmed as Administrator, I will work with USAID leadership to more deeply integrate partnership and leveraging of external resources into USAID program design and implementation.

Using U.S. development assistance in a way that catalyzes additional financing for development from other countries, the private sector, multilateral institutions, and foundations is a key pillar of the U.S. approach to development, as is the recognition that sustainable development requires host-country buy-in and leadership. These elements are embodied in initiatives such as Power Africa and Feed the Future. They are also core priorities for the U.S. Government heading into the Third U.N. Conference on Financing for Development in July.

I am aware that USAID has progressed substantially over the last several years in developing closer coordination with a number of other international donors. Sweden, the United Kingdom, and Australia have become even more important partners. If confirmed, I will continue to support and expand these relationships as a priority.

At the invitation of President Obama, the Government of Sweden recently committed $1 billion to Power Africa, an initiative to double access to energy in sub-Saharan Africa. The early success of Power Africa—transactions expected to generate more than 4,100 megawatts have already reached financial close—played a critical role in securing Sweden's commitment. If confirmed, I will ensure that USAID uses this power of example to bring in more donors for Power Africa and other successful initiatives.

On effectiveness and efficiency of aid

Question. I certainly understand that if our efforts in assistance are a mile wide and an inch deep, we will not be very effective.

- ◆ How do you plan to focus in certain areas to make our aid go the furthest?
- ◆ What will your methods be for determining where to double down on American aid so we can achieve maximum impact?

Answer. Focusing resources—both financial and staffing—in priority countries is essential for maximum impact. If confirmed as Administrator, I will strengthen the Agency's Selectivity and Focus process. This process was launched in 2012 in response to Presidential Policy Directive (PPD-6), which mandated that the Agency focus development efforts by being more selective about the countries and sectors in which it works. Since 2010, the Agency's efforts in Selectivity and Focus have reduced the number of sectoral program areas by 40 percent, enabling country missions to be more focused on top priority activities.

If confirmed as Administrator, USAID will continue to make hard choices about how to allocate attention and resources across countries, regions, and sectors. Under my leadership, if confirmed, the Agency will closely consider issues of fragility and weigh the impact and potential savings of investing in resilience. It will continue to concentrate resources through better alignment of staffing and funding in support of those countries and programs that yield the greatest impact. Further, I will continue to strengthen the use of Country Development Cooperation Strategies (CDCS) to ensure analysis of changes in country situations and status in the medium term, and support evaluations and interim Agencywide assessments to inform decisions about adjustments in resource allocations.

Question. A recent Office of Inspector General's report noted that Presidential initiatives—not just Congressional Earmarks—are stymieing USAID Missions from allocating the correct type of funding to meet needs identified in country as the most important. Ms. Smith, as a development expert, you know the importance of “country ownership” and ensuring our assistance programs are actually reflecting the top priorities of the countries in which USAID works.

- ♦ If confirmed as Administrator, what would you do to ensure that priorities identified at the mission level are incorporated into final budget submissions to Congress and that Presidential initiatives—while important—do not distort the type of assistance USAID ends up providing to countries?

Answer. I understand that it is a critical priority at USAID to ensure that its missions receive the funding they need, despite the constrained budget environment in which they operate. If confirmed as Administrator, I will continue to refine our planning and strategy processes and ensure that mission priorities are integrated into our budget development process.

I believe that it is important to the national security of our country that USAID continues to be a global leader in addressing the world's most critical development challenges. If confirmed, I will work to ensure that these efforts are mutually reinforcing with the local priorities specific to a country or region, and reflect the on-the-ground knowledge and expertise of the Agency's field staff.

Question. What percentage of your budget is spent on overhead versus directed to assistance? Are there efficiencies that can be found in overhead savings?

Answer. Based on my initial briefings, I understand that in FY 2015, the Agency's Operating Expense (OE) appropriation accounted for approximately 6.2 percent of its total program budget.

I understand that USAID continues to implement ambitious operational reforms to improve management processes and achieve efficiencies in areas such as information technology, travel, real property disposals, insourcing, and space optimization. If confirmed, I am committed to reviewing these as well as other areas where we might identify additional efficiencies.

On increasing transparency

Question. USAID has committed to improving transparency in government.

- ♦ What are your plans for improving the quality and availability of data about USAID spending, so that anyone can trace each dollar right down to the specific project or activity where it is spent?

Answer. Aid transparency is essential for helping recipient governments manage their aid flows, for empowering citizens to hold governments accountable for the use of assistance, and for supporting evidence-based, data-driven approaches to foreign aid.

The administration has placed great emphasis on transparency and openness across the government and USAID is taking a leading role in helping the U.S. Government further its commitment to enhancing aid transparency as a way of increasing the efficacy of development efforts and promoting international accountability. In October 2014, USAID released its first ever Open Data policy and regularly posts datasets to www.usaid.gov/data.

If confirmed as Administrator, I will work with USAID leadership to advance efforts that are currently under way to increase the transparency of our funding and programming, on both the development and humanitarian fronts. In particular, if confirmed, I am committed to increasing the number and quality of evaluations posted online, as well as regularly posting more and improved data to the International Aid Transparency Initiative (IATI) and ForeignAssistance.gov.

On results-driven aid

Question. Can you tell us what systems should be in place to ensure that foreign aid evaluations are used to feed back into the loop? To be used to guide program design and policy decisionmaking?

Answer. USAID has established systems to ensure that quality evaluations are undertaken and that results are used for program improvements and redesigns. If confirmed as Administrator, I will work to elevate the quality and use of monitoring and evaluations in USAID. I will also ensure that new officers continue training in evaluation, monitoring, and integrating findings to ensure impact.

It is my understanding that between 2011 and 2014, USAID trained over 1,400 USAID staff in sound evaluation methods and practices, created templates and tools to support evaluation design and performance management plans, and worked with missions to implement an approach that allows for collaboration with partners and adaptation of projects based on learning. During that time, over 950 evaluations have contributed to evidence-based decisionmaking by missions and operating units.

I also understand that USAID is undertaking an independent evaluation to examine evaluation utilization across the Agency, which will provide rich data on trends and practices in evaluation use. This study is due to be completed in September 2015.

If confirmed, I will focus on this critically important aspect of USAID programming and ensure that evaluations are used to inform budget decisions, project design changes, and midcourse corrections in development programming.

Question. What steps will you take to ensure that these evaluations are high quality and transparent?

Answer. USAID released an extremely rigorous Evaluation Policy in 2011, which seeks to ensure high-quality and transparent evaluations. The Evaluation Policy established protocols and procedures for ensuring that all USAID evaluations are transparently conducted, unbiased, integrated into project design, relevant for decisionmaking, methodologically sound, and oriented toward reinforcing local capacity.

It is my understanding that the USAID Evaluation Policy has institutionalized several additional safeguards to ensure a commitment to unbiased measurement and reporting, as well as to promote transparency. For both internal and external evaluations, statements of work/terms of reference and draft evaluation reports must undergo a peer review, which is aimed at increasing quality and transparency. In addition, evaluation team members must submit disclosure of conflict of interest forms which are part of the final evaluation report. Lastly, findings from external and internal evaluations must be publicly shared via the Development Experience Clearinghouse (DEC) online data system.

If confirmed as Administrator, I will ensure continued implementation of this policy and periodic assessments to verify its continued effectiveness.

On USAID reforms

Question. As you know, former USAID Administrator Shah initiated reforms in 2010 under a program called USAID Forward. In your view, what have been the most lasting results of the USAID Forward reform effort?

Answer. Although the USAID Forward reform agenda was launched by former Administrator Rajiv Shah in 2010, I understand that many elements of what became USAID Forward were proposed at a conference of career Mission Directors that was conducted with the participation of senior Agency leadership in November 2009. This early investment in, and continuing ownership of, the reforms by USAID's senior career officers is a key ingredient for ensuring the sustainability of these reforms.

I believe that through USAID Forward's focuses on results, partnership, and innovation, the Agency has significantly strengthened its capacity in each of these areas over the past 5 years. USAID now has in place a rigorous and transparent process for designing strategies and projects while evaluating their impact to achieve results in a more focused and selective manner. Its partnership agenda has grown substantially, almost doubling the amount of direct work with local partners, as well as significantly increasing its partnership with the private sector, particularly small businesses. Moreover, USAID has greatly increased its emphasis on innovative approaches through the use of science, technology, and open innovation through such platforms as the Development Innovation Ventures (DIV) and Grand Challenges for Development, which have been incorporated into the Agency's Global Development Lab. Each of these reforms under USAID Forward is already demonstrating a strong, durable impact on USAID's ability to lead the international community in achieving sustainable results.

Question. What further reforms are needed to make USAID more effective?

Answer. While I understand USAID has made significant progress as a result of the reform effort launched in 2010, known as USAID Forward, I believe that USAID can be more effective if the Agency further strengthens its Foreign Service, improves transparency when it comes to results, and bolsters local solutions.

I understand that approximately 50 percent of Foreign Service officers (FSOs) have less than 5 years of experience with USAID. If confirmed, I will make it a high priority to invest in the professional development of new FSOs so they can operate and implement programs effectively.

Second, USAID Forward and its reforms require staff to partner, innovate, and deliver results while transparently reporting on foreign assistance to Congress, the public, and external stakeholders. If confirmed, I will work to streamline these processes to achieve even greater effectiveness and continue to strengthen USAID's commitment to accountability.

Third, if confirmed, I will ensure that USAID continues to invest in local solutions that achieve sustainable results and build local capacity and knowledge. USAID must remain committed to creating the conditions whereby countries can lead, resource, and sustain their own development.

Question. In your view, does the recently released 2015 Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review (QDDR) support ongoing USAID Forward reforms?

Answer. Yes. From the outset of the second QDDR process, USAID focused on advancing and institutionalizing the significant initiatives and reform efforts already underway, including USAID Forward. The first QDDR set in motion USAID Forward, a suite of reforms focused on budget management, policy capacity, implementation and procurement reform, monitoring and evaluation, innovation, science and technology, as well as talent management.

The 2015 QDDR emphasizes USAID's commitment to a new way of doing business that brings partnership, local ownership, innovation, and a relentless focus on results to enable transformative change. Through the second QDDR, USAID emphasizes and commits further to building on partnerships to end extreme poverty, prevent and mitigate conflict, counter violent extremism, and work with civil society, religious institutions, and indigenous peoples to promote resilient, open, and democratic societies.

I understand that additional USAID Forward reforms supported by the 2015 QDDR include building a culture of innovation, leadership, and learning, as well as strengthening the ability to assess risks rigorously and comprehensively to strengthen local systems. The QDDR helps institutionalize USAID's focus on innovation exemplified by the Global Development Lab and incorporate these principles into all programming through work on efficiencies in policy, planning, and learning across the entire program cycle. The 2015 QDDR also deepens USAID Forward reforms by bringing greater rigor to evaluations and harnessing data for decision-making.

I am pleased that the QDDR supports ongoing USAID Forward reforms that are vital to strengthening the Agency and enhancing the sustainable impact of its work. If confirmed as Administrator, I will work with the State Department leadership to fully implement the QDDR recommendations.

On operating in corrupt nations/safeguarding taxpayer dollars

Question. USAID conducts operations in many countries experiencing instability and conflict as well as countries characterized by corrupt practices. What are the agency's greatest challenges with regard to physical security in such countries?

Answer. I understand that USAID has presence in approximately 100 countries and that, in roughly 35 of those, the threat from terrorism is rated high or critical by the Department of State's Bureau of Diplomatic Security (DS). I understand that, to supplement the security provided by DS, USAID's Office of Security (SEC) provides a variety of security resources to USAID Missions. Primarily, these include operational security guidance, office building security, armored vehicles, emergency communications systems, and physical and technical security countermeasures.

My understanding is that USAID's greatest challenges regarding physical security are typically the lack of physical setback (distance) and blast pressure from improvised explosive devices. Diplomatic facilities are required to have 100 feet of setback, which is difficult to achieve as most diplomatic facilities are centrally located within congested capital cities. One of the frequently identified challenges is the host nation's willingness and capability to protect U.S. Government resources. I understand that SEC has developed and implemented several programs to mitigate threats to USAID staff and implementing partners through Partner Liaison Security Officers (PLSO), the Personnel Recovery (PR) Program, and Non-Permissive Environment (NPE) training.

I also understand that the Agency has established an intra-agency working group to determine ways in which the Agency could operate more effectively in NPEs. USAID defines an NPE country as having significant barriers to operating effectively and safely due to one or more of the following factors: armed conflict to which the United States is a party or not a party; limited physical access due to distance, disaster, geography, or nonpresence; restricted political space due to repression of political activity and expression; and uncontrolled criminality including corruption. The challenges with regard to physical security that are faced by officers operating in NPEs vary, but can often include a high security threat negatively impacting their ability to partner, implement and monitor projects, as well as high stress on staff due to the workload and separation from family at unaccompanied posts.

My understanding is that, as a result of these challenges, the NPE working group evaluated USAID's presence across the globe and designated 18 countries as NPE. Officers transitioning to, and out of, these 18 countries will receive tailored training and support beginning this summer. Three 3-day courses will be offered to ensure officers serving in NPEs are better equipped to program, monitor and evaluate projects, as well as enhance attentiveness to staff care and security issues. I understand that additional training and field guides are planned for 2016, contingent upon additional resources.

Question. What steps can USAID take to ensure that U.S. taxpayer funds are spent as intended in countries where its staff may have difficulty directly monitoring its programs, such as Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Libya?

Answer. USAID works in many places around the world where high-threat environments pose challenges to monitoring and the Agency has learned important lessons on how to address those challenges. My understanding is that USAID tailors implementation monitoring plans for activities implemented in high-threat or non-permissive environments like Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Libya.

USAID has revised its official policy to address this topic. Specifically, its policy (ADS 202.3.6.4) on "Monitoring in High Threat Environments" holds USAID staff (Contracting Officer's Representatives) accountable for "seeing that the contractors and grantees they manage are performing adequately and accomplishing the tasks they set out to achieve." It further notes that "in high threat environments, USAID recognizes the need to keep mission personnel safe, as well as the need to visit project sites and meet with beneficiaries of development assistance." To ensure sufficient USAID oversight of activities, the policy offers alternative monitoring methods such as requiring photographic evidence; using third-party monitoring; utilizing other U.S. Government agencies; and applying technological approaches.

USAID has learned important lessons over the course of its engagement in Afghanistan, and has drawn on experiences in other challenging environments—including Iraq, Pakistan, Yemen, Sudan, and Colombia—to put in place strong oversight of, and accountability for, U.S. assistance funds. Although there are inherent risks in doing business in a country like Afghanistan, the Agency prioritizes the effective and accountable use of taxpayer dollars and does not assume that there is any level of acceptable fraud, waste, or abuse in our programs. This means that oversight must be a process of continual reexamination of ongoing efforts, and that there must be flexibility to adjust to new circumstances as they arise.

In Afghanistan, USAID has developed a multitiered monitoring approach to collect and verify data to inform decisionmaking. By collecting and triangulating information from multiple sources, the approach helps USAID staff mitigate inherent bias and weaknesses from any given source. Each Project Manager gathers and analyzes monitoring data from various sources, compares data to ensure confidence in the reporting, and use the results to make programmatic decisions. Tiered monitoring levels are:

- ◆ Tier 1: USG (USAID and other agencies);
- ◆ Tier 2: Implementing Partners;
- ◆ Tier 3: National Unity Government (internal M&E systems, observation) and other donors;
- ◆ Tier 4: Civil society, local organizations, and beneficiaries; and
- ◆ Tier 5: Independent Monitoring Contractors.

Regarding Tier 5, Independent Monitoring Contractors, the Agency is incorporating key lessons learned and themes from countries and programs around the world that have utilized third-party monitoring in environments in which chief of mission personnel face limitations on movement, including Iraq, Pakistan, Yemen, and West Bank/Gaza. Independent monitoring, however, is not the sole source of monitoring data and it cannot take the place of USAID staff as project managers.

Instead, it is one tool that USAID can use to validate reporting data from other sources. Should USAID determine that its multitiered monitoring approach cannot provide adequate oversight over project activities, it will not hesitate to descope or terminate projects.

For Pakistan, my understanding is that USAID has procured a new monitoring and evaluation program. A core difference from Afghanistan is that Pakistan relies heavily upon USAID's traditional performance monitoring and oversight practices. While they maintain the capability to provide third-party monitors through their recently procurement M&E support platform, their primary efforts focus on providing strategic direction to the portfolio through studies and evaluations. The Pakistan model has components for monitoring, evaluation, and other analytic products such as targeted assessments, plus learning, capacity-building, and mapping services. Pakistan applies third party monitoring in the most difficult regions (FATA) and technically challenging projects (Infrastructure).

I understand that USAID manages its Libya programs through a combination of D.C.-based and field-based staff. Foreign Service National staff play a critical role in overseeing activities and fulfilling monitoring and evaluation requirements. In addition, USAID holds regular partners' workshops outside of Libya, in which implementing partners and interagency counterparts convene to review progress toward program objectives, suggest programming adjustments when necessary, and ensure overall program coordination.

Further, as noted in my response to a previous question, I understand an intra-agency working group has been convened to determine ways in which the Agency could operate more effectively in nonpermissive environments (NPEs). USAID defines an "NPE country" as having significant barriers to operating effectively and safely due to one or more of the following factors: armed conflict to which the U.S. is a party or not a party; limited physical access due to distance, disaster, geography, or nonpresence; restricted political space due to repression of political activity and expression; and uncontrolled criminality including corruption. The challenges with regard to monitoring that are faced by officers operating in NPEs vary, but can often include a high security threat negatively impacting their ability to conduct site visits.

My understanding is that, as a result of these challenges, the NPE working group evaluated USAID's presence across the globe and designated 18 countries as NPE. Officers transitioning to, and out of, these 18 countries will receive tailored training and support beginning this summer. Three 3-day courses will be offered to ensure officers serving in NPEs are better equipped to program, monitor and evaluate projects, as well as enhance attentiveness to staff care and security issues. Additional training and field guides are planned for 2016, contingent upon additional resources.

Question. How should USAID address corruption concerns in recipient countries?

Answer. Recognizing that corruption is a growing threat to the national security of the United States and its allies, President Obama announced the U.S. Global Anticorruption Agenda in 2014. For over two decades in numerous international fora, the United States has helped develop a strong global consensus that fighting corruption and supporting good governance are essential for the development of people, markets, and nations. It is now globally recognized—as confirmed by the 173 countries that have joined the United States as signatories of the United Nations Convention Against Corruption—that corruption undermines social cohesion, damages economic growth, distorts public services, weakens the rule of law, and erodes property rights.

If confirmed as Administrator, I will work with USAID leadership to strengthen our efforts to combat corruption and promote accountable, democratic governance, which will reduce conditions that allow conflict, organized crime, and other transnational threats to thrive. These efforts include adoption of rigorous fiduciary tools to ensure that funds are being well spent, such as the requirements set out by the Public Financial Management Risk Assessment Framework (PFMRAP). This framework helps ensure that USAID only works with partner governments that are equally committed to accountability and an empowered civil society. In addition, USAID continues to support long-term efforts to develop accountable and transparent institutions through anticorruption programs, which will ultimately contribute to broad-based, equitable growth.

I am pleased that the Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review highlighted successful global initiatives, such as the Open Government Partnership and the Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative, and if confirmed, I look forward to taking full advantage of our development resources to promote resilient, democratic societies free from corruption.

On aid recipient nations

Question. How do we encourage countries to take the lead in their own development and move them toward graduation from U.S. foreign assistance programs?

Answer. A core aid effectiveness principle is that every country is responsible for defining and promoting its own social and economic development. A second principle is that external donors provide assistance that supports country ownership and aligns with a country's development priorities. These aid effectiveness principles were initially articulated in the 2005 Paris Declaration and have been reaffirmed by the United States Government and every other major bilateral and multilateral donor several times since then.

It is my understanding that these aid effectiveness principles are a key factor in shaping the way that USAID develops its country-level strategic plans and specific development projects. I understand that an important part of developing a Country Development Cooperation Strategy (CDCS) is to consult with the partner government and other local stakeholders about development priorities and desired results.

USAID's approach also emphasizes the importance of developing the capacity of local actors and local systems responsible for achieving and sustaining development outcomes. I understand that the USAID 2014 policy document Local Systems: A Framework for Supporting Sustained Development, emphasizes this approach for reinforcing local capabilities to achieve and sustain the developmental benefits desired by local populations.

A commitment to moving countries toward graduation means that USAID needs to focus on fewer, higher impact programs and be more selective about countries and regions to ensure better and more sustainable results. Ultimately, this approach aims to help prepare countries for graduation, and ensure that progress is sustained even as assistance is phased out. If confirmed as Administrator, I will continue to emphasize focus and selectivity and support for local systems that can take the lead in local development, and hasten the day when countries can graduate from foreign assistance.

Question. Would you plan to continue successful efforts that promote country ownership of their own development?

- ◆ How would you invest to increase the impact of successful efforts like the Local Solutions initiative?

Answer. USAID is committed to creating the conditions whereby countries can lead, resource, and sustain their own development, a commitment that I share and will prioritize, if confirmed. I agree that country ownership—mutually agreed-upon priorities, direct implementation through local systems as the default choice, and domestic resourcing by local governments, civil society, and the private sector—should be at the core of how USAID does business. My understanding is that the Agency is delivering on this commitment through the following organizational and programmatic reforms, which I will prioritize if confirmed:

- ◆ The Agency has put in place policies and a program planning process that enable it to project results over a longer timeframe and align its staffing and resources accordingly.
- ◆ USAID is ensuring that its country strategies and project designs prioritize and measure sustainability through country ownership, regardless of the sector. This increasingly entails broad local stakeholder involvement in the Agency's planning processes. It also entails analysis (e.g., political economy analysis) and action (i.e., improved governance) on the constraints to sustainability, all of which may not be fully in the Agency's manageable control.
- ◆ The Agency has put in place the appropriate controls to prudently invest directly in local governments, civil society, and bolstering the private sector (as relevant) to ensure that those stakeholders are accountable, effective, and can sustain results on their own.

USAID has introduced new guidance and methodologies for monitoring and evaluating project performance. USAID programs are closely and actively monitored in-country—including through the use of objective, third-party evaluations—to track results at every level (input, output, outcome) and to make room for midcourse correction when changes are needed. In addition, through the use of rigorous methodologies the Agency is able to evaluate the impact of its programs and the extent to which outcomes can be attributed to USAID interventions.

The Agency has almost doubled its Foreign Service staffing to increase its ability to engage directly with local governments, civil society, and private sector; negotiate policy reforms; leverage the local private sector; build capacity; innovate; and manage its assistance programs.

USAID is promoting the mobilization of local resources in countries where it works through tax modernization; coinvestments and guarantees with the local private sector; budding philanthropy; and alternative business models such as social enterprises and social impact investment.

Countering violent extremism

Question. The White House summit on Countering Violent Extremism (CVE) devoted significant energy to community-based efforts to decrease radicalization and prevent youth and other groups from engaging in these movements. USAID is one of the only agencies with its own CVE strategy—dating back to 2011.

- ♦ What role do you see for USAID in the U.S. Government's increasing efforts to counter violent extremism?
- ♦ What kind of policy and resources would the agency need to be able to meaningfully contribute to a decrease in support for violent extremism among at-risk populations, particularly youth?

Answer. The White House Countering Violent Extremism (CVE) Summit and the regional summits have highlighted the value of USAID's approach to addressing violent extremism as part of a whole-of-government response to terrorist threats worldwide. The 2015 Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review (QDDR) also highlights USAID's role in countering violent extremism. This affirmation and elevation is linked to the recognition both in the CVE Summit agendas and the QDDR that to be effective, the response to violent extremism cannot focus just on security. It also must focus on many of USAID's core areas of work: education, economic opportunity, good governance, as well as empowering national and local governments, youth, women, community secular and religious leaders, civil society, and the private sector.

It is my belief that the United States needs a broad array of tools in its toolkit to counter violent extremism effectively. A key USAID role is to focus on the issues that drive people to violent extremism and address these problems early by disrupting the momentum and overturning the rationale behind violent extremist recruitment while reducing local sympathies and support for extremists. These efforts complement our Nation's ongoing efforts aimed at reducing the terrorist threat to ourselves and our partners.

I understand that USAID's approach was laid out in its 2011 agency-level policy, "The Development Response to Violent Extremism and Insurgency." The policy is drawn from best practices from several years of CVE programming, as well as from research on the factors that drive violent extremist recruitment and how development assistance can help mitigate these root causes. At its core, USAID's CVE approach is founded upon an understanding of the concerns of vulnerable populations in areas most at risk to violent extremism, which then allows us to work with local community organizations and government officials to address those concerns.

USAID's policy is based upon more than 10 years of experience, which demonstrates that flexible resources are required to address violent extremism. USAID's approach has concentrated on youth empowerment, social and economic inclusion, media and messaging, improved local governance and in some cases reconciliation and conflict mitigation. Activities are tailored to meet the specific threat levels, political environments, and material needs of each community. USAID's CVE efforts often target distinct populations, for example at-risk young men, and increasingly recognize the unique role of women in promoting peace and security. I understand that an evaluation of USAID programs in Chad, Niger, Mali, and Kenya has helped affirm both the positive role development tools can play in efforts to address violent extremism and USAID's approach. It found that these programs have made a measurable impact among local populations by undermining support for violent extremist rhetoric and activities.

USAID provides funding for CVE programs out of its current budget streams, including Economic Support Funds (ESF), Transition Initiatives, Development Assistance (DA), and ESF/Overseas Contingency Operations (OCO). In the FY 2016 budget request, the administration requested $390 million for the Counterterrorism Partnerships Fund (CTPF), which would create a specific funding stream for CVE programs to help build on existing efforts. As outlined in the administration's FY 2016 budget request, having additional funds that can be utilized in a flexible manner is critical to meaningfully address the local drivers of extremism and contribute to a decrease in support for violent extremism among at-risk populations, particularly youth. Reaching individuals and communities before they are radicalized is a key component in effectively reducing violent extremism. With the flexible funds that the administration requested, our assistance programs would be better positioned to program more effectively in these fragile communities.

Democracy, rights, governance

Question. As highlighted in the Department of State's 2015 Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review, efforts to strengthen global capacity for good governance and credible elections underpin the potential impact of all other types of aid (transparent and open democracies can better respond to pandemics, economic challenges, food insecurity, gender inequality, and peacekeeping operations).

- ♦ As USAID Administrator, how would you improve support to vital democracy and governance programming? I share your commitment to promoting democracy, human rights and governance (DRG). I believe that it is central to development, and an integral part of the U.S. national security strategy.

Answer. USAID recently issued a new strategy on democracy, human rights, and governance, which codifies a more holistic approach to our programming in this sector by focusing on participation, inclusion, and accountability, while elevating human rights and integration of programming across economic and social sectors.

With respect to funding for these programs, I am pleased that the President's FY 2016 request includes a 20-percent increase in democracy, human rights, and governance for USAID. If confirmed, I will make this area one of my priorities, and I look forward to working with Congress to ensure appropriate resources are available for this critical area.

It is important for USAID to be innovative in supporting islands of reform—pockets of greater participation and accountability—in countries that have yet to break through in implanting democratic values, institutions, and processes. It is in these countries that our efforts in poverty reduction, human rights and democratic governance need to be further joined and more tightly integrated. Our programs in health, food security, climate change, economic growth all need to have components of citizen participation and government accountability.

If confirmed, I will ensure that USAID continues to develop the evidence base needed to demonstrate successes of these approaches. This includes improving measurements and evaluating impact as well as improving practices by conducting cross-sector roundtables; creating practice guides; and providing funding guidance to the field to enhance integrated programming.

Microfinance

Question. I understand that the E3 Bureau has been reorganized and the Office of Microenterprise and Private Enterprise (MPEP) at USAID has been renamed and refocused on investment.

- ♦ Is USAID still committed to supporting microfinance and microenterprise?
- ♦ Particularly, how will USAID continue to reach vulnerable groups, including women with support for microenterprise?

Congress has repeatedly encouraged USAID to ensure microfinance activities target the extreme poor.

With the reorganize of the MPEP office, who will be in charge of ensuring USAID continues to target those most in need?

If confirmed, as the Administrator, how would you prioritize microfinance within USAID?

Answer. Microenterprise development has become deeply integrated throughout USAID's programming and the Agency remains committed to support microenterprise. I understand that the realignment and renaming of the Microenterprise and Private Enterprise Promotion (MPEP) Office in the E3 Bureau is still underway and will have no impact on microenterprise programming.

I understand USAID has been pivotal in shaping the microfinance industry, particularly by transforming it into a market-driven model that attracts private capital, which has dramatically lessened reliance on donor support and has expanded access to financial services for millions of poor households in the developing world. It is a prime example of USAID partnering with the private sector to find market-driven solutions to end extreme poverty.

It is my understanding that while USAID once developed stand-alone microenterprise and microfinance projects, these efforts are now integrated into other USAID programs in order to advance key initiatives, such as Feed the Future, and PEPFAR. I understand that the majority of microenterprise activity takes place through USAID Mission-level obligations, and that during the past year, the vast majority of USAID Missions reported involvement in microenterprise development.

I understand microfinance is now integrated throughout the Agency as a means to achieve broader goals, including food security, value chain development, improved health and nutrition, access to housing, and enterprise development. If confirmed, I will ensure the reorganized office will continue these efforts.

The reorganized office must also provide thought leadership for the Agency on effectively engaging and leveraging private capital for development; enhance collaboration within USAID and among U.S. Government agencies and donor partners; and provide advisory support to USAID Missions and Bureaus. Congress will receive notification of this realignment before any changes are finalized in the Agency.

If confirmed, I will ensure the office will continue to fulfill all congressional requirements for Microenterprise programming and ensure programming targets the extreme poor. I will also ensure that USAID will have an office for microenterprise development with a Director, and the Office will continue to oversee an annual data call on microenterprise obligations, prepare the annual Microenterprise Results Report, and maintain a help desk to assist partners in the monitoring of their activities. For FY 2015, I understand that USAID's Microenterprise Results Report will showcase the continuing role of USAID's microenterprise and financial inclusion activities as pathways to ending extreme poverty, increasing food security, and building resilient households and communities.

Prevention

Question. Of any of our recent Administrators you would have some of the most valuable experience to share on how to ensure we are preventing conflicts in Africa and other parts of the world.

Answer. As the 2015 Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review (QDDR) makes clear, development plays a critical role in preventing, mitigating, and responding to threats such as instability, armed conflict, and the spread of violent extremism in both stable and fragile countries. Effective conflict prevention and mitigation is essential to avoid the destructive potential of armed conflict to reverse development investments.

Since the September 11 attacks in 2001, USAID has worked to develop a sound capacity for assessing and addressing the causes and consequences of conflict. I understand that, as the Agency looks forward to delivering on the vision set by the 2015 National Security Strategy and the QDDR, it will be mindful about how this capacity will need to evolve and be strengthened to address new needs and priorities.

I understand that USAID is also seeking opportunities to strengthen funding for conflict and atrocity prevention through funding streams such as the Complex Crises Fund and the Transition Initiatives account. Doing so gives USAID the flexibility to respond quickly in crises and to devote resources where they can have the greatest impact.

Armed conflicts emerge in fragile states, where long-standing challenges to legitimacy and effectiveness weaken state institutions and the relationship of people with their governments. One of the primary challenges of conflict prevention and mitigation is a long-term one—tackling the sources of fragility in countries that are vulnerable to conflict. The approach for upstream conflict prevention works to build strong, legitimate institutions and political processes in fragile countries that are capable of managing internal tensions and transnational threats.

If confirmed, I am committed to ensuring that USAID continues to work with counterpart agencies and departments to implement a framework for more effective engagement with fragile states. We will work to ensure that analysis of root causes is applied to decisionmaking processes, and provide guidance on how to achieve results in these challenging environments.

If confirmed, I will also support and promote the New Deal for Engagement in Fragile States. The New Deal, endorsed by the United States and nearly 40 countries and multilateral organizations in 2011, establishes peace and state-building goals and action plans, all of which sets a long-term approach to enable countries' transition out of conflict. The New Deal focuses on proven areas of need and impact, such as inclusive politics, enabling effective and equitable service delivery, reforming security and rule of law sectors, and combating corruption.

Question. Under your leadership, would the FY 2017 budget better reflect the importance of conflict prevention and include an increase in this important type of programming?

Answer. Effective conflict mitigation and prevention requires policy tailored to each country context, careful program implementation in close coordination with our partners on the ground, and appropriate resourcing. While the administration is still formulating the FY17 budget request, I understand that USAID requested modest increases in FY16 (over FY15 enacted) in some of its core funding accounts. Specifically, I understand that this includes slight increases in the Bureau for Democracy, Conflict and Humanitarian Assistance (DCHA) core funding including for the Complex Crises Fund (CCF), Transition Initiatives (TI), as well as the Office of Conflict Management and Mitigation (CMM), USAID's analytic shop that is shaping policy in this area. CCF, TI, and CMM initiatives will strengthen the response capacity of country missions to better address conflict, and the Agency anticipates additional funding (Economic Support Funds, Development Assistance funds, and other) will be directed toward programming that mitigates the causes and consequences of conflict.

Given the constrained budget environment, I will, if confirmed, recognize the need to be prudent and thoughtful in Agency budget requests. If confirmed, I look forward to working with Congress to ensure appropriate resources are available for this critical area.

Resilience

Question. Ms. Smith, you have been a leader in the administration pushing for better responses to humanitarian emergencies, including during the food crises in the Horn and the Sahel. We greatly appreciate the previous Administrator and your support for building the resilience of communities to withstand shocks and stresses like drought and conflict.

- ♦ What will you do as AID Administrator to ensure the important work on building resilience continues and is institutionalized within USAID?

Answer. In 2012, USAID launched its first-ever policy and program guidance on "Building Resilience to Recurrent Crisis," which commits USAID to put more development focus on the most vulnerable, to build the adaptive capacity of these populations, and to improve the ability of communities, countries, and systems to manage and mitigate risk. I understand that USAID has expanded upon its initial focused resilience efforts in Ethiopia, Kenya, Niger, and Burkina Faso and that similar efforts are now underway in Somalia, Uganda, Mali, and Nepal.

If confirmed, I will support the Agency's development of additional guidance later this year that reflects resilience challenges and opportunities in Asia. As part of the Country Development Cooperation Strategy planning processes, the Agency will work to embed resilience into overall assistance strategies for focus countries in Africa and Asia, as well as other countries where risk and vulnerability are prominent threats and undermine development gains. I also commit, if confirmed, to maintaining the Agency's long-term investments in resilience in the Horn of Africa and the Sahel.

I understand that USAID's resilience investments are supported by bureaus and offices across the agency, including Africa Bureau; Asia Bureau; Bureau for Food Security; Bureau for Democracy, Conflict, and Humanitarian Assistance; Bureau for Global Health; the General Counsel; and Bureau for Economic Growth, Education, and the Environment. If confirmed, I commit to sustaining this whole-of-agency effort to build resilience to recurrent crises.

Tuberculosis

Question. As we saw last year with the Ebola crisis, a disease in a remote part of the world can quickly become a global problem. Drug resistant tuberculosis (TB) has been referred to as "Ebola with wings." Drug resistant TB requires a strong U.S. response since it is spread simply by coughing, there is no effective vaccine, and the costs of treating it are enormous. The latest case to grab the headlines, of a young woman from India with XDR TB (Extensively Drug Resistant TB) who traveled to the United States, has alarmed the public. USAID's role is to help countries improve the quality of care and respond to drug resistance, but, for several years in a row, the Obama administration has proposed a large cut in USAID's TB budget. The White House has stated that it is drafting an Action Plan on drug resistant TB.

- ♦ Will this plan be comprehensive at the scale needed to get ahead of drug resistant TB?
- ♦ Under your watch, will USAID's TB program get full support?

Answer. I understand that the White House action plan on drug-resistant tuberculosis (DR-TB) is currently under development and will build on the current USAID TB portfolio and the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria TB grants. This will accelerate progress toward achieving the goals laid out in the USG TB Strategy and contribute to the global effort to end the pandemic.

I understand that USAID will be leading the international part of the plan. It will focus on the development and implementation of faster and better quality diagnostics and treatment regimens, prioritizing countries with the highest burdens of drug-resistant TB to maximize limited resources and end TB as a major cause of morbidity and mortality. The rollout of new drugs and regimens will be critical to saving lives and preventing the development and transmission of deadly drug-resistant TB. I understand the next step in this fast-track process is a stakeholder forum to ensure input from a wide spectrum of partners.

I also understand that USAID focuses TB resources through an evidence-based exercise that determines the best approach for continuation of TB funds based on burden of TB, drug-resistant TB, TB coinfection with HIV, and other contributing factors.

Answer. While I cannot guarantee future funding levels, I will, if confirmed, help to ensure that USAID continues its efforts to curb the epidemic by working closely with partners such as the Global Fund for AIDS, TB and Malaria, ensuring high quality TB programs that appropriately treat and cure patients of the disease, and prevent the emergence and spread of drug-resistant strains. I would support USAID's leadership role in its coordination of U.S. Government global TB efforts, support for global initiatives, and support to countries to ensure the further development of quality programs to address TB and DR-TB using the best tools and treatments available.

TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR ISAKSON

Question. As you know, Sen. Casey and I introduced the Global Food Security Act which would formally authorize Feed the Future.

♦ What are the challenges that Feed the Future has currently and how will you make it stronger in your role as USAID Administrator?

Answer. First, let me thank you for your support of the Feed the Future initiative and the New Alliance for Food Security and Nutrition, which have together elevated food security on the global agenda, registered direct impact on reducing poverty and improving nutrition, and mobilized billions of dollars in direct assistance and private resources. In 2013 alone, Feed the Future reached more than 12.5 million children with nutrition interventions and helped more than 7 million farmers and food producers use new technologies and management practices on more than 4 million hectares of land.

Among the major challenge we face with respect to Feed the Future is closing the gender gap in agriculture. Women are the key players in the agricultural sector, but they own fewer assets and have less access to inputs (for example, seeds and fertilizer) and services. We have made considerable progress in this area, thanks in large part to USAID's development of a Women's Empowerment in Agriculture Index, a survey-based monitoring tool. If confirmed, I am committed to ensuring that FTF uses this data to identify the specific impediments to women's empowerment in agriculture (such as lack of control over productive assets or access to finance), to develop and implement new programs in our focus countries that better integrate women farmers into agricultural value chains, and give them greater access to credit, inputs, and services.

Question. Part of what we are trying to accomplish with the Global Food Security Act is to make the strategy and processes behind Feed the Future more transparent, so that we can more fully understand the effectiveness of our government's efforts.

♦ In the event that you are confirmed before the passage and enactment of the bill, will you commit to making the strategy and process for Feed the Future more transparent?

Answer. Yes, if confirmed, I will commit to build upon the accountability measures in place to make Feed the Future as transparent as possible. As you may know, this year FTF is conducting population-based surveys of 17 of its 19 focus countries, which will document our progress in poverty and child stunting reduction, as well as other high-level indicators across our geographic implementation zones. In addition, I understand that USAID is conducting more than 15 independent impact evaluations that help show whether positive changes—such as increases in farmer income or improvements in children's nutritional status—are caused specifically by U.S. assistance. If confirmed, I will ensure the reports and data sets from these evaluations are made publicly available, along with financial and annual country performance data. If confirmed, I will ensure that these data sets are provided to the Congress and made public. In addition, it is my understanding that in 2016, the Agency will conduct an independent external evaluation of FTF that will review all aspects of the initiative. If confirmed, I commit to making the results of this evaluation public and to instituting any necessary course corrections to maximize the impact of this critically important work.

TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR PAUL

Question. In a recent GAO report on foreign aid (GAO-15-377), GAO recommended that USAID should strengthen accountability for government-to-government (G2G) assistance. If confirmed, what additional steps would you take as USAID Administrator to improve the accountability on this form of aid?

Answer. It is my understanding that USAID has addressed the concerns raised in the Government Accountability Office (GAO) report regarding its government-to-government (G2G) assistance. I also understand that the GAO report commended USAID for completing detailed risk assessments and for using audits to further identify areas in which a partner country's public financial management practices could be strengthened to further ensure capacity to manage USAID funds.

If confirmed, I will ensure that the Agency continues its efforts to build upon the GAO report and its recommendations to strengthen accountability for G2G assistance. My understanding is that these efforts are focused on fully supporting a more efficient and effective enabling environment for USAID's overall Local Solutions initiative, including for G2G assistance, and consist of:

- ◆ Strengthening and simplifying policies, procedures, templates, and tools to improve accountability;
- ◆ Improving risk management techniques, procedures and tools for designing, implementing and monitoring G2G activities;
- ◆ Providing the needed support and resources to USAID staff in order to strengthen G2G capacity-building, accountability, and transparency;
- ◆ Continuing to improve implementation, timeliness and monitoring of annual financial audits of G2G funds in collaboration with USAID's Office of Inspector General and GAO; and
- ◆ Enhancing and coordinating development partner collaboration and harmonization.

Question. The U.S. taxpayers have given billions and billions of dollars to support aid work in Afghanistan over the last decade, yet there have been questions on both the accountability and the effectiveness of this money. For example, the Special Inspector General for Afghanistan Reconstruction (SIGAR) recently has called on USAID to respond to allegations that progress data related to Afghan education system was falsified.

- ◆ If confirmed, what are your top three priorities for improving the accountability and effectiveness for any aid to Afghanistan?

Answer. Regarding SIGAR's Letter of Inquiry related to data on education, I understand that USAID's formal response is due by June 30 and USAID will share its response with the committee when submitted.

If confirmed as Administrator, my top three priorities for enhancing accountability and aid effectiveness in Afghanistan will be: (1) working to ensure full implementation of the accountability and sustainability measures already put in place for assistance to Afghanistan; (2) working to ensure there is a regular review of our existing accountability and sustainability policies in order to regularly assess current policies and procedures, develop any new ones that may be necessary, implement any new ones that are necessary, and communicate those new policies and procedures internally in the agency and externally to Congress and others; and (3) working to ensure that USAID's culture empowers staff to alert leadership to any significant issues disclosed by the Agency's monitoring of projects in Afghanistan, or anywhere.

If confirmed, I will support USAID staff to take action when they identify projects in need of such measures.

USAID has learned important lessons over the course of its engagement in Afghanistan, and has drawn on experiences in other challenging environments—including Iraq, Pakistan, Yemen, Sudan, and Colombia—to put in place strong oversight of, and accountability for, U.S. assistance funds. Although there are inherent risks in doing business in a country like Afghanistan, the Agency prioritizes the effective and accountable use of taxpayer dollars and does not assume that there is any level of acceptable fraud, waste, or abuse in our programs. This means that oversight must be a process of continual reexamination of ongoing efforts, and that there must be flexibility to adjust to new circumstances as they arise.

Operationally, USAID has adjusted its implementation model to improve sustainability and meet the challenges presented by changes on the ground in Afghanistan, as follows:

- ◆ Developing a multitiered monitoring strategy to address reduced mobility and decreased field staff that, along with other monitoring and evaluation efforts, will continue to ensure appropriate oversight of projects;
 - ◆ Transforming USAID's approach in Afghanistan to one of mutual accountability that incentivizes Afghan reforms by conditioning an increasing percentage of our assistance to the government on progress on reforms and that continues to increase government involvement and ownership of development needs; and
 - ◆ Focusing on long-term sustainability through implementing three key principles of: (1) increasing Afghan ownership and capacity; (2) contributing to community stability and public confidence in the Government of Afghanistan; and (3) implementing effective and cost-efficient programming.

TUESDAY, JUNE 23, 2015

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, DC.

Glyn Townsend Davies, of the District of Columbia, to be Ambassador to the Kingdom of Thailand
William A. Heidt, of Pennsylvania, to be Ambassador to the Kingdom of Cambodia
Jennifer Zimdahl Galt, of Colorado, to be Ambassador to Mongolia
Atul Keshap, of Virginia, to be Ambassador to the Democratic Socialist Republic of Sri Lanka and to the Republic of Maldives
Alaina B. Teplitz of Illinois, to be Ambassador to the Federal Democratic Republic of Nepal
David Hale, of New Jersey, to be Ambassador to the Islamic Republic of Pakistan
Sheila Gwaltney, of California, to be Ambassador to the Kyrgyz Republic

The committee met, pursuant to notice, at 9:35 a.m., in room SD-419, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Hon. Cory Gardner, presiding.

Present: Senators Risch, Gardner [presiding], Cardin, Shaheen, Murphy, and Kaine.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. CORY GARDNER, U.S. SENATOR FROM COLORADO

Senator GARDNER. This hearing will come to order.

Let me welcome you all to today's full Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing on nominations.

I want to thank Senator Cardin for working with this date and the witnesses today supporting this important hearing today.

We will have two panels today, the first on nominees from East Asia and Pacific region, and then at 11 a.m., Senator Risch will take over for a second panel of nominees from the South and Central Asia region.

I first want to welcome all the family members who are here today for this distinguished panel this morning.

In the first panel of witnesses, we will hear from three nominees: Mr. William Heidt to be Ambassador to the Kingdom of Cambodia; Mr. Glyn Davies to be Ambassador to the Kingdom of Thailand; and Ms. Jennifer Galt to be Ambassador to Mongolia.

I had an opportunity to meet personally with all of these well-qualified nominees, and I want to warmly welcome them and their families to this hearing today.

Thailand is the longest standing U.S. ally in Asia. The Kingdom of Siam and the United States concluded a Treaty of Amity and Commerce in 1833 when our Nation was still in its infancy.

In 1954, modern day Thailand and the United States became military allies under the Treaty of Manila, and in 2003, the United States designated Thailand as a major non-NATO ally.

Despite the historically tumultuous domestic politics in Thailand, the commercial and military relationship between our nations has blossomed. The United States is Thailand's third-largest bilateral trade partner. Our militaries have averaged 40 joint exercises per year. We cooperate actively on issues as wide-ranging as humanitarian disaster assistance to law enforcement to disease control.

However, the 2014 military coup in Thailand threatens to set back the positive trajectory of our relationship unless Bangkok moves decisively to restore democracy.

So I look forward to hearing from Mr. Davies today on how we can maintain and grow our strong relationship while exerting efforts to see Thailand successfully move back to the democratic path.

Cambodia represents an opportunity for the United States to build another long-standing partnership in Southeast Asia. After the unparalleled brutality of Pol Pot and the Khmer Rouge regime and the civil war that ensued in the 1970s and the 1980s, Cambodia seems to have finally found a semblance of stability and a democratic footing.

The July 2013 elections and the 2014 power-sharing agreement between the ruling Cambodian People's Party and the main opposition groups, unified as the Cambodian National Rescue Party, are hopeful steps forward, although progress remains fragile.

Cambodia is the poorest country in Southeast Asia with GDP at about $2,600 per person, and the country is heavily dependent on overseas development assistance, including from the United States.

So I look forward to hearing from Mr. Heidt on moving the democratic process forward, but also assisting Cambodia with its economic and development challenges.

Next but certainly not least, we will move to East Asia and Mongolia. Sandwiched between two world powers, Russia and China, Mongolia has major strategic importance for the United States. Since transitioning from socialism to democracy in 1992, Mongolia has held six direct Presidential elections and six direct parliamentary elections.

The country possesses vast mineral wealth, although corruption and economic development remain serious issues in that country.

Despite the difficult geopolitical environment, Mongolia has been a strong ally to the United States. Mongolian troops were part of the coalition during the Iraq war and continue to serve alongside U.S. troops in Operation Enduring Freedom in Afghanistan.

So I look forward to hearing from Ms. Galt on how we can strengthen this critical partnership between our nations.

And now I will turn it over to Senator Cardin for this hearing.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. BENJAMIN L. CARDIN,
U.S. SENATOR FROM MARYLAND

Senator CARDIN. Well, Mr. Chairman, first of all, thank you for holding this hearing so that we can consider these three nominees.

I want to thank all three of them, as you already have, and their families. This is an incredible service to our country that you are willing to perform in a place far away from where we are today. So we know it is a sacrifice. We know your families are making those sacrifices, and we thank you for your willingness to represent the United States in these foreign policy posts that are strategically important to U.S. security and economic interests.

Glyn Davies is well known to many members of this committee for his recent service as the Special Representative for North Korea Policy, but he has also served as U.S. Representative to the IAEA and senior positions in the East Asia Bureau and the Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor. This experience will provide an important background for his service in Thailand, if confirmed, particularly given recent events there.

William Heidt is currently the executive assistant to the Under Secretary for Economic Growth, Energy, and the Environment at the Department of State, a position which will be invaluable given the economic and development opportunities we have in Cambodia. Mr. Heidt also has held a senior post in Warsaw, at the U.N., Indonesia, and in Cambodia. So he brings a great deal of experience to this position.

And finally, Jennifer Galt, who currently serves as our counsel general in China. She has been a senior advisor in the Department of Public Affairs and also served NATO, as well as previous posts in China and India.

So, Mr. Chairman, we are very fortunate to have three career diplomats before us who have devoted their professional life to serve our country. And I thank them again for their willingness to serve in three important posts in the United States foreign policy.

You already mentioned Thailand is one of our longest friendships, 180 years of cooperation in public health, trade, in security and education. But as you also pointed out, the recent coups have presented tremendous challenges to Thailand and its relationship with the United States. The restoration of democratic governance must be our top priority. And I must tell you it is taking too long, and we must push for early elections so that we can move forward with this democratic country.

I also want to point out that it is a Tier 3 country in our Trafficking In Persons Report and that is unacceptable. So we need to continue to push Thailand to do the right thing on behalf of ending modern day slavery.

In Cambodia, they are on a Tier 2 Watch List for trafficking. That is unacceptable, and they will need our help again in dealing with this. As you pointed out, it is the poorest country in the region and has huge challenge, but lots of potential, potential in economics. The environmental issues are challenging, but there is a great prospect there. And certainly expanding their democratic institutions will present a full array of opportunities for the U.S. mission in Cambodia.

And Mongolia. It is one of the youngest democracies. It has been supportive of our military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and is a country that is the newest member of the OSCE, an organization where I have devoted a good deal of my attention.

So I think all three of the posts offer important strategic partnerships with the United States and a great opportunity, but also challenge and I look forward to hearing from our witnesses.

Senator GARDNER. Mr. Glyn Davies is a career member of the Senior Foreign Service and currently serves as senior advisor in the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs at the Department of State.

Previously, Mr. Davies served as Special Representative for North Korea Policy; Permanent Representative to the International Atomic Energy Agency and the United Nations Office in Vienna, Austria; Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary and Deputy Assistant Secretary, East Asia and Pacific Affairs Bureau; Senior Advisor, Foreign Service Institute Leadership Management School; Acting Assistant Secretary, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor; Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Bureau of European and Eurasian Affairs; Political Director for the U.S. Presidency of the G8 with rank of Ambassador; and Deputy Chief of Mission, U.S. Embassy in London, United Kingdom.

Mr. Davies earned an M.S. at the National War College in 1995 and a B.S. from Georgetown University in 1979. He has been the recipient of numerous Senior Foreign Service performance and honor awards, fluent in French.

Welcome, Mr. Davies and your family. And we look forward to hearing your comments this morning.

STATEMENT OF HON. GLYN TOWNSEND DAVIES, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE KINGDOM OF THAILAND

Ambassador DAVIES. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, members of the committee. Thank you for the chance to appear before you today.

I am honored to be President Obama's nominee to serve as the United States Ambassador to the Kingdom of Thailand. I thank both the President and Secretary of State Kerry for their support.

I also thank all members of the committee for this opportunity to speak to my qualifications. Throughout my career, I have worked to develop the experience to lead my colleagues in strengthening America's security and advancing its prosperity. If confirmed, serving as chief of mission in Bangkok would draw on all of my 36 years as a Foreign Service officer.

My family is my greatest strength. I would like to express my love and gratitude to my wife, Jackie; daughters, Ashley and Teddie; son-in-law, Chapin; and granddaughters, Josie and Cybbie. Josie and Cybbie and my wife and daughter are sitting behind me today.

Thailand and the United States share a long and a deep friendship. Thailand is, as you said, our oldest treaty ally in Asia. We work together to advance regional security, expand trade, improve public health, assist refugees, counter human trafficking, illegal narcotics, wildlife trafficking, and protect the environment. Few bilateral relationships are as broad and beneficial.

Over the past decade, Thailand's internal political divide has polarized Thai society. We do not take sides in this, but we do stress our strong support for democratic principles and our commitment to our historic friendship with the Thai people.

Since the coup, the United States has publicly and privately made clear our concerns about the disruption of Thailand's democratic traditions and the limits placed on civil liberties, including freedom of expression and peaceful assembly. Democracy can only emerge when the Thai people freely and fairly elect their own government. As required by law, the United States suspended certain assistance until a democratically elected civilian government takes office. When that occurs, our relationship can return to its fullest capacity.

Our call for restoring democracy does not advocate for a specific constitutional blueprint. That is for Thailand's people to decide through an inclusive political process. If confirmed, I will support their democratic aspirations.

Mindful of our long-term strategic interests, we remain committed to our security alliance. Thai and U.S. troops fought side by side in both Vietnam and Korea, and together we hold many bilateral and multilateral exercises, including Asia's largest, Cobra Gold. These allow us to increase coordination and cooperation to respond to humanitarian and natural disasters. We collaborate extensively on public health issues, including research on a vaccine for HIV/AIDS.

The United States is Thailand's third-largest trading partner. Our companies are major investors there. Our Embassy in Bangkok, supported by our consulate general in Chiang Mai, is a regional hub for the U.S. Government and one of our largest missions in the world.

Our people-to-people ties are strong. Thousands of Thai and American students study in each other's countries. The Peace Corps has been in Thailand for over 50 years. Americans have long admired and respected Thailand's traditions and culture. His Majesty King Bhumibol has led his people with compassion for close to 70 years and has worked tirelessly for their advancement.

Thailand is a founding member and leading voice in all of the region's multilateral institutions. We work with Thailand and through those bodies to advance regional growth and security.

We also work with government and civil society organizations to address human trafficking. If confirmed, I will encourage Thailand to take robust action to combat it.

Thailand has been a key partner on humanitarian issues, sheltering thousands of Burmese refugees, as well as the Rohingya and vulnerable populations from some 50 nationalities. Thailand hosted a regional conference in May on the migrant crisis in the Andaman Sea and Bay of Bengal. We stress the need to save lives and treat vulnerable migrants humanely. We also partner with Thailand to respond to natural disasters such as the earthquakes in Nepal earlier this year.

We care deeply about Thailand and about its people. If confirmed, I will work closely with this committee to advance our broad range of interests in that country. While we will continue to do much with Thailand, we look forward to its return to democracy.

so our joint efforts can reach their fullest potential. We believe the Kingdom of Thailand can find reconciliation, establish democracy, and fulfill its historic destiny as a great and free nation.

Thank you again for considering my nomination, and I look forward to answering your questions.

[The prepared statement of Ambassador Davies follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF GLYN TOWNSEND DAVIES

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today. I am honored to be President Obama's nominee to serve as the United States Ambassador to the Kingdom of Thailand. I thank the President for the confidence he has placed in me by putting me forward to the Senate for consideration, and thank Secretary of State Kerry for his strong support. I am grateful to all the members of the committee for this chance to speak to my qualifications and intentions.

I joined the Foreign Service in 1980, and have sought throughout my career to develop the experience and skills to lead interagency colleagues in strengthening our country's security and advancing our prosperity. If confirmed, serving as Chief of Mission in Bangkok would be the culmination of that 36-year effort.

My family is my greatest strength. I would like to express my love and gratitude to my wife, Jackie, daughters Ashley and Teddie, son-in-law, Chapin, and granddaughters, Josie and Cybbie.

Thailand and the United States share a long and enduring friendship. Thailand is one of our oldest treaty allies in Asia. We collaborate on a remarkably wide range of issues, including advancing regional security, expanding trade and investment, enhancing public health, assisting refugees and displaced persons, countering illegal narcotics and wildlife trafficking, fighting transnational crime, and protecting the environment. Despite the limitations we have had to impose on aspects of our engagement after Thailand's May 2014 military coup, few bilateral relationships are as broad and yield as many benefits to both countries.

Over the past decade, Thailand's internal political divide has dramatically deepened, polarizing not just the political class but society as a whole. We have not taken sides in this debate, but have stressed our unwavering support for democratic principles and our commitment to our historic friendship with the Thai people.

Since the coup, the United States has consistently underscored both publicly and privately our concerns about the disruption of Thailand's democratic traditions and accompanying restrictions on civil liberties, including freedom of expression and peaceful assembly. We maintain that democracy can only emerge when the Thai people freely and fairly elect their own representatives and leaders. As required by law, the United States has suspended certain assistance until a democratically elected civilian government takes office. When that occurs, our bilateral relationship can return to its fullest capacity.

Our call for the restoration of civilian government, a return to democracy, and full respect for human rights, including freedom of expression and of peaceful assembly, does not mean we advocate for a specific constitutional or political blueprint. Those are questions for the Thai people to decide through an inclusive political process that allows for an open and robust debate about the country's political future. If confirmed, I will continue to support the democratic aspirations of the Thai people.

Mindful of our long-term strategic interests, we nonetheless remain committed to maintaining our security alliance. Thai and U.S. troops fought side by side during the Vietnam and Korean wars, and together we hold many bilateral and multilateral exercises, engagements, and exchanges, including Asia's largest multilateral military gathering, Cobra Gold. These interactions provide invaluable opportunities to increase coordination and cooperation, including on providing humanitarian assistance and responding to natural disasters.

The United States is Thailand's third-largest trading partner, and American companies are major investors in Thailand. Our Embassy in Bangkok, supported by our consulate general in Chiang Mai, is a regional hub for the U.S. Government and remains one of our largest missions in the world. We collaborate extensively on public health issues, a cornerstone of our bilateral cooperation, including promising research on a possible vaccine for HIV/AIDS.

Our people-to-people ties are strong and growing. Educational linkages help thousands of Thai and American students study in each other's countries. The Peace Corps has deployed volunteers across Thailand for over 50 years. The American people have long admired and respected Thailand's rich traditions and culture. His Majesty King Bhumibol Adulyadej, the only monarch ever born in the United States, has led his people with compassion and integrity for almost 70 years and has been a tireless advocate for the advancement of the Thai people.

Thailand is a founding member and a leading voice in all of the region's multilateral institutions, including the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN), the East Asia Summit, the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) forum, and the Lower Mekong Initiative (LMI). The United States will continue to work with Thailand and through the region's institutions to further our mutual goals of stimulating trade and economic growth and promoting regional security.

We work with the Thai Government to strengthen its efforts to address the country's human trafficking problem. We also support civil society organizations that help identify and protect victims and promote the rights of migrant workers. If confirmed, I will encourage Thailand to take robust action to combat human trafficking.

For many years, Thailand has been an important partner on humanitarian issues. It hosted hundreds of thousands of refugees after the Vietnam war. Today, Thailand shelters some 110,000 Burmese refugees and asylum seekers in nine refugee camps along the Thailand-Burma border, as well as the Rohingya and vulnerable populations from some 50 nationalities. Thailand hosted a regional conference in May on the migrant crisis in the Andaman Sea and Bay of Bengal. We continue to work closely with Thailand and other affected countries to address the sensitive issue of irregular migration with a priority on saving lives and urging humane treatment of vulnerable migrants. We also work closely with the Thai to respond to natural disasters, including the devastating 2008 cyclone in Burma and the earthquakes in Nepal earlier this year.

We care deeply about our bilateral relationship and about the people of Thailand. If confirmed, I will work closely with this committee to advance our broad range of interests in Thailand. While we will continue to do much together, we look forward to its return to democracy so that our joint efforts can reach their fullest potential. We believe the Kingdom of Thailand can find reconciliation, establish democracy, and fulfill its historic destiny as a great and free nation.

Thank you again for considering my nomination. I look forward to answering your questions.

Senator GARDNER. Thank you, Mr. Davies.

Mr. Heidt is a career member of the Senior Foreign Service and currently serves as Executive Assistant, Office of the Under Secretary for Economic Growth, Energy, and the Environment in the Department of State. Previously, Mr. Heidt served the Department of State as Deputy Chief of Mission in the U.S. Embassy in Warsaw, Poland; Counselor for Economic and Social Affairs, U.S. Mission to the United Nations in New York; economic counselor, U.S. Embassy, Jakarta, Indonesia; Special Assistant, Office of the Under Secretary for Economic, Business, and Agricultural Affairs; also as finance and development officer, Embassy Jakarta in Indonesia; and economic and commercial officer, U.S. Embassy Phnom Penh, Cambodia.

Mr. Heidt earned a B.A. at Pennsylvania State University in 1984 and an M.A. at George Washington University in 1986. His awards include Department of State Senior Foreign Service performance, superior honor, and meritorious honor, as well as joint Department of State and Department of Labor award for excellence in labor diplomacy. He speaks fluent Cambodian, as well as Polish, Indonesian, and German.

Welcome, Mr. Heidt, to you, your family and friends.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM A. HEIDT, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE KINGDOM OF CAMBODIA

Mr. HEIDT. Thank you very much, Chairman Gardner, Ranking Member Cardin, and Senator Kaine.

It is an honor and a privilege to appear before you today as the President's nominee to be Ambassador to the Kingdom of Cambodia. I am deeply grateful to President Obama and Secretary

Kerry for the confidence and trust they have placed in me by nominating me for this position. If confirmed, I pledge to work closely with this committee to advance the United States broad range of interests in a peaceful, democratic, and prosperous Cambodia.

I am accompanied today by my wife, Sotie, and son, Allen, who are sitting right behind me to my right, and who have served overseas tours with me in hot cities and cold ones too, ranging from Cambodia, Indonesia, Poland, and New York City.

I have spent the bulk of my 28-year Foreign Service career working on the interlinked challenges of promoting America's prosperity overseas and helping developing countries enact the policies and build the institutions they need to improve living standards, protect the environment, and compete in a global economy.

One of my most memorable Foreign Service tours was in Phnom Penh from 1997 to 1999 where I worked on a number of the most critical issues facing the country, including illegal logging, food security, and building a sustainable garment industry with decent and dignified conditions of work.

Cambodia has changed dramatically since that time. GDP growth has exceeded 7 percent annually for the past decade, and as a result, the national poverty rate has fallen from well over 50 percent in 2000 to 17 percent in 2012. Life expectancy has increased substantially as well. If confirmed, I plan to make growing the trade and investment relationship between the United States and Cambodia a top priority.

Cambodia's performance on human rights and democracy issues has been more uneven. The most recent national elections in 2013 drew unprecedented public involvement but were also marred by allegations of fraud. After a yearlong post-election standoff, the ruling party and opposition reached agreements on power-sharing in the National Assembly and reforming the country's election law and National Election Committee.

But despite these negotiated agreements, concerns remain about provisions that appear to limit the activities of NGOs in the democracy area and that open the door for increased influence by the Cambodian military and other government officials in election campaigns. If confirmed, I will make it a priority to work with the government, opposition, and civil society to strengthen Cambodia's democratic institutions.

The building of a vibrant, homegrown civil society is one of Cambodia's most impressive achievements since the 1993 Paris Peace Accords, but NGOs in Cambodia today face deep uncertainty in the form of a draft law on associations and nongovernmental organizations that is soon to be considered in the National Assembly. Provisions in this draft law would appear to limit the activities NGOs may engage in and create burdensome registration and reporting requirements for them. The United States has spoken about these concerns and the lack of public consultations to date on the law. If confirmed, I will work closely with civil society and the government to encourage the creation of stable and supportive conditions for a vibrant civil society in Cambodia.

Cambodia has also made progress in recent years on several crucial humanitarian and justice issues. With assistance from the United States Government and a number of NGOs, Cambodia has made great strides in reducing child sex trafficking, one of the saddest and most pernicious social problems the country has faced. The State Department and USAID continue to work with Cambodia to reduce labor trafficking, which remains a significant problem in Cambodia and its neighbors.

The United States supports the work of the Khmer Rouge Tribunal to help the people of Cambodia find justice and hold accountable those most responsible for the atrocities committed by the Khmer Rouge. If confirmed, I will work with fellow tribunal supporters and the Cambodian Government to ensure that the tribunal completes its critical mission.

The United States supports Cambodia's reemergence on the world diplomatic stage and has encouraged it to play an independent, principled role in ASEAN and other regional institutions. We have supported Cambodia's integration into the ASEAN Economic Community and collaborated with it in the Young Southeast Asian Leaders Initiative, or YSEALI. Through YSEALI, the United States is engaging young Southeast Asians and encouraging them to view their country's goals and challenges in a regional context. The program has been enormously popular in Cambodia, and if confirmed, I will make youth engagement a top priority.

Mr. Chairman, it is fitting to conclude with a few words about Cambodia's young people. It is one of the youngest nations in Southeast Asia, with 70 percent of the population under the age of 30. Young Cambodians today are very favorably disposed toward the United States. Like young people everywhere, they want good jobs, a chance to engage in the political and social life of their country, and the opportunity to build a family. They are one of the main reasons I am optimistic about the country's future today.

Mr. Chairman, thank you again for the opportunity to appear before the committee today. I would, of course, be happy to answer any questions you might have.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Heidt follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF WILLIAM A. HEIDT

Chairman Gardner, Ranking Member Cardin, and members of the committee, it is an honor and privilege to appear before you today as the President's nominee to be Ambassador to the Kingdom of Cambodia. I am deeply grateful to President Obama and Secretary Kerry for the confidence and trust they have placed in me by nominating me for this position. If confirmed, I pledge to work closely with this committee to advance the United States broad range of interests in a peaceful, democratic, and prosperous Cambodia.

I am accompanied today by my wife, Sotie, and son, Allen, who have served overseas tours with me in Cambodia, Indonesia, and Poland.

I have spent the bulk of my 28-year Foreign Service career working on the interlinked challenges of promoting America's prosperity around the world and helping developing countries enact the policies and build the institutions they need to, improve living standards for all, protect the environment, and compete in the global economy.

One of my most memorable Foreign Service tours was in Phnom Penh, from 1997–99, where I worked on some of the most critical issues facing Cambodia—controlling rampant illegal logging, feeding the 10-percent of the country who went hungry every dry season, and helping the Cambodian Government build a sustainable garment industry with decent and dignified conditions of work. I am proud that in 2000, after my return from Phnom Penh, I was awarded the joint Department of State—Department of Labor award for labor diplomacy for my work strengthening workers' rights in Cambodia's garment sector.

Cambodia has changed significantly since that time. Cambodia's GDP has grown more than 7 percent annually for the past decade on the strength of increased agricultural production, a booming tourism industry, investment in real estate and construction, and growth in garment exports. As a result, the poverty rate fell from well over 50 percent in 2000 to just over 17 percent in 2012, and is surely lower today. Life expectancy has increased from 67 years in 2006 to 71.2 years in 2013, due to improved food security and health care. If confirmed, I plan to make growing the trade and investment relationship between the U.S. and Cambodia a priority. I also hope to advance our cooperation on health issues, which make a direct impact on the Cambodian people.

Cambodia's performance on human rights and democracy issues has been more uneven than its economic progress. The most recent national elections in 2013 drew unprecedented public involvement and were the most peaceful in Cambodian history but were also marred by allegations of fraud. After a year-long, post-election stand-off, the ruling party and opposition reached an agreements on power sharing in the National Assembly and to reform the country's election law as well as Cambodia's National Election Committee, which oversees elections.

But despite these negotiated agreements, concerns remain, including with regard to provisions that appear to limit the activities of nongovernmental organizations in the democracy area and open the door for increased influence by the Cambodian military and other government officials in election campaigns. The United States has a long history of supporting Cambodia's democratic development through foreign assistance funding and people-to-people contacts. If confirmed, I will make it a priority to work with the government, opposition, and civil society to strengthen Cambodia's democratic institutions and raise the level of public confidence in them. Conducting free and fair communal elections in 2017, and national elections in 2018, will be a key test for the Government.

The building of a vibrant, home grown civil society is one of Cambodia's most impressive achievements since the 1993 Paris Peace Accords ended years of conflict. Cambodian and international NGOs deliver crucial social services, educate the public on issues ranging from health to information technology, build people-to-people contacts with countries around the world, and develop the skills of thousands of Cambodian workers. It is no exaggeration to say that NGOs are one of Cambodia's finest faces to the world.

But NGOs in Cambodia today face deep uncertainty in the form of a draft Law on Associations and Non-Governmental Organizations that is soon to be considered in the National Assembly. Provisions in this draft law would appear to limit, in vague terms, the activities NGOs may engage in, and create burdensome registration and reporting requirements for NGOs. The United States has spoken about these concerns, the lack of public consultations to date on the law, and the law's overall intent. If confirmed, I will work closely with civil society and the Government to encourage the creation of stable, and supportive conditions for a vibrant civil society in Cambodia.

Cambodia has also made progress in recent years on several crucial humanitarian and justice issues. With assistance from the U.S. Government and a number of NGOs, Cambodia has made great strides in reducing child sex trafficking—one of saddest, and most pernicious social problems the country has faced. The State Department and USAID continue to work with Cambodia to reduce labor trafficking, which remains a significant problem in both Cambodia and neighboring countries. The United States supports the work of the Khmer Rouge Tribunal to help the people of Cambodia find justice and hold accountable those most responsible for the atrocities committed by the Khmer Rouge. We will continue to work with fellow Tribunal supporters and the Cambodian Government to ensure the Tribunal completes its critical mission. And as one of the few Asian countries that is party to the Refugee Convention, Cambodia has made important progress in developing procedures to identify and protect refugees. At the same time, if confirmed, I will strongly urge it to apply those protections to people seeking asylum on its territory, including the Montagnards from Vietnam.

Cambodia is playing an increasingly active role in the Southeast Asia region. The United States supports Cambodia's reemergence on the world diplomatic stage, and has encouraged it to play an independent, principled role in ASEAN and other regional institutions. We have supported Cambodia's integration into the ASEAN Economic Community and collaborated with Cambodia in the Young Southeast Asian Leaders Initiative or YSEALI. Through YSEALI, the United States is engaging with the 65 percent of Southeast Asians under the age of 35 and encouraging them to view their countries' goals and challenges in a regional context. The program has been enormously popular in Cambodia, and if confirmed, I will make youth engagement a priority.

Mr. Chairman, it is fitting to conclude my testimony with a few words about Cambodia's young people. Cambodia is one of youngest nations in Southeast Asia with 70 percent of the population under 35. Most Cambodians were not even born during the brutal Khmer Rouge period and years of civil war, events that continue to define our perceptions of Cambodia. Young Cambodians today are very favorably disposed toward the United States, and like young people everywhere, want good jobs, a chance to engage in the political and social life of their country, and the opportunity to build a family. They are one of the main reasons I am optimistic about the country's future.

Mr. Chairman, thank you again for the opportunity to appear before you. I would be happy to answer any questions the committee might have.

Senator GARDNER. Thank you, Mr. Heidt.

And finally, let me extend a special welcome to a fellow Coloradoan, Ms. Jennifer Zimdahl Galt, our nominee for Mongolia. Ms. Galt is a proud graduate of Colorado College in Colorado Springs, and her father is a professor emeritus at my alma mater of Colorado State University.

Ms. Galt is a career member of the Senior Foreign Service, class of minister counselor, currently serves as principal officer at the U.S. consulate general in Guangzhou, China, a position she has held since 2012.

Previously, Ms. Galt served in the Department of State as Senior Advisor in the Bureau of Public Affairs from 2011 to 2012; Public Affairs Advisor at the U.S. Mission to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Brussels, Belgium; and Deputy Director, Office of Public Diplomacy, Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs from 2008 to 2010. She also served as public affairs officer, U.S. consulate general, Shanghai in China; assistant cultural affairs officer, U.S. Embassy in Beijing; assistant public affairs officer, U.S. consulate in Mumbai; and information officer, American Institute in Taiwan.

Ms. Galt earned a bachelors of the arts, as I mentioned, from Colorado College; M.A. from Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies; and an M.S. from the National Defense University.

She has won numerous awards from both the Department of State and earlier from the United States Information Agency. She speaks Mandarin Chinese, French, Italian, Spanish, and Serbo-Croatian.

Welcome, Ms. Galt. I look forward to your comments today.

STATEMENT OF JENNIFER ZIMDAHL GALT, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO MONGOLIA

Ms. GALT. Thank you very much.

Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Cardin, Senator Kaine, it is an honor to appear before you as President Obama's nominee to be Ambassador to Mongolia.

I am deeply grateful for the confidence the President and Secretary Kerry have shown in me, and if confirmed, I look forward to working closely with this committee to build on the already strong ties between the United States and Mongolia.

My career in the Foreign Service spans 27 years, most of them spent in Asia. I joined the Foreign Service out of a commitment to serve my country and have consistently sought assignments where I felt I could make a difference and contribute to advancing an important relationship.

The love and support of my family has sustained me throughout. I would like to take this opportunity to express my gratitude to my husband, Fritz, and my children, Phoebe and Dylan, who have traveled the globe with me, and to my father, Bob Zimdahl, and my brothers, Randy, Bob, and Tom. I am enormously proud that my daughter Phoebe, a rising college junior, is here with me today.

This is an exciting year for United States-Mongolia relations, as we mark the 25th anniversary of Mongolia's decision for democracy, a milestone that the Senate recognized in its June 1 resolution. Our partnership has grown stronger since then-Secretary Baker first visited the newly democratic Mongolia in 1990. As the only former Soviet satellite in East Asia to choose democracy, Mongolia is an important model in the region and, as the saying goes, punches above its weight on issues of strategic interest to the United States, including coalition military efforts, peacekeeping, and the promotion of democratic principles and values. Our relationship is one of shared interests and is characterized by enormous potential.

There are many opportunities for the United States to deepen our partnership with Mongolia. I would like to highlight a few where I would focus my attention, should I be confirmed as Ambassador.

Mongolia and the United States share a common interest in promoting peace and stability. Mongolia is a stalwart partner in Afghanistan and deploys capable peacekeepers wherever they are needed, including currently in Sudan and South Sudan. Just last week, the United States and Mongolia conducted our yearly multinational peacekeeping exercise, Khaan Quest. Mongolia demonstrates leadership in international fora to promote democracy and human rights, such as the Freedom Online Coalition and the Community of Democracies. Mongolia is a model of democracy and has demonstrated a willingness to mentor others in the region, offering training and exchanges with leaders from Burma to Kyrgyzstan. If confirmed, I would welcome the opportunity to work with Mongolian officials to advance our shared interests in these critical areas.

Recent high-level engagement in Mongolia has demonstrated our commitment to enhancing commercial opportunities for U.S. companies. In the last 6 months, we resumed trade and investment framework agreement talks, launched a new economic policy dialogue, and the Millennium Challenge Corporation began the process of developing a second compact with Mongolia. Each of these initiatives is an opportunity to expand economic growth, model responsible business conduct, promote trade and investment, and create opportunities for U.S. companies. The Mongolian Government demonstrated its interest in attracting foreign investment by signing and ratifying the U.S.-Mongolia Transparency Agreement in December 2014. The Mongolian Prime Minister is traveling to Washington and New York this week to deliver the message that Mongolia is open for business, our business.

Mongolia's recent progress on a major copper and gold mine with a Western company signaled to the international community its renewed seriousness of purpose in attracting foreign direct investment. With large reserves of coal, copper, gold, uranium, and other minerals, there are many opportunities for U.S. companies in mining and related sectors. If confirmed, I would support these opportunities by actively informing potential U.S. investors about the investment climate and advocating on their behalf.

I believe that two key components of U.S. support for Mongolia's democracy and its independence and leadership in the region are engagement with its nascent civil society and deepening people-to-people ties. If confirmed, I would continue the work of my predecessors in areas such as the rights of persons with disabilities. I would, if confirmed, continue our robust subnational cooperation as well, including the Alaska-Mongolia State Partnership and the sister city relationship between Ulaanbaatar and Denver in my home State of Colorado. If confirmed, I would also look forward to supporting one of our largest Peace Corps programs anywhere, with over 150 volunteers in country. Peace Corps Volunteers work side by side with Mongolians in English teaching, health care, and community youth development.

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, it would be the highest honor for me to serve our country as Ambassador to Mongolia. If confirmed, I will do my utmost to ensure that the United States delivers on the strategic and historic opportunities of the next century of Mongolia's democracy.

Thank you for considering my nomination, and I look forward to your questions.

Sustaining our strong partnership across sectors: Mongolia and the United States share a common interest in promoting peace and stability. Mongolia is a stalwart partner in Afghanistan, and deploys capable peacekeepers wherever they are needed, including currently in Sudan and South Sudan. In April 2014, the United States and Mongolia signed a Joint Vision Statement that articulated the parameters for our security relationship, acknowledging the important role Mongolia plays as a stabilizing influence in Asia and commending Mongolia's support for U.N. peacekeeping operations around the world. Just last week, the U.S. and Mongolia conducted our yearly multinational peacekeeping exercise, Khaan Quest. Mongolia demonstrates leadership in international fora to promote democracy and human rights, such as the Freedom Online Coalition, hosting a successful annual conference in May; and the Community of Democracies, hosting the Ministerial in 2013. Mongolia is a model of democracy and has demonstrated a willingness to mentor others in the region, offering training and exchanges with leaders from Burma to Kyrgyzstan. If confirmed, I would welcome the opportunity to work with Mongolian officials to advance our shared interests in these critical areas.

Strengthening economic ties and creating opportunities for U.S. businesses: Recent high level engagements in Mongolia have demonstrated our commitment to enhancing commercial opportunities for U.S. companies. In the last 6 months, we resumed Trade and Investment Framework Agreement talks, launched a new Economic Policy Dialogue, and the Millennium Challenge Corporation began the process of developing a second compact with Mongolia. Each of these initiatives is an opportunity to expand economic growth, model responsible business conduct, promote trade and investment, and to create opportunities for U.S. companies. Mongolia Government demonstrated its interest in attracting foreign investment by signing and ratifying the U.S.-Mongolia Agreement on Transparency in Matters Related to International Trade and Investment (the Transparency Agreement) in December 2014. The Mongolian Prime Minister is traveling to Washington and New York this week to deliver the message to U.S. companies and Members of Congress that Mongolia is open for business, our business.

Mongolia's recent progress on a major copper and gold mine with a Western company signaled to the international community its renewed seriousness of purpose in attracting foreign direct investment, which has declined 85 percent since 2012. With large reserves of coal, copper, gold, uranium, and other minerals, there are many opportunities for U.S. companies in mining and related sectors. If confirmed, I would support these opportunities by actively informing potential U.S. investors about the investment climate and advocating on their behalf. I would also continue our efforts to promote a more diversified economy in Mongolia and to generate increased commercial opportunities for U.S. companies, including support for Department of Commerce efforts such as the U.S.-Mongolia Business Forum, which this year will focus on agriculture. I would encourage good governance, transparency, and responsible business conduct, including through working with the Mongolian Government to implement the Transparency Agreement.

Enhancing civil society and people-to-people ties with Mongolia: I believe that two key components of U.S. support for Mongolia's democracy and its independence and leadership in the region are engagement with its nascent civil society and deepening people-to-people ties. If confirmed, I would continue the work of my predecessors in areas such as the rights of persons with disabilities, where, thanks to exchanges between government leaders and civil society, we are working with Mongolian parliamentarians on draft legislation that may include lessons learned from our Americans with Disabilities Act. I would, if confirmed, continue our robust subnational cooperation as well, including the Alaska-Mongolia State Partnership, which began with cooperation between the Alaska National Guard and the Mongolian Armed Forces, and has grown to include economic and social ties. I am particularly pleased that Mongolia's ties to the United States also include a sister city relationship between Ulaanbaatar and Denver, in my home State of Colorado. If confirmed, I also would look forward to supporting one of our largest Peace Corps programs anywhere, with over 150 volunteers in country this year. Peace Corps volunteers work side by side with Mongolians in English teaching, health care, and community youth development. The efforts of these volunteers—our grassroots ambassadors in Mongolia—have been extremely effective.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it would be the highest honor for me to serve our country as Ambassador to Mongolia.

America's security and prosperity are closely and increasingly linked to the Asia-Pacific. One of the most important tasks of American statecraft over the next decade is to lock in the increased investment—diplomatic, economic, strategic, and military—from the administration's sustained rebalance to the region. I welcome the opportunity to be on the front lines of this endeavor. If confirmed, I will lead a diplomatic mission of approximately 200 U.S. and Mongolian employees, representing five agencies. I will do my very best to ensure that all members of that community and their families have the leadership, security, and support they need to engage on behalf of the United States, so that Americans continue to sustain and benefit from the growth and dynamism in the Asian region. If confirmed, I will also do my utmost to ensure that the United States delivers on the strategic and historic opportunities of the next century of Mongolia's democracy.

Thank you for considering my nomination. I look forward to your questions.

Senator GARDNER. Thank you, Ms. Galt, and thanks to all of you again for your comments this morning.

And since I cannot just talk to you the entire time about Colorado, we will have to spread out the conversation a little bit.

Mr. Davies, 38 years in the Foreign Service, your experience. Thank you for your commitment. What is the biggest change that you have seen over that time, starting from your first experiences to today in terms of public diplomacy?

Ambassador DAVIES. In terms of public diplomacy, I think the explosion in—let us call it—the globalization of media has been the biggest change. When I came into the Foreign Service, the United States of America was reaching hearts and minds overseas in very traditional ways, publishing millions of copies of magazines for young Indians every month, for instance, using radio, touring music stars, and so forth. Today, we can reach young people in most countries in their shirt pockets through their mobile devices, and it requires a much more considered approach to how we get the word out to peoples all around the world, in particular young people, about America, what it stands for, and why it is that they should look to the United States as a friend and ally. So the challenge has become much more complex. But I think we are making the changes necessary to step up.

Senator GARDNER. And specifically to Thailand, in terms of the length of the military coup, do we have any idea how long we are looking at this lasting, this military exertion of power? Is there a way that the United States can influence the length of that or the timing or speed up the reforms for democracy, free elections, and sort of adding a third component to that with the support and loyalists to the former Prime Minister, is it even possible to have free and fair elections in Thailand?

Ambassador DAVIES. Well, I believe that it is possible for Thailand to have free and fair elections. They have done it in the past. In recent generations, they have had decades' worth of experience of democracy. They can get back to that. The current junta, the coup government, claims that that is their aspiration. They have set up a very lengthy, somewhat elaborate process to get back to it. You are right. The goal post does continue to recede. That is a big concern. We want them to get back to democracy as soon as possible. We would like to see elections very soon.

But at the end of the day, the truth is this is up to Thailand, its leadership, and its people to work out. But I have confidence they can do it. And if confirmed, I am going to bend every effort to convey to them the views of the United States and would encourage them to get back on that democratic path.

Senator GARDNER. Thank you.

Mr. Heidt, Hun Sen has ruled Cambodia since the mid-1990s basically without interruption. What do you see as Cambodia's likely political future, should Hun Sen move toward retirement? Are there scenarios where there could be military interference if there is a retirement there as well? What do you do in such a scenario?

Mr. HEIDT. Thank you for the question, Senator.

There has been a lot of stasis at the top of Cambodia's ruling elite in the last 20 years. Of course, in 2013, we had a very good and meaningful election for Cambodia. It was the most open election in Cambodian history. Public participation was very broad, very enthusiastic. The opposition party did much better than anyone expected and even despite some pretty deep-seated irregularities in the election process.

So it left many observers with the feeling that with a reformed National Election Commission and some additional support from the international community, Cambodia can take another step forward in the next election just as they took a step forward in 2013. So there is optimism that with continued support, we could see a better democratic future for Cambodia.

I do not deny, of course, that there are also concerns about increased military—the possibility under the new law for increased military activity in the campaign. That law does permit, for the first time in Cambodia, the military and senior government officials to be involved. And that is a concern and it is something we are going to have to monitor very closely. If confirmed, I hope to do that.

Senator GARDNER. You mentioned the opposition party. How is the power-sharing arrangement working between the two parties, the CPP, the CNRP?

Mr. HEIDT. Senator, that is a $64,000 question with respect right now to Cambodia. Both the Prime Minister and Sam Rainsy—they have both spoken publicly about their desire to start this culture of dialogue. The relationship is clearly more cooperative than at any time in the 20 years since I have been following Cambodia. Of course, as a general rule, we encourage dialogue in Cambodia. We think that is very important to have constructive dialogue, peaceful dialogue that can help Cambodia put forward the reforms and policy changes they need to improve the lives of ordinary Cambodians. Whether this new collaboration between the two will lead to that kind of genuine change, I think it is much too early to say, very honestly, and I think it is something that if confirmed—it is definitely something we are going to keep a very close eye on.

Senator GARDNER. Thank you, Mr. Heidt.

Ms. Galt, in your opening remarks, you talked about Mongolia being the only former Soviet satellite state that had moved or transitioned toward democracy. Yet, in preparing for this morning's hearing, the background briefings on Mongolia—the corruption challenges to—corruption at the local level throughout the government. Yet, we have had six Presidential elections, open elections there. What more can the United States do to address the full transition to a democracy, reducing corruption, but strengthening and building democracy?

Ms. GALT. Thank you, Senator, for your question.

Indeed, Mongolia is a democracy but it is a young democracy, and it shares many of the same challenges as other young democracies in terms of solidifying the rule of law.

And I think there are two areas where we can continue our work with Mongolia—and if confirmed, I would look forward to doing that—to solidify and strengthen some of their institutions to combat corruption.

One is to support Mongolia's leadership in international fora to promote democracy. Mongolia has shown a willingness to reach beyond its borders, to export both democracy and security. And we continue to work with Mongolia to strengthen its own institutions. And recently our increased economic engagement is very important in that regard. So with its signing of the U.S.-Mongolia Transparency Agreement, Mongolia has indicated its willingness to improve its own institutions to combat corruption and to combat transnational crime as well. Our Trade and Investment Framework Agreement talks and our new Economic Policy Dialogue gives us other platforms to talk about institutional reforms.

The Millennium Challenge Corporation is another tool that we can use to enhance Mongolia's democratic behavior. MCC leadership tells me that based on the successful completion of their first compact, they believe very strongly that Mongolia has learned many lessons from working with us on the first compact. And, if confirmed, I would look forward to working with Mongolia and working with the Millennium Challenge as they develop a second compact for Mongolia.

Senator GARDNER. Thank you, Ms. Galt.

Senator Cardin.

Senator CARDIN. Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Once again, thanks to our witnesses.

In each of your countries, I think to a large extent the success of our mission depends upon us standing strong on the principles of our country, the universal principles that we espouse on human rights, good governance, anticorruption, rights of all individuals. That to me is the bedrock of America's foreign policy. And we have seen too many places in the world where we have deviated from that commitment. The stability that we hoped for did not exist and will not exist.

So in all three of the countries, there are challenges in trafficking in persons. Thailand is probably the worst. It is a Tier 3 country, which means that it has failed. There are reportedly tens of thousands of victims in Thailand, mainly from other countries, that have been trafficked into Thailand for labor abuse and for sex trafficking. Obviously, that cannot continue.

It is more of a challenge because in Thailand we are now past the 1-year anniversary of this coup, and it was not the first coup in modern history. And I must tell you my patience is running thin with Thailand. We talk about a commitment to early elections, and when a country is operating under a coup government, human rights are always going to be challenged, as we have seen.

So, Mr. Davies, I appreciate your view that we cannot intercede into the internal politics of a country, and I agree with that. But for the sake of the rights of the people of Thailand and for U.S. principles, there must be an urgency in Thailand proceeding with democratic elections and dealing with its human rights issues.

Your comments?

Ambassador DAVIES. Thank you very much, Senator. I think that is exactly right, and I think that is job one for anyone who represents the United States in Thailand to bring home to, in particular, the current leadership the importance of moving quickly, swiftly, allowing for, if need be catalyzing an open, inclusive public debate about the way forward for Thailand. I believe most Thais do want to get back to democracy. The situation now is untenable. It is not good for Thailand, first and foremost, to have a suspension of civil liberties, of sending civilians through the military justice system, and so forth.

So for me, if confirmed, this would be something I would lean into very hard to convey publicly and privately the importance we attach to Thailand's getting back to the democratic path, breaking this cycle of periodic military coups that, quite frankly, goes all the way back three generations to the 1930s, and putting Thailand once and for all firmly and finally on the path to democracy.

So I take your words to heart. I want to work with this committee to see this through. I do think it is not a job that is going to be done in an instant because they are a divided society, divided polity. There are serious issues that have to be worked out domestically, which is why I said it really is, first and foremost, their challenge to confront. But I think you are right. We have a role to play. They listen to us. We are going to use that bully pulpit.

Senator CARDIN. I thank you for your answer. We recognize it will not happen overnight. But it is already over a year since this coup, and I think many of us expected further progress than we have seen to date. So there is an urgency here. I just hope that you will transmit that to the people of Thailand that we are with them, but we will not tolerate the suspension of civil liberties.

Ambassador DAVIES. Yes, sir.

Senator CARDIN. Mr. Heidt, in regards to Cambodia, they are not doing much better in trafficking. They have been downgraded to a Tier 2 Watch List country. As has already been pointed out, they are a poor country. So it is interesting that they are also designated because they are a source of trafficking. So it is not only that they are victimized by people in Cambodia being trafficked out, there are also people that are being victimized within Cambodia. So they have human rights issues.

The most recent concern that has been expressed by human rights groups is the draft NGO law, which has serious concerns among NGOs about whether they are going to be able to operate effectively in Cambodia.

So would you just share with me and this committee your commitment to advance the basic human rights as our representative, if confirmed, in Cambodia?

Mr. HEIDT. Thank you very much, Senator.

Of course, promoting democracy and human rights has been a central part of our program in Cambodia since I was there before, ever since the 1993 Paris Peace Accords.

In the area of trafficking in persons, it is an area where U.S. involvement has made a real difference. Both directly and through NGOs, we have really been able to give Cambodia good assistance, and as a result, as I mentioned in my statement, they have been able to make substantial progress on the issue of child sex trafficking. Now, that of course, is a particularly pernicious and dreadful problem, and I think it is important to give them credit for that progress.

At the same time, as you mentioned, there is a pretty substantial labor trafficking problem in Cambodia flowing out to neighboring countries, flowing into Cambodia from its neighboring countries. And so certainly there is much more work to be done in that area in terms of building cooperation between Cambodia and the labor-receiving countries, especially Malaysia. There is some evidence of complicity by government officials in trafficking—that is a big problem—and as well as pretty much a complete lack of victim assistance. When we find victims of trafficking, the government has very little assistance that they can offer.

So that is something I am absolutely committed to working on that issue while I am out there, if confirmed. Like I say, it has been an area where we have great success before that we can be proud of, and we will continue to do that.

On the NGO law, of course, the concern there is that it will limit the ability of the NGOs to do some of the good work they are doing. NGOs perform a range of important services in Cambodia. We have spoken to the government and publicly about this law, and we frankly do not really see a need for it. We do not think there is a giant problem that needs to be solved by that. But if the government goes ahead with the law, as it appears very likely—they considered it in the National Assembly today in Phnom Penh—today, their time. They considered it and pushed it out to three separate National Assembly commissions. So it appears that it is going to move forward. We have counseled them to consult widely when they do it and to do it with a light touch, to focus on basic transparency issues, not to make it a giant problem that really squelches civil society in Cambodia.

Senator CARDIN. Thank you for that answer.

If the chair would indulge me for one remaining question. Ms. Galt, Mongolia is an encouraging country. There is a lot of progress being made. They are Tier 2 on trafficking, which means they still are not meeting the minimum standards, although the report does point out they are making progress. So they are moving in the right direction.

As I also pointed out, they are one of our allies. But there are challenges regarding human rights and concerns about internationally recognized freedom for its citizens.

I want to get your response to a potential issue, and that is, Mongolia is resource-rich, which can become a problem for a country if it is not managed properly. We have seen it as a source of corruption in other countries. We have seen it as a source of environmental problems in other countries. We have seen it as a management issue creating problems with democracy in other countries.

My question is, How will you focus on our mission in Mongolia as to how they handle their resources to make sure that it is used for the benefit of the people of Mongolia and not used as a source that could be problematic for funding corruption or antidemocratic principles, which we have seen in too many countries around the world?

Ms. GALT. Thank you, Senator, for that question.

First, on the issue of trafficking, indeed, this continues to be a concern in Mongolia, and if confirmed, I would work very closely with the Government of Mongolia to combat trafficking. We have a U.S. Government program working with an NGO in Mongolia to raise public awareness of trafficking and to work to implement Mongolia's antitrafficking legislation. So I would look forward, if confirmed, to continuing on that front.

I think on the corruption issue, you are absolutely right. This is very much on Mongolia's radar and very much on our radar, as Mongolia develops its rich resources.

I think there are, again, two areas, as I said earlier, where we can continue to work closely with Mongolia to encourage them to develop these resources in a transparent and fair way. And if confirmed, I would look forward to doing that.

The first is to continue to support Mongolia's leadership in international institutions, including the Freedom Online Coalition and the Community of Democracies, which are fora in which Mongolia can learn best practices and develop its own mechanisms and techniques for combating corruption domestically and for developing its economy.

And then the second is our economic engagement. I think through working with the Government of Mongolia to implement the recently signed and ratified Transparency Agreement, that gives us an opportunity to work very closely with them to develop procedures, develop their institutions, and strengthen their institutions to combat corruption. So I would look forward to working with them on both of those fronts in that challenge area.

Senator CARDIN. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator GARDNER. Senator Kaine.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And to the witnesses and to the entire panel of the seven nominees who are before us today, I am only able to be here for the first panel. And I regret that because you all really do a credit to the Nation with your extensive service. And I thank each of you and I also thank your families and friends who are here and who have been supportive.

Ms. Galt, if I could start with you since we are just finishing on Mongolia, I am fascinated by a number of aspects of the country and its transition from socialism to democracy. In the Economist Intelligence Unit's Democracy Index for 2014, Mongolia was ranked 61st out of 167 countries ranked in the democracy index. For a democracy this new that has transitioned from socialism, that is not bad. If you dig into the ranking, the EIU classifies Mongolia as a, quote, flawed democracy with high marks for electoral processes and civil liberties but lower marks for government functioning, political culture, including a high degree of corruption in local politics.

Talk a little bit about your game plan if you are confirmed to go in and accelerate the pro-democracy trends and institutional improvements that Mongolia seems to be embracing but that need improvement.

Ms. GALT. Indeed, if confirmed, this would be one of my highest priorities to work closely with the Government of Mongolia to strengthen their institutions, to combat corruption, and to ensure a transparent and free market for external investment. And I think encouraging and advocating for more U.S. investment in Mongolia is one way that would be very useful and productive for encouraging transparent economic engagement in Mongolia. So that is one area that I would work on, if confirmed.

The second area is through the Millennium Challenge Corporation. As I mentioned earlier, the Millennium Challenge leadership tells me that they feel very strongly that Mongolia has learned some good lessons from the first compact. And as they are engaging in their constraints analysis and negotiations on a potential second compact for Mongolia, that will be a tool that we can use to further influence the institutional development and to ensure that Mongolia's economic growth going forward is equitable and fair.

I think a third area I mentioned before, but we have an ongoing engagement and plans for a new program with the Government of Mongolia working with them on justice reform. And that is a third area that I would have a high priority in terms of improving their institutions and their capacity to handle corruption and to deal transparently with corruption issues.

Senator KAINE. There have been some high profile cases in Mongolia where foreign investors have been caught up in business disputes and then blocked exit visas to leave, Canadians, in one instance an American. Those have to create challenges in terms of encouraging more investment.

What is the progress of the Mongolian Government in putting reforms in place that would avoid those unless absolutely necessary?

Ms. GALT. Indeed, I think investor confidence is at a low point right now in Mongolia. But, again, our recent economic engagement gives me a lot of encouragement as to potential for a positive trend in the future. And if confirmed, I would continue to work very closely on our economic front. So, number one, implementing the Transparency Agreement is one very important platform. A second is our Trade and Investment Framework Agreement and our Economic Policy Dialogue, which gives us another opportunity to engage. And then finally, the Millennium Challenge would be another opportunity to grow Mongolia's capacity in terms of its institutions. So those would be three areas where I would work very closely were I to have the opportunity.

Senator KAINE. And finally, the United States is sort of deemed by Mongolia as the most important of its, quote, "third neighbors," so the neighbors that do not have borders with Mongolia. As we are dealing with so many issues on this committee and in the Senate generally about bilateral relations between the United States and China and the United States and Russia, I am interested in how Mongolia handles those bilateral relationships and what are the current kind of temperature in those sets of bilateral relationships between Mongolia and China and Russia.

Ms. GALT. Indeed, Mongolia is in a tough neighborhood. I think the chairman mentioned sandwiched between Russia and China. And so it is very much in Mongolia's interest to maintain a stable, positive relationship with both Russia and China. Russia and China are both strong economic partners to Mongolia. China purchases 80-plus percent of Mongolia's resources. So it is very important for Mongolia to maintain a positive economic trade and political relationship with China.

However, I think there is room for all of us. There is room for Russia and China and for Mongolia's third neighbors. And so if confirmed, I would look forward to continuing to enhance both our political, economic, and military partnership with Mongolia.

I think in addition to the strength of those aspects of our partnership, U.S. soft power is a very powerful force in Mongolia. Young people are looking to the United States. Young people are studying English, thanks in large part to our Peace Corps over the years, and studying in the United States and returning to Mongolia. So the influence of the United States as a fellow democracy and our shared values is a powerful offset to the economic power of Mongolia's neighbors.

Senator Kaine. Thank you for those answers.

One question for you Mr. Heidt. I noticed that there are analysts that are concerned about the Prime Minister's placement of his sons in political positions of power within Cambodia and what that might portend in the future. We have seen in other nations around the world, whether it is Libya or Egypt or Syria, once a structure of a ruling family starts to be kind of perpetuated, that can lead to really significant internal dissent.

What is the likelihood of that or your assessment in Cambodia? What can the United States do to promote a more vigorous democracy, not confined just to a single family?

Mr. Heidt. Thank you very much, Senator, for that question.

Of course, Hun Sen's sons, as you mentioned—several of them are active, very active in the CPP. Our sense is looking at that, that it is like many political parties. It is a complex structure. There are lots of people who want to move to the top. The folks that I have talked to—there is not a sense that there is some preordained path for the two of them. It is not North Korea. It is a big competitive party with lots of ambitious people in it. And so even despite the obvious birth advantages the two have, my sense is that there is no guaranteed route to the top for them.

Of course, the other issue is, as we saw in 2013, electoral politics in Cambodia are getting more competitive. And the extent to which the opposition is able to rally and unify around strong candidates, promote good candidates from below, the extent to which, with international help, Cambodia's election institutions get stronger and can deliver better elections, those things also make it less likely that some sort of family system develops in Cambodia. So I do think it is a very competitive situation and one, of course, if confirmed, I will keep an eye on.

Senator Gardner. Thank you. And thank you to the witnesses today for your testimony, your comments, and your willingness, again, to serve.

And in breaking with Senate tradition, we are going to stay on schedule and stand in a short recess until Senator Risch joins us and we reconvene at 11 o'clock.

[Pause.]

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. JAMES RISCH, U.S. SENATOR FROM IDAHO

Senator RISCH [presiding]. Thank you all for coming. This Subcommittee on Near East, South and Central Asia of the Foreign Relations Committee will come to order.

And today we have for hearing four nominees for different positions around the world.

First of all, I want to thank all of our nominees for being here today and your families and for your willingness to serve. The countries you are nominated to are tough posts, to say the least, and it really highlights that you and your families are willing to make the sacrifices to go and to serve in those posts. We really do appreciate your efforts in that regard.

First, I am going to introduce all of you at once. I want to talk about each of the countries very briefly and talk about where we are with them, and hopefully, you will correct me if I am inaccurate or add to that if you think that is appropriate.

Obviously, Mr. Hale is going to Pakistan. And while the official U.S. policy toward Pakistan is to assist the creation of a more stable democratic and prosperous Pakistan, the United States-Pakistan relationship is an important but equally frustrating relationship, as we all know. Support for U.S. presence in Afghanistan has been vital, but over the years, Pakistan's support for the Taliban in Afghanistan and the safe havens in the FATA has set back efforts to move Afghanistan and the region forward. The idea of a new Silk Road across South and Central Asia would bring economic prosperity to many, especially in Pakistan, but border disputes with India cripple the cooperation.

Recently this spring, a number of us had the opportunity to meet a delegation from the Pakistani governing body, the Parliament that were here. And I have to say I think all of us were impressed with their sincerity and their commitment to do the things that would better the United States-Pakistan relationship.

The June 2014 operation against militant groups in FATA was a good effort to bring more stability to the border with Afghanistan, and hopefully the United States-Pakistan strategic dialogue can produce more tangible results politically and economically.

The past several years have shown us that despite enormous U.S. aid, Pakistan will only prosper when the country can create a stable environment for trade and foreign direct investment. To achieve this kind of success, the international community needs a serious partner in the Pakistan Government that can deepen its political institutions and work through its relationship with India and others. After our meeting with the delegation from Pakistan, I think all of us believe that they have a sincere commitment to attempt to do that.

Regarding Nepal, the recent earthquake in Nepal has been tragic and the international commitment to Nepal has shifted accordingly. The outpouring of support from around the world requires a sustained focus on rebuilding the country, but donor coordination is going to be a daunting task and we must make sure both U.S. assistance and other aid is timed appropriately and not wasted on projects that are neither needed nor helpful for the people of Nepal. These kinds of things happen, of course, when you do get a flood of cash that comes in after a serious problem as has taken place in Nepal.

In the aftermath of the earthquake, I also hope there will be a renewed sense of unity that can help Nepal move forward and find the political consensus necessary to finally draft a new constitution which, as we all know, they have been struggling with for some time.

In addition, you will have a particularly important job taking care of our people. While Embassy Staff work to help Nepal build, they are also rebuilding their own lives and making sure they get their own support, and that will be crucial.

Regarding Sri Lanka and the Maldives where Mr. Keshap is headed, the January election and change in power has created a substantial shift for the region. The government's efforts to tackle corruption, deepen reconciliation, and rebalance its position among the other regional powers provide an enormous opportunity for Sri Lanka. The new President, we hope, will maintain his commitment to change, and if indeed he follows through on that, it is going to be a sea change for the region.

Ms. Gwaltney is going to the Kyrgyz Republic. Central Asia, as we all know, has been a hard place for the United States. English is often the fourth or fifth language spoken, if at all, in the region. The dominance of Russia and the proximity of China, as well as the Soviet legacy, presents significant challenges and tempered expectations. The Kyrgyz Republic clearly embodies all of these intersecting challenges. However, there is still a lot of work we can do leading up to the parliamentary elections in October, and hopefully we can find some success helping to develop their economy. But I worry about the destabilizing role that Russia can play for its own strategic interests.

With that said, I look forward to all of your testimony.

First of all, I would like to briefly introduce each of the nominees here starting with Mr. David Hale, who has been nominated for the Pakistan posting. Mr. Hale is a native of New Jersey who also received his undergraduate degree from the Georgetown School of Foreign Service and joined the Foreign Service in 1984. Mr. Hale has extensive experience in the Middle East, serving at posts in Israel, Jordan, Lebanon, Bahrain, and others, including his most recent as U.S. Ambassador to Lebanon. He is clearly experienced in tough postings and jobs that might make Pakistan look like an easy assignment.

Ms. Gwaltney is going to the Kyrgyz Republic. Ms. Gwaltney is from Woodland, CA, with a B.A. from UC-Davis, a masters from George Washington University. Again, her extensive experience working in and around Russia. Ms. Gwaltney has substantial experience to support her in this new role.

Ms. Teplitz, appointed to Nepal, was born in Chicago, IL, and received her B.A. at Georgetown University. She has served in numerous positions at the State Department and the region. With her management background and the current challenges in Nepal, she is well suited to assume this position.

Mr. Keshap, who has been appointed to serve in Sri Lanka and the Maldives, was born in Nigeria, educated at the University of Virginia with both a bachelors and masters degree. Mr. Keshap has extensive experience with Southeast Asia, including his current post as the Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Bureau of South and Central Asian Affairs at State. He has won numerous awards for his work and, at the same time, has found time to well raise his four children.

So in any event, thank you all again for the willingness to serve and your families likewise for the willingness to serve.

Now we would like to hear a few minutes from each of you. We will start with Mr. Hale, who has been nominated for Pakistan.

STATEMENT OF HON. DAVID HALE, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE ISLAMIC REPUBLIC OF PAKISTAN

Ambassador HALE. Well, Mr. Chairman, thank you very much for the introduction and thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to be the next American Ambassador to the Islamic Republic of Pakistan. I am humbled by the confidence President Obama and Secretary Kerry have placed in me, and if I am confirmed, I look forward to working with the Senate on how best to advance U.S. interests in Pakistan.

I have had the privilege of serving in the Foreign Service for 31 years, and most of my career has been spent advancing U.S. interests in the Middle East and the Muslim world as Ambassador to Lebanon, as U.S. Special Envoy to the Middle East, and earlier as Ambassador to Jordan.

During my previous tours as Ambassador, my highest priority was the safety and security of all American personnel, information, and facilities, as well as the safety and security of American citizens. And if confirmed, I will have no higher priority in Pakistan.

Pakistan is a strategically important country for achieving U.S. national security interests. We have a strong stake in Pakistan's ability to combat militancy and strengthen its democratic institutions. And broadly speaking, the United States has four core interests in Pakistan: first, defeating al-Qaeda and countering militancy; second, nonproliferation and nuclear security; third, political and economic stability which includes respect for human rights; and fourth, regional stability, including improved relations with Afghanistan and with India.

And while there is more to be done on all fronts, the last few years have witnessed progress toward these goals as the United States and Pakistan have built a more stable, forthright relationship. With regard to counterterrorism, Pakistan has taken important actions that have brought to justice several senior al-Qaeda leaders. It launched a significant military operation in North Waziristan last June, capturing large weapons caches and closing safe havens for multiple terrorist groups. We welcome Pakistan's commitment to target all militant groups on Pakistani soil equally, an objective that is absolutely in the interest of the United States and one on which, if confirmed, I will work closely with the Pakistan Government to advance.

We and the Pakistanis also share deep concern and must remain vigilant for any sign that ISIL is gaining a foothold in Pakistan. Our shared strategic interests extend well beyond any particular group. It is from the ungoverned spaces in remote parts of the border region that spring a multitude of threats, both militant and criminal, affecting Pakistan, the region, and the broader world, including America.

We are also actively engaged with Pakistan on strategic stability and nonproliferation issues. While our governments do not see eye to eye on all issues, we share a number of common interests, including the high importance of ensuring nuclear security and preventing the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

Relations with its neighbors play an important part in Pakistan's security and prosperity. Pakistan has undertaken important outreach to Afghanistan following the Afghan election, and the two countries have made some progress toward terrorist safe havens on both sides of the border. Given the drawdown in United States forces in Afghanistan, it is all the more critical that relations between Pakistan and Afghanistan be strong and cooperative and that Pakistan continue to put pressure on the Taliban to join an Afghan-led peace process. Pakistan's relationship with India is critical to Pakistan's future, and the normalization of relations between those two countries is vital both to them and to the region.

Experience has demonstrated that sustained, consistent engagement with Pakistan provides us with the best chance to address challenges and advance our core interests. The United States-Pakistan strategic dialogue is the mechanism that underpins our cooperation in areas of shared interest, from counterterrorism to energy, from economic growth to defense and security. All six of the strategic dialogue working groups have met within the last year.

U.S. civilian assistance to Pakistan has delivered impressive results and must continue. Our signature projects in Pakistan have added 1,500 megawatts to Pakistan's electric grid and built over 1,100 kilometers of road.

U.S. security assistance to Pakistan is equally important. It directly supports Pakistan's ability to conduct counterinsurgency operations, clear terrorist safe havens, and stem the flow of deadly improvised explosive devices, which have killed far too many civilians and security personnel.

Should I be confirmed, I look forward to working with Congress and this committee, with our extraordinary team in both Washington and Pakistan, with the government and people of Pakistan and with the community of Americans of Pakistani descent here in the United States.

And, Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Murphy, let me reiterate how deeply honored I am to be here today and to be nominated as the Ambassador to the Islamic Republic of Pakistan. Thank you very much for considering my nomination. I would be pleased to answer any questions.

[The prepared statement of Ambassador Hale follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF AMBASSADOR DAVID HALE

Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Murphy, members of the committee, thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to be the next American Ambassador to the Islamic Republic of Pakistan. I am humbled by the confidence President Obama and Secretary Kerry have placed in me. If I am confirmed by the Senate, I look forward to working with the Senate on how best to advance U.S. interests in Pakistan.

I have had the privilege of serving in the Foreign Service since 1984. Most of my career has been spent advancing U.S. interests in the Middle East and the Muslim world, including most recently as Ambassador to the Lebanese Republic. Before that, I served as the U.S. Special Envoy for Middle East Peace, and earlier, as Ambassador to Jordan.

During my previous tours as Ambassador, my highest priority was the safety and the security of all American personnel, information, and facilities, as well as the safety and security of American citizens. If confirmed, I will have no higher priority in Pakistan.

Pakistan is a strategically important country for achieving U.S. national security interests. We have a strong stake in Pakistan's ability to combat militancy and strengthen its democratic institutions. Broadly speaking, the United States has four core interests in Pakistan: first, defeating al-Qaeda and countering militancy; second, nonproliferation and nuclear security; third, political and economic stability which includes respect for human rights; and fourth, regional stability, including improved relations with Afghanistan and India.

While there is more to be done on all fronts, the last few years have witnessed progress toward these goals as the United States and Pakistan have built a more stable, forthright relationship. With regard to counterterrorism, Pakistan has taken important actions that have brought to justice several senior al-Qaeda leaders. It launched a significant military operation in North Waziristan last June, capturing large weapons caches and closing safe havens for multiple terrorist groups. We welcome Pakistan's commitment to target all militant groups on Pakistani soil equally—an objective that is absolutely in the interests of the United States, and one on which, if confirmed, I will work closely with the Pakistani Government to advance. We and the Pakistanis also share deep concern and must remain vigilant for any sign that ISIL is gaining a foothold in Pakistan. Our shared, strategic interests extend well beyond any particular group; it is from the ungoverned spaces in remote parts of the border region that spring a multitude of threats, both militant and criminal, affecting Pakistan, the region, and the broader world, including the United States.

We are also actively engaged with Pakistan on strategic stability and nonproliferation issues. While our governments do not see eye to eye on all issues, we share a number of common interests including the high importance of ensuring nuclear security and preventing the proliferation of Weapons of Mass Destruction. We are pleased that Pakistan is fully engaged with the international community on nuclear safety and security issues, including as an active partner in the Nuclear Security Summit process.

At the same time, Pakistan is an often boisterous democracy of nearly 200 million people with a growing economy. In 2013, it completed its first democratic transition from one elected civilian government to another. The Government of Pakistan has made real strides in unlocking Pakistan's growth potential, and is working to advance an economic reform program in close collaboration with the International Monetary Fund. Just last week, Moody's recognized the government's progress by raising its sovereign credit rating. Still, there is work to be done. Rule of law, tolerance, and respect for the rights of all citizens are guiding principles for all thriving democracies.

Relations with its neighbors play an important part in Pakistan's security and prosperity. Pakistan has undertaken important outreach to Afghanistan following the Afghan election, and the two countries have made some progress against terrorist safe havens on both sides of the border. Given the drawdown in U.S. forces in Afghanistan, it is all the more critical that relations between Pakistan and Afghanistan be strong and cooperative, and that Pakistan continue to put pressure on the Taliban to join an Afghan-led peace process. Pakistan's relationship with India is critical to Pakistan's future. The normalization of relations between the two countries is vital, both to them and to the region.

Experience has demonstrated that sustained, consistent engagement with Pakistan provides us with the best chance to address challenges and advance our core interests. The U.S.-Pakistan Strategic Dialogue is the mechanism that underpins our cooperation in areas of shared interest, from counterterrorism to energy, from economic growth to defense and security; all six of the Strategic Dialogue working groups—law enforcement and counterterrorism; economics and finance; energy; defense; strategic stability and nonproliferation; and education, science, and technology—have met within the last year.

U.S. civilian assistance to Pakistan has delivered impressive results and must continue. Our signature projects in Pakistan have added over 1,500 megawatts to Pakistan's electric grid, and built over 1,100 kilometers of road. Each year, the United States sponsors thousands of Pakistani exchange students to the United States—including a larger investment in the Fulbright Program than anywhere else in the world. These are long-term investments which advance bilateral people to people exchanges, Pakistan's stability and growth, and help promote a pluralistic and tolerant society.

U.S. security assistance to Pakistan is equally important and is directly supporting Pakistan's ability to conduct counterinsurgency operations, clear terrorist safe havens, and stem the flow of deadly improvised explosive devices (IEDs) which have killed far too many civilians and security personnel. Our security assistance, like our civilian assistance, is geared directly toward meeting critical U.S. national security objectives.

Should I be confirmed, I look forward to working with Congress and this committee, our extraordinary team in both Washington and Pakistan, who are dedicated and accept risks in order to achieve the goals of the American people, with the government and people of Pakistan, and with the community of Americans of Pakistani descent here in the United States. Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Murphy and members of the committee, let me reiterate how deeply honored I am to be nominated as the Ambassador to the Islamic Republic of Pakistan.

Thank you very much for considering my nomination. I would be pleased to answer your questions.

Senator RISCH. Mr. Hale, thank you very much.

We have been joined by Ranking Member Murphy, and if you do not have opening statement, we will move on.

Senator MURPHY. Keep going.

Senator RISCH. Ms. Teplitz, you are next. We would like to hear what you have to say.

STATEMENT OF ALAINA B. TEPLITZ, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE FEDERAL DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF NEPAL

Ms. TEPLITZ. Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Murphy, it is an honor to appear before you today as the President's nominee for the U.S. Ambassador to Nepal. I am grateful for this opportunity to serve our country.

And I would like to recognize some of my family who are with me today, my sons, Max and Miles Mellott. And a shout-out to those who could not be here because I would not be at this table without them and their support.

Mr. Chairman, as you noted in your remarks, right now when people think of Nepal, they invariably think of the horrific earthquake of this past April and the tremendous damage it wrought. That tragedy has brought together the people of Nepal, the country's neighbors, and the international community to help the victims recover and the country rebuild.

And while much has changed in Nepal since the earthquake, our overall priorities for the country remain the same: to strengthen its democracy, advance its economic growth, and improve its resiliency. If confirmed, I will work to advance these goals and build on the achievements of my predecessors and our 60 years of positive engagement with Nepal.

I will speak first about the last objective, improved resiliency, and then discuss the other two priorities. At the top, I would like to extend the Department's profound gratitude to Congress for its support for seismically safe housing for U.S. Embassy personnel in Kathmandu. It saved the lives of our mission personnel and enabled them to immediately assist with rescue and relief efforts, thus saving more lives and reducing the quake's impact on Americans, Nepalese, and others.

The first responsibility of every U.S. Ambassador is to ensure the safety and security of American citizens, and if confirmed, I will continue to prioritize investments that will protect our personnel and citizens.

And as Nepal moves to the reconstruction phase, we will work with its government and its neighbors in Asia to help it build back better, to provide protection to the most vulnerable, to improve resiliency against future disasters, and to ensure that investments in Nepal's infrastructure are economically sound and environmentally stable. And as you pointed out, if confirmed, I will share your focus on donor coordination throughout this effort.

Turning now to the second priority, advancing Nepal's economic growth. As we work to help Nepal's economy grow and advance, we must look to leverage its location among the booming economies of South Asia. With more investments in infrastructure, the creation of a business- and investment-friendly environment, and a more integrated regional market, Nepal's entrepreneurs could harness the region's economic potential and create tremendous prosperity for their nation. Nepal's recent eligibility for a Millennium Challenge Corporation—MCC—compact should help it develop some of that economic potential. If confirmed, I will actively look for opportunities to improve the business environment and support American investment in Nepal.

I would lastly like to discuss our priority of strengthening Nepal's democracy. In 2006, the country emerged from a decade of civil conflict with a commitment to creating a constitution that would seal a lasting peace. The American people can be proud of the role they have played in Nepal's transition from violence to peaceful politics. That process is still underway. And there has been some significant progress lately. Nepal became eligible for an MCC compact because of its democratic progress. But much remains to be done, and our Government will help Nepal where we can to advance its constitutional process and cement a hard-won peace.

Maintaining that peace will require a firm commitment to human rights, and if I am confirmed, the promotion and protection of human rights will remain a central priority for Mission Kathmandu. This particularly includes protections for Tibetan refugees, for women, for disadvantaged populations, and for those vulnerable to trafficking.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware of the many challenges we will face in these efforts, from maintaining good coordination with Nepal's Government and our international partners, to ensuring our resources are being spent effectively.

My career in the Foreign Service has been dedicated to the efficient management of resources, whether for our missions in Kabul, Dhaka, Belgium, or here in Washington at the Foreign Service Institute or in the Bureau of South and Central Asian Affairs. My experience, it would seem, is very timely for this posting.

With the support of Congress, our Government is preparing for a large recovery and reconstruction effort in Nepal, and if confirmed, I hope to draw on my management experience and expertise to help ensure the people of Nepal get the best assistance we can give and that the U.S. taxpayers get the biggest bang for their buck.

As that assistance effort progresses, I would, if confirmed, look forward to working closely with this committee and others in Congress to ensure our work reflects our shared priorities.

Thank you again for the opportunity, and I look forward to your questions.

STATEMENT OF SHEILA GWALTNEY, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE KYRGYZ REPUBLIC

Ms. GWALTNEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Murphy.

It is a great honor to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to serve as the United States Ambassador to the Kyrgyz Republic. I am deeply grateful for the trust and confidence the President and Secretary Kerry have shown in me with this nomination. If confirmed, I look forward to working closely with the members of this committee and their staff to promote and protect U.S. interests in the Kyrgyz Republic.

I have had the privilege of serving our country for 31 years as a Foreign Service officer. I have served as Deputy Chief of Mission in the Kyrgyz Republic, Ukraine, and Russia and have worked on issues related to this region for most of my career. I can think of no higher honor than to return to represent the American people as Ambassador of the United States to the Kyrgyz Republic, a country I know and respect for its rich culture, natural beauty, and warm and hospitable people. I deeply appreciate the love and support of my family and friends throughout these years.

The principles that have guided U.S. policy toward the Kyrgyz Republic remain as relevant today as they were when the country attained independence 23 years ago. Our long-term focus has always been to support and respect its sovereignty, territorial integrity, and independence. Our strategic goals are to facilitate and strengthen the Kyrgyz Republic's stability, prosperity, and democracy.

The Kyrgyz Republic is Central Asia's leader in democratic development. In 2011, following the election of President Atambayev, the Kyrgyz Republic accomplished the first democratic transfer of Presidential in Central Asia. The Kyrgyz Republic has an independent Parliament and a vibrant and active civil society, with thousands of nongovernmental organizations working in a wide variety of fields. If confirmed, I would work with the government and people of the Kyrgyz Republic to strengthen the country's democratic institutions, support the continued growth of civil society, and promote respect for human rights.

Our security cooperation with the Kyrgyz Republic is focused on the common goals of countering terrorism, improving border security, and stemming the flow of illegal narcotics. The United States and the Kyrgyz Republic need to work together to fight human trafficking and other transnational threats. If confirmed, I would work to strengthen our existing partnership and continue our joint efforts to address regional and global security challenges.

Expanding markets and opportunities for American business is a top priority worldwide. As Secretary Kerry says, "Foreign policy is economic policy." If confirmed, I would work with the Kyrgyz Republic to bolster private sector-driven economic growth, including the promotion of American economic and business interests. The Kyrgyz Republic has been a regional leader in pursuing market reform and our two nations can work together to expand prosperity for both our countries.

People-to-people contacts remain the bedrock of our diplomatic efforts. If confirmed, I look forward to engaging people throughout the Kyrgyz Republic and strengthening ties between the American and the Kyrgyz people. Public diplomacy efforts promote a positive understanding of the United States and help build deep and lasting ties between our countries.

If confirmed, it would be my honor to ensure that our mission continues to provide U.S. citizens resident in or visiting the Kyrgyz Republic the highest quality service and utmost protection.

Mr. Chairman, one of the great privileges of my career has been the opportunity to help lead teams of Americans serving at our embassies overseas that are dedicated to the advancement of U.S. interests. If confirmed, I would do my best to ensure the safety, security, and well-being of my colleagues and their family members who serve at our Embassy. I would maintain the highest standards of ethical conduct and moral values for our mission, including ensuring that the principles of nondiscrimination and respect for diversity are respected by all in our mission.

If confirmed, I would always be available to this committee, its members, and staff, to discuss and work together in pursuit of U.S. national interests in the Kyrgyz Republic.

Mr. Chairman, I thank you for this opportunity to appear before you and the other members of the subcommittee and look forward to your questions. Thank you.

Senator RISCH. Thank you very much.

We are now going to have a series of questions. I am sorry. I did not mean to pass you up, Mr. Keshap. Your turn. I apologize.

STATEMENT OF ATUL KESHAP, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE DEMOCRATIC SOCIALIST REPUBLIC OF SRI LANKA AND TO THE REPUBLIC OF THE MALDIVES

Mr. KESHAP. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Murphy, Senator Shaheen.

It is, indeed, an honor to appear before you today as the President's nominee to serve as U.S. Ambassador to Sri Lanka and to the Maldives. I am grateful to President Obama for his trust and confidence in nominating me and to Secretary Kerry and my State Department colleagues, particularly Assistant Secretary Nisha Biswal, for their support.

Permit me to begin, Mr. Chair, by thanking my wife, Karen Young Keshap, who is also a Foreign Service officer, for her love and support throughout the two decades we have served our country and for raising our four wonderful children, Carolyn, Emily, James, and Charlotte, who are here today.

I am honored to be here as well with my respected mother, Zoe Antoinette Calvert, who served in the U.S. Foreign Service in the 1950s and 1960s in our Embassies in India and the United Kingdom. I also pay tribute to my late father, Dr. Keshap Chander Sen, an immigrant to this country from India, who served the United Nations as a development economist.

Mr. Chairman, due to my father's U.N. service, my early years were spent at schools overseas, where the children of American diplomats were my earliest friends. My parents' service and my upbringing instilled in me a firm dedication and commitment to American values and led me to a career in the Foreign Service.

Mr. Chairman, if confirmed, my top priorities will be to ensure the safety and security of American citizens and to advance the interests and values of the United States and the American people.

In Sri Lanka, our primary interest is to help the people of that island succeed as a prosperous, unified, reconciled, peaceful, and democratic nation.

At the beginning of this year, the people of South Asia's oldest democracy courageously chose a new path of hope and renewal. Since January, Sri Lanka has made progress on challenging issues from fighting corruption and media censorship to beginning the long process of healing after decades of war.

We want to help the Sri Lankan people strengthen democracy, civil society, and human rights, including media freedom and freedom of religion. We want to help build a lasting peace and fellowship among Sri Lanka's ethnic and religious communities, including credible justice, accountability, and reconciliation that can facilitate closure for those who suffered and lost loved ones during the war. It is important to get this right, and the U.N. and the international community can lend useful insight to the efforts of the Sri Lankan people.

Economically, the United States is Sri Lanka's largest export market. While our trade volume is currently relatively low, I believe there is great potential to expand our partnership.

In the security realm, our de-mining efforts have helped farmers return to once war-ravaged land. There is also room for closer cooperation on disaster response and maritime security. Sri Lanka is a regional leader in the fight against cybercrime, a contributor to U.N. peacekeeping operations, and is focused on disrupting drug trafficking and fighting maritime piracy. As we look to advance our interests across the Indo-Pacific, Sri Lanka can be a critical partner.

I will now turn to the Maldives where a young and dynamic populace is on the front lines of climate change. This island nation also faces challenges with youth unemployment, rising extremism, and social unrest. We are worried, however, about the current state of rule of law, due process, and human rights. All citizens should be allowed to exercise their human rights and fundamental freedoms.

We must remain engaged, however, on several important mutual interests, including countering violent extremism, reducing the impact of climate change, and as with Sri Lanka, ensuring security in the Indian Ocean. We want a better relationship with Maldives so that we can deepen that cooperation. And we want to help it return to the democratic path on which it courageously embarked a few years ago and look forward to strengthening our relationship when that happens.

Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Murphy, Senator Shaheen, the democratic progress, economic growth, and security of Sri Lanka and Maldives affect not just their own countries, but the broader Indo-Pacific region. If confirmed, I will consult closely with this committee and others in Congress to advance U.S. values and interests.

Thank you very much for your consideration of my nomination. I look forward to your questions.

I will now turn to Maldives, where a young and dynamic populace is on the front lines of climate change. This island nation also faces challenges with youth unemployment, rising extremism, and social unrest. We are worried, however, about the current state of rule of law, due process, and human rights. All citizens should be allowed to exercise their human rights and fundamental freedoms.

We must remain engaged, however, on several important mutual interests, including countering violent extremism, reducing the impact of climate change, and, as with Sri Lanka, ensuring security in the Indian Ocean. We want a better relationship with Maldives, so that we can deepen cooperation. And we want to help it return to the democratic path on which it courageously embarked a few years ago, and look forward to strengthening our relationship when that happens.

Mr. Chairman, the democratic progress, economic growth, and security of Sri Lanka and Maldives affect not just their own countries, but the broader Indo-Pacific region. If confirmed, I will consult closely with this committee and others in Congress to advance U.S. values and interests.

Thank you for your consideration of my nomination. I look forward to your questions.

Senator RISCH. Thank you very much.

Now we will go through a round of questions from each of us. Since I tried to short you, Mr. Keshap, I will start there.

Your description of what has happened recently in Sri Lanka with the election of the new President certainly reflects, I think, all of our hopes and our good wishes for the people of that country.

I hear your description of it. What is happening today? Is that movement increasing? Is it decreasing? Has it leveled off? Where are we today as far as the movement from the January election?

Mr. KESHAP. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I take great heart and confidence in the significant desire of the people of Sri Lanka to embark upon a new path in their country. The election of January 8 reflected a broad-based decision by the people of Sri Lanka to improve relations with the international community, to strengthen democracy and human rights, to reinforce civil society, and to really put Sri Lanka on a path toward a process of reconciliation that can yield a unified peaceful country. If confirmed, Mr. Chairman, I would work very hard toward helping the people of Sri Lanka to achieve that vision. Secretary Kerry was in Sri Lanka on May 2, and he spoke very eloquently about the United States desire to help the Sri Lankan people with this.

Obviously, the politics in any democracy are going to be robust and at times messy. There is a lot that needs to be worked out. There are some significant issues that have stemmed from three decades of conflict and post-conflict period. But I think that the United States can be a good friend to the efforts and the vision of the people of Sri Lanka and really contribute to the achievement of that vision. And if confirmed, I look forward to adding my energy to that.

Senator RISCH. We appreciate that.

Regarding the Maldives, you made brief reference to the fact that there is this growing extremism in the country. Recent media reports indicate that about 200 of the young people there are radicals who have left and gone to fight with ISIS. For a small country like that, 200 is a pretty substantial number, particularly in light of the fact that if that is what it is, it is usually underreported. So it is probably higher than that.

What are your thoughts on that?

Mr. KESHAP. Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of concern. And we have an ongoing conversation with the Maldives about this issue and others.

From my perspective, I think that what we want to do is try to encourage the people of Maldives and the Government of Maldives to ensure greater freedoms and democracy for their people. That is the key to ensuring stability, to attracting quality investment, to ensuring economic growth, to giving people opportunity, and hopefully also to countering violent extremism. This is an issue that is very much on the radar, and I appreciate your perspectives on this as well. And if confirmed, I would work very hard with the Government of the Maldives and with partners in the United States who work on countering violent extremism to address this issue.

Senator RISCH. Thank you very much. Appreciate that.

Ms. Teplitz, we both made reference in our previous comments to the donor coordination. Tell me a little bit about your thoughts in a little more detail how you plan to attack that.

Ms. TEPLITZ. Thank you, Senator.

I think the donor coordination issue is actually one of the most critical for the success of our programs and assistance to the Nepalese people in this recovery phase. My colleague, Ambassador Bodde, has been leading the donor coordination effort in Kathmandu, and if confirmed, that is something that I intend to do as well. And I think it is essential for the United States to be in front of that effort, both with bilateral donors and multilateral donors, to ensure that assistance is well targeted, not duplicative, and well aligned with the needs of the people of Nepal.

Senator RISCH. Have you found that the people of Nepal are open to the U.S. assistance in that regard as far as donor coordination is concerned?

Ms. TEPLITZ. Sir, my understanding through consultations is that we have a very excellent relationship with the government, with other actors, civil society, nongovernmental organizations. We have had a very productive relationship there, and I see no reason why that would change and look forward, in fact, if confirmed, to engaging in a dialogue with an array of people to best serve the people of Nepal.

Senator RISCH. Thank you. Appreciate that.

Ms. Gwaltney, the country you are going to is an interesting country. And of course, they have the tremendous influence of Russia because of the years that they spent there under their thumb.

Tell me a little bit. The fact that we have withdrawn from the Manas Air Base and the fact that the Chinese are attempting to increase their influence there—what are your thoughts on our prospects for hanging onto our ability to exert hopefully some U.S. influence there?

Ms. GWALTNEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I agree with your assessment that the Kyrgyz Republic is located at the intersection of many challenges.

First, I would like to state that we are grateful to the Kyrgyz people for the Manas transit center and for the support that they provided to the ISAF forces in Afghanistan. It was never intended to be a permanent facility, and we cooperated very closely with the Kyrgyz Government for an orderly transition to that facility.

More broadly, Senator, to your question about regional influence of Russia and China, for the most part Chinese influence is economic. China is Kyrgyzstan's largest trading partner, and it has made clear that it has an interest in expanding trade and expanding linkages throughout the region. There may be some complementarities between the Chinese view and our view on the importance of increasing economic linkages among the countries of Central Asia and between the countries of Central Asia and other regions.

With regard to Russia, it is true that the Kyrgyz Republic and Russia have a shared history. They have a number of economic linkages. But as recent as the April bilateral consultations that we had with the Kyrgyz Government here in Washington, the Kyrgyz made clear to us their interest in having a strong and productive relationship with us. We think it is very important that Kyrgyzstan have the space to make its own decisions about its political autonomy, about its economic linkages, about the future of the country. We do not think that it is appropriate for any country to impose a zero sum approach on the Kyrgyz. We think the Kyrgyz should have the right to make decisions for themselves. And if confirmed, Senator, I intend to work very hard to deepen and expand our cooperation with the Kyrgyz Republic.

Senator RISCH. Thank you.

Finally, Mr. Hale, tell me a little bit about the relationship between the Special Rep for Afghanistan and Pakistan and the Assistant for South and Central Asia and yourself. How do the three of you work as far as that country is concerned? We know the complexity of it, and as I said, those of us who met with the Members of Parliament here in April were impressed with their stated purposes. But tell me how the three of you work in that regard?

Ambassador HALE. Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I have, obviously, just begun my consultations. I am still serving at the embassy in Beirut. But if confirmed, I look forward to a very close working relationship with both the Assistant Secretary for South and Central Asia and the Special Representative.

I myself served as a special envoy. So I can stress from firsthand experience the importance that there be very much a whole-of-government approach to any problem that a special envoy is focused on. A special envoy representative brings a higher level of focus and energy to a particular issue, but success very much depends upon a cooperative relationship with all of the entities in the government, including the Assistant Secretary, for watching the bilateral relationships and the geopolitical and strategic picture in the region.

As Ambassador to Pakistan, if confirmed, I would report to the Special Representative and to the Secretary of State ultimately, but I expect very close integration with the Bureau.

Senator RISCH. Thank you very much. I appreciate that.

Senator Murphy.

Senator MURPHY. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Welcome to all of you. I am sorry that I missed the very beginning of your opening remarks.

Ambassador Hale, thank you for your service after very difficult and tumultuous service in Beirut. I am glad that you are going to get a few years off in Islamabad. I do not know how you managed that, but we are grateful that you accepted the appointment.

We are having a debate here about what constitutes our national security budget. Right now, there is a proposal that the Senate and the House exceed the budget caps for the Defense Department, but that we do not exceed the caps for other spending that many of us would consider to be instrumental to national security. On that list would be our foreign assistance programs.

One of the most important jobs you are going to have is to oversee the implementation of the Kerry-Lugar-Berman act. Can you give us your understanding as to the update of its implementation? I know a little bit of a rocky start in terms of getting the money to the right partners on the ground. But how important is that program, is that funding stream to our ability to influence events on the ground inside Pakistan today?

Ambassador HALE. Well, I think it has proven to be critically important. Obviously, our primary goal is to enhance Pakistan's cooperation with us in the counterterrorism field. But I think we have all learned over time that simply relying and focusing on a traditional military-to-military assistance approach is not going to get the full results that we require. Pakistan needs to have stability. It needs to have a government that is addressing the needs of its people. It needs to ensure that the citizenry can turn to the traditional leaders for energy, for education, for all of the things that countries expect to receive from their state. This is a challenge in Pakistan. It is a poor country. It is an emerging democracy.

But the resources that the Kerry-Lugar-Berman process has brought to Pakistan I think have shown results already. They are focused in several key areas. I mentioned energy, but also education, economic growth, health. And a very important category is stabilization so that when Pakistan is clearing out certain areas, like they are today in North Waziristan, of insurgents, that there is an ability and resources to rush in in that golden hour with the kind of services that citizens expect.

Also, I think there is an important point to bear in mind. This relationship serves best our two sides when it is predictable, when the Pakistanis and the Americans who are looking at this relationship can see for years out what the expectations are, what the deliveries will be. And I think for Pakistan to sustain what we feel they must for their interests and ours in terms of security cooperation, it is critical that we be helping them in these developmental fields as well.

Senator MURPHY. We watched video and reports yesterday of Taliban attacks on the Parliament building in Kabul. Very disturbing to watch. There are other advancements that the Taliban has made, taking control of several towns in the north and in the west. And yet, there are also reports of the facilitation of a dialogue between the Taliban and the Afghan Government.

So let me ask a specific question. What is your understanding today of the disposition of ISI with respect to its coordination with some of these elements within Afghanistan? I know we have made a lot of progress there and there were reports of commitments made in Secretary Kerry's last bilateral meetings with respect to the Haqqani network I know separate and aside from some of the issues surrounding the Taliban. But as the situation seems to get more unstable inside Afghanistan, are the Pakistanis able to help us try to address some of those security concerns inside Afghanistan?

Ambassador HALE. Well, Senator, this is a crucial area. It will be one that I will be very much focused on if I am confirmed.

I do think that there has been progress. We have seen, I think, a change in direction by the Pakistani leadership itself. There are opportunities posed by the election of President Ghani in Afghanistan, the emergence of new leaders in Pakistan. And they are talking and beginning to coordinate a strategy.

In May of this year, we saw that Prime Minister Sharif and President Ghani met, and they pledged joint efforts to crack down on the very groups that you have mentioned based in each state's territory. And they are talking about coordinate operations that will be undertaken to basically eliminate these safe havens along the border area.

Obviously, words are one thing. What we need to see beyond these commitments, important as they are, is actual action on the ground and effective steps to be taken. And I think that that is something we will be, obviously, pressing for, in addition to targeting the militant groups, pushing them and pressurizing them into the political reconciliation process that ultimately is the best means for stabilizing Afghanistan.

Senator MURPHY. To Ms. Teplitz and Mr. Keshap, the same question. You are going to be in countries that have to balance themselves between two great powers, between China and India. Could you just speak to what the U.S. interests are with respect to which way those two countries lean or attack? Why would we care about the direction of either of those countries is having in terms of trying to manage their alliances with those two countries? Mr. Keshap first and then Ms. Teplitz.

Mr. KESHAP. Sure. Thank you, Senator Murphy.

I think the overarching U.S. goal is to try to help the Sri Lankan people strengthen their democracy to the greatest extent possible. By doing that and by fostering the real culture of accountability and meaningful reconciliation for the past, it can lay the foundations for a really prosperous and unified democracy going forward that can be a real platform for stability not only in its region, in the Indian Ocean region, but across the Indo-Pacific.

I do believe that America's most enduring partnerships are with democracies, and so if confirmed, I would very much want to direct my energies and efforts and those of my team toward intensifying the U.S. bilateral relationship in a way that is helpful and relevant to the people——

Senator MURPHY. So you are saying let us just focus on the quality of democracy, or is that a way of saying we should be agnostic as to the question of their balance of allegiance between China and India?

Mr. KESHAP. Senator, I think the issue here is to make sure that Sri Lanka can be a robust and contributing partner to security in the Indian Ocean. And in that regard, they obviously will need to make their own choices, but I do feel that the United States should always be the preferred partner in advancing democratic values, rules-based order, transparent norms, and peaceful settlement of disputes. And I do think we can work in concert with democracies in advancing those strategic goals.

Senator MURPHY. Ms. Teplitz.

Ms. TEPLITZ. Thank you, Senator.

And while I echo many of the sentiments of my colleague here about the situation with Nepal, I think the U.S. interests are for a prosperous and stable South Asia. Nepal is a part of and a partner in achieving that. It does have to balance its two neighbors, China and India, as you have pointed out. And I think our role in that is ensuring at this stage that there are positive and coordinated contributions to the earthquake recovery effort. This actually gives us an opportunity to work very closely not only with the Government of Nepal, with whom we have a very strong relationship, but also with these neighbors to have a very productive outcome and what happens on the ground in Kathmandu is going to be crucial in contributing toward a positive outcome. And if confirmed, I definitely plan to make this careful balance a priority.

Senator MURPHY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator RISCH. Thank you. I have a hard stop and I have to go to another meeting. But I wanted to give Senator Shaheen a chance to ask questions and also, Senator Murphy, if you have any more questions. If not, if you would close the meeting for me when we are done.

The record will remain open until close of business on Thursday for questions. So we will put that into the record.

With that, Senator Murphy, I am going to turn this over to you and Senator Shaheen for questions.

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you all for your willingness to continue to serve. For many of you, you have served for many years, and we very much appreciate that.

I want to pick up, Ambassador Hale, where Senator Murphy left off in terms of the renewed efforts to improve negotiations with Afghanistan and Pakistan and the possibility that that might help with moving the dialogue with the Taliban and hopefully moving towards peace. Can you talk a little bit about what your assessment is of whether they are making progress and whether you see the potential and what the United States can do to help with that effort?

Ambassador HALE. I think it is at an early stage, frankly, to make sweeping judgments, but it does appear that they are on the right path. President Ghani's commitment is very clear. He is staking a lot on this. It is going to require cooperation from Pakistan, and I think, again, Prime Minister Sharif has made the right commitments, said the right words. It has been followed up by travel by General Rahil, the military chief of staff, and by intelligence officers as well.

There has to be actually, as I said earlier, actions that follow up on these commitments, and so we will be judging that. Will there be actions against the safe havens? Will they be cutting off the terrorist financing links? Will they be really putting their influence behind the effort to do what you just said, to encourage meaningful participation in the Afghan-led reconciliation process?

We have talked about this for a while. I think that there is a new opportunity here and a new atmosphere because these are new leaders who are doing this. And I think that the fact that Pakistan itself has suffered so greatly from terrorist attacks, most recently the tragedy in Peshawar, also the Karachi airport attack, that may have contributed to the shift and understanding that Pakistan's national security interests really are at stake here and that the stability and the security and building a democracy in Afghanistan is every bit as important to the people of Pakistan as it is to those in Afghanistan.

All I can say, Senator, is that if confirmed, my job will be primarily to focus on this endeavor, given the stakes for the United States here, and I will put my full effort behind that.

Senator SHAHEEN. And do you see, as Prime Minister Sharif has taken over, any progress on the effort to be more inclusive in Pakistan to reduce what we would call hate crimes in the United States against people who are against non-Muslims?

Ambassador HALE. I believe I will have to get out there myself, if I am confirmed, and make a judgment and come back to you and your staff. But there is a long way to go. So I hope democracy will be more inclined to be respectful of minorities and of its people. I do not know for sure, but you look at the record, and there is, as I said, a tremendous task ahead. Religious minorities, women, other vulnerable segments of that society definitely need protection, and the United States needs to stand up, speak loudly about that, but also work behind the scenes with quiet diplomacy so that Pakistan's elected leaders understand what is at stake here and also to use the tools in our assistance program, which Congress has been so generous in providing so that NGOs and other groups are able to provide all kinds of programs, can help not just with protections but to advance recognition of the importance of the rights of minorities.

Senator SHAHEEN. I visited in Pakistan several years ago right after they had gone into the Swat Valley and were responding to terrorist attacks there and was very impressed with the effort of the government and the military to take on—really to fight against their own citizens to address the terrorism threat. But recent reports have suggested that those efforts have been less successful than I certainly would have hoped based on that effort several years ago. And I wonder if you have any reports on the commitment there and the extent to which the military has been able to take on some of these terrorist elements.

Ambassador HALE. Well, again, I think it is important to remember the context, which is that Pakistanis themselves are suffering greatly from the attacks and threats posed by these groups. That is point one.

Point two. I think any rational analyst of Pakistan and the situation there would recognize that tolerating one group of extremists or insurgents on your soil while just targeting another group is not going to create a stable environment at all. So that is, I think, a very important lesson for any leader in that region to understand.

Third, I think it is important to remember where the successes have been. Pakistan's military leadership and its soldiers have done admirable work in countering the al-Qaeda threat and doing maximum effort to eliminate that. Always gaps, but there have been arrests. There have been some substantial activities. Countering IED's is another area where they export the manufacture and the export of these IED's into Afghanistan. Wrapping that up, again not completed, but substantial efforts have been invested in that.

Working on these areas of insurgents and militants is the next big project, and obviously, there has been progress. I do not have the firsthand experience that you have, Senator, in observing this. I am concerned by your observation and I will want to look into that myself when I get out there. But right now, the campaign in North Waziristan has produced results. It has cleared out substantial areas. It is soaking up safe havens. It is critically important that other groups not come in now and exploit those areas and that the state remain present not just with the constabulary in the army but, as I said earlier in response to a question, that the whole of government is rushing in there and providing the services and the economy that any Pakistani should expect of their government.

Thank you.

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MURPHY [presiding]. Thank you, Senator.

I just have two more questions.

Ambassador Hale, there are different reports about the effectiveness of ISIS in establishing a foothold within Pakistan. Many suggest that there is a lot of factors that are going to inhibit their ability to grow more than a handful of activists there.

What is your understanding heading into Islamabad as to how much time you might be spending on this question of ISIS presence inside Pakistan?

Ambassador HALE. Well, again, I will need to get there, if I am confirmed, to judge for myself. But the briefings I have had suggest that so far the ISIS threat is relatively small and contained. But having served, as I have, so many years in the Levant, complacency is the last thing I am taking with me to Pakistan on this front. ISIS has shown that it is potent and it can exploit areas that are ungoverned quite rapidly, and we all know there are ungoverned spaces in Pakistan. So while there may be cultural and other factors that have reduced ISIS's ability at least initially to make inroads, I think we have to be very vigilant about that and make sure that the Pakistani leadership knows, as I think those in the Levant do, that moderate Muslim leaders themselves are the first targets of this phenomenon and therefore have an extra responsibility to preempt them.

Senator MURPHY. Ms. Gwaltney, should we care about the Kyrgyz Republic's joining the Eurasian Union? Is this an economic body that presents any kind of real threat to the United States without membership on the western edge of Russia? Is this something that you think you are going to be spending time on, or should we just let it lie and not worry too much about it?

Ms. GWALTNEY. Thank you, Senator, for your question.

The Kyrgyz Republic is poised to join the Eurasian Economic Union in the upcoming weeks. And one thing that we have made very clear is, of course, first and foremost, our support for free trade, and secondly, equally importantly, is the fact that as a member of the WTO—and the Kyrgyz Republic was the first former Soviet Republic to join the WTO in 1998—but that in its accession to the Eurasian Economic Union, the Kyrgyz Republic needs to be mindful and to uphold its obligations under the WTO.

I think it is early days, sir, to be able to calibrate exactly what the economic impact of accession to this organization will be, but if confirmed, it is certainly something that I will pay a great deal of attention to not only because of Kyrgyzstan's WTO commitments but because I am committed to the promotion of American exports and support for American business. And we will want to keep that space open.

Senator MURPHY. Well, thank you to you all. I am tempted to ask my staff to do some quick research on what parliamentary maneuvers I can use now that I am in charge of the subcommittee. [Laughter.]

But instead, I will just note that the record does stand open. So if you do get followup questions from members of the subcommittee who are not here, I hope you will turn them around quickly.

And with that, using bottled water, this hearing is now adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 12:15 a.m., the hearing was adjourned.]

ADDITIONAL MATERIAL SUBMITTED FOR THE RECORD

RESPONSES OF GLYN TOWNSEND DAVIES, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE KINGDOM OF THAILAND, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE DAVIES'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR RUBIO

Question. If the Thai junta by the start of 2016 fails to remove restrictions on freedom of speech and assembly, and schedule elections, what steps do you think are appropriate to increase pressure on General Prayuth? Do you think it's appropriate to cancel the military exercises known as Cobra Gold? Why not? If Cobra Gold was to continue in 2016, do you agree that it should be kept at a scaled-back level, or scaled back even further?

Answer. Following the coup, we suspended, as required by law, $4.7 million in military assistance funds (FMF, IMET, PKO) until a democratically elected civilian government takes office. We have also cancelled some high-level engagements, military exercises, and training programs with the military and police. We continue to thoroughly review all our engagements with Thailand. If confirmed, I will closely monitor political developments and continue actively to urge the military government to remove restrictions on civil liberties and return Thailand to democratic governance as soon as possible. I will also encourage the military government to make the political reform process as inclusive as possible to reflect the broad diversity of views within the country.

The United States decided to proceed with Cobra Gold 2015 because of the importance of the annual, multilateral exercise in fulfilling the U.S. commitment to regional stability. Bringing together nearly 30 nations, Cobra Gold is the largest such exercise in Asia and has for 30 years been an integral part of the U.S. commitment to strengthen our security engagement in the region. Cancelling the exercise would make it more challenging to sustain our military's interoperability with regional allies and partners.

Cobra Gold 2015 was significantly refocused and scaled down in light of the Thai military's ouster of the civilian government, with an increased focus on humanitarian assistance and disaster relief. We have decided to proceed with planning for Cobra Gold 2016 due to its importance in expanding regional cooperation and capacity building. As in 2015, the exercise will be scaled down and focus on building regional cooperation on humanitarian assistance and disaster relief.

If confirmed, I will evaluate the scale and focus of the exercise and seek necessary adjustments in light of political developments in Thailand.

Question. Will you continue to use public diplomacy, as the State Department has since the May 2014 coup, to raise concerns about censorship and arrests of Thai citizens for exercising their rights to free speech and assembly?

Answer. Yes. If confirmed, I will continue to urge Thailand, both publicly and privately, to remove undue restrictions on civil liberties, including limits on fundamental freedoms of expression and peaceful assembly. My priority will be to urge Thailand to institute a genuinely inclusive reform process that reflects the broad diversity of views within the country. As part of this effort, I will continue to use all tools at our disposal, including public diplomacy and diplomatic engagement, to encourage Thailand to lift restrictions on civil liberties and swiftly return to a democratically elected civilian government that respects human rights.

Question. Thailand was designated a Tier 3 country for trafficking in persons in the State Department's 2014 Trafficking in Persons Report. What new ideas do you have for motivating the Thai Government to get serious about cracking down on human trafficking—not just with isolated raids and written action plans, but serious, sustained, and comprehensive efforts to clamp down on trafficking networks—not just sex trafficking but trafficking of migrant labor and refugees from Burma?

Answer. If confirmed, my arrival as the new Ambassador will provide a fresh opportunity for the United States to highlight both publicly and privately our principled stance against human trafficking. Thailand's Tier 3 ranking in 2014 reflected the shortcomings in the Thai Government's efforts to address the country's vast human trafficking problem. In the 2014 TIP Report, we outlined a series of recommendations for the Thai Government to improve its antitrafficking response.

If confirmed, I will encourage Thailand to conduct thorough investigations of reports of trafficking, including in cases with alleged government complicity, and to bring trafficking offenders to justice. I will also continue to advocate for proactive government efforts to identify and protect victims, and support international and civil society organizations that play a role in identifying and assisting victims and promoting the rights of migrant workers.

The Department's TIP Office currently provides approximately $1 million in funding for three projects in Thailand that are focused on trafficking prevention, protection for victims, raising awareness, promoting access to justice for victims, and increasing investigations and prosecutions of traffickers. Additional project funding for FY15 is currently under consideration.

We will continue to provide specific technical assistance requested by the Thai Government related to trafficking investigations and prosecutions as well as general support for building the capacity of their law enforcement and rule of law institutions. We welcome the efforts made by Thailand to stand up a Human Trafficking in Persons Division in the criminal courts system that will focus exclusively on human trafficking cases. We also welcome reports that the Royal Thai Police has issued over 100 arrest warrants related to migrant smuggling and abuses against migrants—which may include human trafficking, including the warrant for a three-star Army official.

If confirmed, I will continue to encourage Thailand to take robust action to combat human trafficking and eliminate forced labor.

Question. What role do you see for the private sector—for U.S. companies and Thai companies—in fighting the use of forced labor in Thailand?

Answer. The private sector has a key role to play in combating the use of forced labor in Thailand. A significant proportion of trafficking victims in Thailand are found in the seafood industry. For several years, the international community has expressed its concern over the forced labor of foreign migrants in the Thai fishing and onland seafood industries. The United States continues to call on the Thai Government to take significantly greater steps to protect foreign migrants in the fishing and shrimp industries and to punish those who are enslaving foreign workers.

Thailand is the world's third-largest seafood exporter and its products are sold at major retailers around the world. As a result, U.S. and Thai retailers have significant economic influence over the Thai seafood industry and play a vital role in ensuring that supply chains are free from the use of forced labor.

Recently, several large U.S. retailers have engaged major Thai seafood producers to address issues in their supply chain in an effort to combat human trafficking in Thailand's seafood sector. If confirmed, I will encourage private companies to comprehensively address forced labor in their supply chains and help bring together various stakeholders to develop concrete action plans to address this important issue.

RESPONSES OF WILLIAM A. HEIDT, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE KINGDOM OF CAMBODIA, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE HEIDT'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR RUBIO

Question. If you are confirmed, the most important event that is going to take place during your tenure is the 2018 elections. Are you prepared to be as outspoken as your predecessor, Bill Todd, in publicly criticizing human rights abuses and restrictions on freedom of speech and assembly, and calling out politically motivated misuses of power for what they are? Do you agree that public diplomacy—and outspoken defense of human rights principles—is an important and ultimately essential diplomatic tool in the Cambodia context?

Answer. The 2018 elections will certainly be an important event for Cambodia and represents an opportunity for it to take another step forward toward an enduring and principled democracy. If confirmed, I will advocate both publically and privately for the Cambodian Government to stage free and fair elections, including a free election campaign period in which human rights and the freedoms of speech and assembly are respected. I will also urge and offer assistance to the government to address the irregularities, including voter registration issues, which marked the last election. Public diplomacy is also an important tool, and we will use it, along with other programs including direct diplomacy with government officials and the opposition, targeted assistance aimed at strengthening Cambodia's democratic institutions and people-to-people programs that impart American values to Cambodians. Ambassador Todd has been a tireless advocate for human rights and democracy in Cambodia. If confirmed, I will continue in that tradition.

Question. Do you agree that the 1991 Paris Agreements remain binding and that the United States, as a signatory, continues to have specific obligations to promote democracy and human rights in Cambodia, pursuant to the agreement's terms?

Answer. The United States, both as a signatory to the 1991 Paris Peace Accords and as a matter of principle, places democracy and human rights promotion as one of our top foreign policy goals in Cambodia. If confirmed, I will continue to support the wide variety of programs that help build a stronger civil society, will continue to emphasize the importance of democracy and human rights with both the government and opposition, and will continue to promote educational and cultural exchanges which expose young Cambodians to American values.

Question. The Cambodian Parliament, in the control of Prime Minister Hun Sen, is currently considering a troublingly restrictive new law governing nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). If that law passes in current form, will you work to ensure that the government does not abuse or misuse it to harass or persecute NGOs for their legitimate operations, including reporting and advocacy on human rights issues?

Answer. We are very concerned about the draft NGO law. We have spoken out publicly about the law on a number of occasions and have questioned the need for such a far-reaching law. Our Embassy in Phnom Penh continues to lobby the Cambodian Government to pursue full consultations with civil society as the draft law is debated in the National Assembly. If the law passes in its current form, if confirmed, I would closely monitor the treatment of all NGOs, international and domestic, to ensure that the new law is not used to suppress their rights of freedom of association, assembly, and speech. As appropriate, we will also share best practices from the U.S. and other countries on regulating the NGO sector in a way that facilitates the empowerment of civil society while addressing any concerns the government may have about terrorism or coordination between NGOs and the government. Any NGO law should have a light touch and require minimal governmental oversight so that civil society can flourish and play its essential role in a transparent, rights-respecting democracy.

RESPONSES OF DAVID HALE, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE ISLAMIC REPUBLIC OF PAKISTAN, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE HALE'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CARDIN

Question. I have ongoing concerns about Lashkar-e-Taiba and the threat that it poses to the region. I hope that we will see some progress in countering this group and progress in holding its members accountable for the 2008 tragedy in Mumbai. How will you specifically increase pressure on the Pakistani Government to take action against LeT and its counterpart organization Jamaat-ud-Dawa?

Answer. I share your concerns regarding Lashkar-e-Taiba (LeT) and believe it is critical that the Mumbai trial move forward and that the Government of Pakistan take steps to dismantle LeT. Pakistan's relations with India will continue to be challenged as long as LeT continues to retain any operational capacity. I understand that this issue has been raised specifically by senior officials in this administration, and if confirmed, I absolutely plan to continue our efforts to engage the Pakistani Government.

Question. Several international NGOs have faced challenges in legally registering in Pakistan. Over the past week, Save the Children has been ordered to leave, only to have that order rescinded. This uncertainty has made it very difficult for these organizations to work in what is already a challenging environment. This is unacceptable. Pakistan needs to understand that undue pressure on these organizations and civil society more broadly will have significant implications for our bilateral relationship. How will you protect the interests of U.S.-funded NGOs in Pakistan?

Answer. The work of international and local NGOs to carry out their development objectives is critical to achieving Pakistan's and our own goals that we have agreed upon with the Government of Pakistan. We respect the Government of Pakistan's need for transparency from INGOs involving their activities within the country. We also agree INGOs must operate within a relevant legal and regulatory framework. However, if confirmed, I will continue to urge the Government of Pakistan to establish a transparent and credible process that will allow INGOs, including Save the Children, to work in Pakistan legally.

Question. What are the most important actions you have taken in your career to date to promote human rights and democracy? What is the impact of your actions? Why were your actions significant?

Answer. During my assignments as Ambassador to Jordan and Lebanon, I took specific steps to promote democratic institutions, including through promoting political reforms and elections in Jordan with U.S. Government programming, and by taking active steps to strengthen democratic institutions and civil society in both countries.

Question. What are the most pressing human rights issues in Pakistan? What are the most important steps you expect to take—if confirmed—to promote human rights and democracy in Pakistan? What do you hope to accomplish through these actions?

Answer. As noted in our previously published Human Rights Reports, the most serious human rights problems in Pakistan remain attacks on religious minorities, extrajudicial killings, disappearances, torture, poor implementation and enforcement of laws, gender-based violence, violence against journalists and media organizations, governmental practices and laws which limit freedom of religion (particularly for religious minorities), a weak criminal justice system, widespread forced and exploitative child labor, and human trafficking. I believe that our ongoing rule of law programming in Pakistan has the potential to strengthen the capacity of Pakistani police, prosecutors, and courts—as well as strengthen their relationships with civil society—and is one of the most effective tools we have to promote and protect basic human rights and counter attacks on all Pakistani citizens, including minorities. Our democracy and human rights programming is also very important, especially our support to Pakistani elections and for improving journalist standards and increasing media safety. If confirmed, I plan to advocate for these programs and to engage directly with Pakistani officials on issues of rule of law, democracy, and human rights.

Question. If confirmed, what are the potential obstacles to addressing the specific human rights issues you have identified in your previous response? What challenges will you face in Pakistan in advancing human rights and democracy in general?

Answer. I will assess the situation on the ground in Pakistan once I arrive, but I understand that the security environment is a major challenge to our access to many areas of the country. Moreover, I understand it often takes time to receive approval for some of our programs. If confirmed, I plan to engage directly and consistently with the Government of Pakistan to ensure that we can implement important rule of law, democracy, and human rights programming.

Question. Are you committed to meeting with human rights and other nongovernmental organizations in the U.S. and with local human rights NGOs in Pakistan?

Answer. If confirmed, I look forward to regularly meeting with human rights and other nongovernmental organizations in the U.S. and with local human rights NGOs in Pakistan.

Question. If confirmed, please describe steps that you will take to enhance effective implementation of Section 620M of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, commonly known as the Leahy amendment, within the Embassy as well as steps you would take to accomplish the goal of the law, namely, helping the Government of Pakistan end impunity for human rights violations by security forces.

Answer. If confirmed, I will be personally involved in ensuring robust Leahy vetting occurs, as I have as Ambassador in Lebanon and Jordan. Furthermore, I plan to ensure that the country team, especially officers from the Departments of State and Defense, continue their active engagement in the Leahy vetting process, ensuring that units which have committed gross violations of human rights do not benefit from U.S. assistance and also helping the Government of Pakistan address and prevent human rights violations. Coordination with our colleagues in Washington will also be critical to ensuring the success of our vetting process.

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE HALE'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR RISCH

Question. A lot of policy decisions regarding Pakistan are currently made by the SRAP (Special Representative for Afghanistan and Pakistan), but the one issue you will be most responsible for is crisis management if there is some incident like the Raymond Davis case or the Mumbai attacks. While there are certainly many other scenarios that could occur, how would you handle these situations?

Answer. I will be absolutely focused on ensuring Embassy Islamabad and the constituent posts in Pakistan are fully prepared to manage a crisis, whether related to policy, a terrorist attack, a natural disaster, or other scenarios, as you rightly note are very possible. Recognizing that no two situations are identical, I have had significant crisis management experience in my career, including during my tenure as Ambassador in Jordan and Lebanon. I understand there is close coordination between Embassy Islamabad and SRAP, as well as with other relevant Department of State offices, including Diplomatic Security, the Office of the Under Secretary for Management, and with interagency partners, including the National Security Staff and the Department of Defense. I will prioritize maintaining these relationships as part of a strong, sustained contingency planning program. Above all I would use my relationship with senior Pakistani officials as needed to manage the situation.

If confirmed, I will work assiduously to build upon and strengthen the critical relationships with the Pakistani leadership that the current Ambassador and Country Team have established—and to ensure that the U.S. has the broadest possible set of contacts with senior Pakistani counterparts that could be drawn upon when needed. Finally, I would like to note that as I have stressed throughout my remarks, I believe the best contingency planning with host governments comes through sustained engagement, and increasing cooperation on areas of mutual interest. I believe this is the path our relations with Pakistan are currently on, and I look forward to working to further strengthen that engagement in support of our national interests.

Question. China is increasingly active in Pakistan, more than they have ever been. What do you believe is their goal in the Pakistan and the region? Do you think they will succeed and how would that success affect the U.S. relationship with Pakistan?

Answer. China and Pakistan have long shared close ties. We and China share a concern about Pakistan's stability, and wish to see the elimination of terrorist safe havens and support networks. We also share a desire to see a Pakistan that is economically stable, which will require a resolution to Pakistan's long-term energy crisis and an expansion in Pakistan's regional economic integration with its neighbors, especially India and Afghanistan. The administration believes the best approach is to expand engagement with both China and Pakistan on all issues, and seek to cooperate in areas of common interest. At a basic level, we do not view Pakistan as a theater for zero-sum competition between the United States and China. We believe China's engagement in Pakistan potentially can contribute to peace and stability in Pakistan and the broader region. This would help to achieve U.S. national security objectives in Pakistan, Afghanistan, and the broader region.

Question. What success have we seen come from the Strategic Dialogue beyond formally banning the Haqqani network from Pakistan?

Answer. The Strategic Dialogue provides a comprehensive framework for our engagement with Pakistan, ensuring that the issues of most importance to our two governments are addressed in a significant and sustained manner, by senior officials from each side. There have been a number of notable successes: a greater focus on nuclear security and nonproliferation; progress on countering improvised explosive devices ("C-IED"); close cooperation on counterterrorism objectives and delivery of the hardware needed to achieve those objectives; increased trade, investment opportunities, and reform efforts; improvements in the energy sector; and greater access to educational opportunities.

However, I would note that the most important outcome of the Strategic Dialogue, as relaunched by Secretary Kerry in August 2013, is that it has put the bilateral relationship on a firmer foundation, grounded in our respective interests, and characterized by a more regular, forthright exchange of views—often in private. This progress is carried forward by our daily engagements in Pakistan, involving a robust Country Team representing the full range of U.S. departments and agencies.

Question. Can Pakistan truly grow economically and reduce its dependence on Western aid without a rapprochement with India? How do you assess the potential?

Answer. We absolutely believe that greater regional trade is important for the stability, prosperity, and security of the region. We will continue to encourage India and Pakistan to find ways to increase trade and cross-border connections. However, Pakistan has a significant number of domestic reforms that are required to grow its economy, regardless of its international trade. Many factors, including reform and energy sector investments can help Pakistan grow economically. This is why we have supported PM Nawaz Sharif's economic agenda, the government's engagement with the IMF, and used our assistance funds and our Strategic Dialogue to promote reform. As a result Pakistan is in better macroeconomic health than when it began the IMF program.

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE HALE'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR RUBIO

Question. Pakistan is one of the worst violators of religious freedom in the world, in particular due, to the combination of government persecution through the blasphemy and anti-Ahmadi laws and government inaction by not arresting perpetrators of mob violence or cracking down on militant groups. However, the State Department never has designated Pakistan as a "country of particular concern" for its particularly severe violations of religious freedom.

Answer. Human rights and religious freedom are among our highest objectives worldwide and in Pakistan. If confirmed, I will plan to raise these issues at the highest levels of the Pakistani Government and will use all the tools at my disposal to promote progress in these areas, recognizing that we also have many other critical foreign policy objectives in Pakistan. If I am confirmed, once I am in Pakistan I will make my own assessment of what may be effective and will consult closely with SRAP, DRL, the Secretary, and others—including Congress—on any consideration of a CPC designation.

Question. Sadly, no religious community is immune from violence in Pakistan. Recent months have witnessed an attack on two churches in Lahore, a brazen attack on the busload of Ismaili Muslims in Karachi, ongoing violence against Ahmadi Muslims, and targeted attacks against Shia Muslims. Despite the Pakistani Supreme Court ordering the government to create special protection forces for religious minorities, no such actions have been taken.

♦ What will you do to press the Pakistani Government to better protect religious minorities and crack down on militant groups that target religious communities? How can the U.S. Government provide support toward this effort?

Answer. If confirmed, I plan to raise protection for religious minorities at the highest levels of the Pakistani Government. Our immediate priority should be to identify the obstacles to improving religious freedom conditions in Pakistan and think creatively about ways to work with the Government of Pakistan to change those circumstances for the better. I believe the U.S. Government should continue to consult with the Government of Pakistan on how to prevent further atrocities against religious minorities, including by sharing information about attacks, designating the leaders of the organizations as terrorists both domestically and at the U.N., and assisting with rule of law and investigations training for Pakistani law enforcement officials.

Question. While Pakistan overwhelmingly meets the country of particular concern (CPC) threshold, the U.S. Government can take other steps. For instance, the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom (USCIRF) has recommended that the U.S. Government create a special bilateral engagement with the Pakistan Minorities Commission and religious minorities in Parliament. There are other possibilities for positive engagement, such as training for provincial minority affairs offices.

♦ What actions will you take to positively engage Pakistan on these issues? Would you support a special U.S./Pakistan bilateral engagement around issues of religious tolerance?

Answer. If confirmed, I will look closely at the USCIRF recommendations. Upon initial review, I see no impediment to establishing a deeper dialogue with the Government of Pakistan to explore ways to promote religious freedom and protect religious minorities. The IRF Act gives us several tools to promote religious freedom, CPC designations being only one of them. Additional tools include bilateral and multilateral engagement, denying visas to the United States to foreign government officials who are responsible for severe violations of religious freedom, and implementing programming to promote religious tolerance. The Government of Pakistan has engaged us more vigorously in the aftermath of the attack on the Army Public School in Peshawar, the Government of Pakistan has engaged with us on issues related to countering violent extremism. I believe, given Pakistan's stated recognition of the threat posed to its citizens by those who foment sectarian tension, that there is reason to expect greater cooperation in this critical area.

Question. Pakistan leads the world in jailing people for blasphemy. According to USCIRF, almost 40 people either are on death row or serving life sentences for the "crime" of blasphemy, a statistic unmatched anywhere else in the world. People like Aasia Bibi continue to be jailed, while others are killed by mobs—such as the Christian couple that was lynched to death in November and their bodies were thrown into a brick kiln. Pakistanis brave enough to confront blasphemy risk their lives including Salaman Taseer, Shahbaz Bhatti, and more recently human rights lawyer Rashid Rehman.

- ♦ As Pakistan is considering adding much-needed procedural safeguards to the blasphemy law, how will you work to proactively encourage Pakistan to see that these changes are made? How can you press the Pakistanis to arrest and aggressively prosecute participants in mob violence, as oftentimes they are charged but never prosecuted?

Answer. The Government of Pakistan's consideration of adding procedural safeguards to protect against abuse of the blasphemy law is a positive step, and one that I will support actively in my engagement with senior Pakistani officials, if confirmed. All too often, the blasphemy laws are abused by private citizens with other objectives in mind, such as to gain an advantage in land disputes, or as retribution for other disputes. I understand that as a matter of current policy, we regularly express our concerns to Pakistani authorities about the state of religious freedom in Pakistan. We continue to encourage the Pakistani Government to repeal the blasphemy law, and to hold accountable those who commit acts of violence in the name of religion. The administration urges fair and transparent proceedings where defendants and lawyers can safely argue their cases.

If confirmed, upon my arrival it will be a personal priority in Pakistan to see that more can be done to encourage the change that we seek.

Question. In recent weeks, Pakistan has been taking actions to heavily regulate NGOs operating in their country, including temporarily shutting down Save the Children's offices. The government is considering new NGO law which would require NGOs to operate under the Ministry of Interior.

- ♦ If this law is passed, will you work to ensure that the government does not abuse or misuse it to harass or persecute NGOs for their legitimate operations, including reporting and advocacy on human rights issues?

Answer. The work of international and local NGOs to carry out their development objectives is critical to achieving Pakistan's and our own goals that we have agreed upon with the Government of Pakistan. NGOs must operate within the regulations of the host government. If confirmed, I intend to work with the Government of Pakistan to ensure that NGOs are able to operate legally and effectively.

RESPONSES OF SHEILA GWALTNEY, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE KYRGYZ REPUBLIC, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE GWALTNEY'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR RISCH

Question. U.S. policy has sought to support regional integration as a way to improve economic success. Given the withdrawal of the U.S. from Manas Air Base, the deep relationship with Russia, the growing influence of China in the region, and difficult relations with neighbors, what prospects do you have for U.S. policy in Kyrgyz Republic? What can we realistically accomplish?

Answer. Geographic proximity, economic links, and historical ties give Russia and China strong influence in the region. The Kyrgyz people have long had complex relationships with both of those nations. We fully support the aspirations of the Kyrgyz Republic to pursue a multivector foreign and economic policy, and we do not accept any assertions that the Kyrgyz Republic must choose between the United States and Russia or China.

Since Kyrgyzstan's independence nearly 24 years ago, our bilateral relationship has been based on mutual respect and mutual benefit. The basis of our engagement is to support a sovereign, independent, stable, and secure state that has good relations with its neighbors and is able to provide opportunities for its people. For example, we welcomed the strong support of the Kyrgyz Republic for the CASA-1000 energy project as an example of better regional integration and cooperation. As recently as April bilateral consultations, the Kyrgyz Government has made clear its strong interest in maintaining a cooperative, productive relationship with the United States.

U.S. engagement since 1991 has made an important impact on the Kyrgyz Republic. Our assistance programs have made significant contributions to help build democratic institutions, to promote stability and prosperity in the country, to support educational exchanges, and to enhance opportunities for U.S. businesses through an improved investment climate.

The Kyrgyz Republic has a talented population with half of its citizens under the age of 25. Over 1,000 of these young men and women have traveled to the United States through the Future Leaders Exchange Program, and many more have experienced the people and values of the United States through our public diplomacy programs and through interaction with the over 1,000 Peace Corps Volunteers who have served in the Kyrgyz Republic. If confirmed, my team and I will work energetically to strengthen, deepen, and broaden the relationship between the United States and the Kyrgyz Republic.

Question. While U.S. policy has focused on support for democratic institutions in the country, how do you see the upcoming parliamentary elections proceeding? Will we see active participation from civil society or should we be concerned about undue influence?

Answer. The United States is committed to supporting the Kyrgyz Republic's continued democratic development. While democracy is broader than just elections, they are a critical component. We encourage the Kyrgyz Republic to strengthen its democratic gains by holding free and fair elections in conformity with international standards. The Kyrgyz Republic has held three successful national elections since the 2010 revolution—the constitutional referendum in 2010, the parliamentary elections in 2010, and the Presidential election in 2011. The upcoming 2015 parliamentary election and Presidential elections in 2017 will be key indicators of the country's democratic progress.

The Kyrgyz Republic has a vibrant civil society, whose active participation helps reinforce the country's young democracy. In previous elections, the national NGO Coalition for Democracy and Civil Society played an exceptional role monitoring the voting process. There remain, however, significant administrative capacity challenges in the Kyrgyz Republic's ability to manage elections. If confirmed, I plan to work closely with civil society and the Kyrgyz Government to assist that nation to solidify its democratic institutions.

Question. With the drawdown in Afghanistan what concerns do you have regarding an increase in terrorism and drug trafficking in the country? Are we seeing an actual increase or is the government overstating what is occurring?

Answer. As noted in the Department of State's Country Report on Terrorism, there were no reported terrorist attacks in the Kyrgyz Republic in 2014, although security forces arrested several individuals suspected of affiliation with terrorist organizations and terrorist activities abroad. Drug trafficking routes through Central Asia are a long-standing concern and, if confirmed, I intend to work with the Kyrgyz Government and international partners to increase local capacity and enhance regional cooperation to combat this problem.

Our security cooperation with the Kyrgyz Republic focuses on enhancing border security, strengthening regional counternarcotics efforts, countering terrorism and violent extremism, promoting professional conduct and respect for human rights by security forces, and working toward a stable, secure Afghanistan. We have developed the Central Asia Counternarcotics Initiative (CACI) in coordination with the Drug Enforcement Administration, to intensify efforts against drug trafficking in the region. Expanding our cooperation in this arena not only helps the Kyrgyz Republic deal with security challenges, it helps solidify our diplomatic ties and deepen and broaden our partnerships.

The government of the Kyrgyz Republic is increasingly aware of the threat of terrorism in the region and the dangers of recruitment of Kyrgyz citizens by violent extremist organizations. The Kyrgyz Republic sent a high-level delegation to attend the White House summit on countering violent extremism in February. With respect to Afghanistan, in April 2015, a U.S. interagency Afghanistan Briefing Team traveled to the Kyrgyz Republic to share assessments and explore avenues for better cooperation with top officials in the Kyrgyz Government. The Kyrgyz Government has voiced its support for the current Afghan Government and has embraced the CASA-1000 project that is planned to supply electricity in support of Afghanistan's development.

RESPONSES OF ATUL KESHAP, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE DEMOCRATIC SOCIALIST REPUBLIC OF SRI LANKA AND TO THE REPUBLIC OF MALDIVES, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE KESHAP'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CARDIN

Question. What is the extent of U.S. security cooperation with Sri Lanka? What are the specific conditions under which the U.S. would enhance our security relationship with Sri Lanka? What specific progress on accountability and reconciliation will the U.S. require from the Sri Lankans before moving forward on the security relationship?

Answer. U.S. security assistance for Sri Lanka remains limited by the policies that were in place during the previous government and focuses on four areas key to our national interests: maritime security, disaster response, peacekeeping training, and educational support. Examples include the provision of demining equipment and training to help clear mines remaining after the civil war. For the expenditure of approximately $500,000 in the last year, Sri Lankan students have attended courses including International Law of Military Operations, Gender-Based Violence and Women's Health, Law of Armed Conflict and Human Rights, Legal Aspects of Combating Corruption, and Approaches for the Re-integration of Ex-Combatants.

We can envision benefits to both our countries, and to peace and security in the Indo-Pacific region as a result of a strengthened military relationship contingent upon progress on accountability, human rights, and reconciliation. Future security assistance and programming will be greatly influenced by successful initiatives to credibly hold individuals accountable for human rights violations or violations of international humanitarian law as well as greater institutional reforms. We will continue to vet those security force units that seek U.S. assistance, and consistent with U.S. law and policy, we will not provide assistance to a unit if we have credible information that it committed a gross violation of human rights.

If confirmed, I will continue to urge reforms to ensure the Sri Lanka military functions as a professional and accountable peacetime force, dedicated to human rights, rule of law, and democracy.

Question. What are the obstacles to reaching reconciliation with Tamil communities in Sri Lanka? How might the United States best assist in this process? Do you support the release of the UNHRC on war crimes in Sri Lanka report this year?

Answer. Reconciliation will not happen all at once; it requires time and concrete actions. The current situation in Sri Lanka developed over 30 years of conflict and several difficult post-conflict years. The Sirisena government is working to restore mutual trust and confidence, for the benefit of all Sri Lankans of all ethnicities and religions. For the sake of future peace and prosperity, it is vitally important to get this right.

The Sirisena government has made a public commitment to take credible steps to promote justice, accountability, and reconciliation in relation to human rights abuses and conflict-related crimes. Such processes are never easy, but the United States will continue to support credible efforts to address these important and difficult issues in a way that facilitates reconciliation as well as a durable and lasting peace for the Sri Lankan people.

We support the release of the U.N. investigation's report as part of building a peaceful, prosperous, inclusive Sri Lanka. Our assistance program over the last 5 years has sought to strengthen the participation of Tamil and other minority and marginalized communities. Moving forward, our expanding program would continue those efforts, including through economic empowerment, strengthening civil society, fostering inclusion of diverse religious and community leaders, and helping support the rule of law.

Question. Democratic backsliding in the Maldives is very concerning and is potentially damaging to the U.S.-Maldives bilateral relationship including military to military activities. How will you emphasize the importance of the rule of law in the Maldives? What levers does the United States have to encourage a more democratic course in the country?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to express our government's concern at the lack of appropriate criminal procedures during recent trials of political figures, including reports that the trials fell well short of Maldivian and international standards for due process. We are also concerned about actions that undermine democratic institutions and fundamental freedoms, including freedoms of expression and assembly.

If confirmed, I would work with the government, civil society groups, and international partners to urge the Maldivian Government to uphold its commitments to rule of law, democratic principles, and human rights.

Question. What are the most important actions you have taken in your career to date to promote human rights and democracy? What is the impact of your actions? Why were your actions significant?

Answer. I place the highest emphasis on advancing American values of human rights, religious freedom, and democracy. As human rights officer at our Embassy in Morocco early in my career, I learned how crucial it is to help ensure strong protections for religious and ethnic minorities and NGO and political activists.

In assignments working on South Asia spanning the past decade, I engaged with governments across the region to urge greater protection for women, religious minorities, civil society, human rights defenders, and labor rights activists, and worked to raise awareness of the perniciousness of trafficking in persons.

While progress in these areas can be slow, I am most gratified by efforts undertaken by the United States, including at the United Nations in Geneva, to highlight the need for a credible process of reconciliation in Sri Lanka.

As Office Director for U.N. Human Rights from 2008–2010, as Office Director for Sri Lanka 2010–2012, and as Deputy Assistant Secretary for South Asia, 2013 to present, I contributed to efforts by the U.S. and other countries to highlight this matter in the U.N. Human Rights Council, including the passage of three important resolutions on Sri Lanka.

The political transition brought about by the January election has provided the opportunity for Sri Lanka to achieve enduring peace and prosperity, and true reconciliation if the government continues to advance democracy, human rights, accountability and political inclusion.

If confirmed, I would strive fully to advance the cause of democracy and human rights in Sri Lanka and Maldives.

Question. What are the most pressing human rights issues in Sri Lanka and Maldives? What are the most important steps you expect to take—if confirmed—to promote human rights and democracy in Sri Lanka and Maldives? What do you hope to accomplish through these actions?

Answer. We want to help the Sri Lankan people strengthen democracy, civil society, and human rights, including freedom of expression and freedom of religion or belief. We want to help build a lasting peace and fellowship among Sri Lanka's ethnic and religious communities, including credible justice, accountability, and reconciliation that can facilitate closure for those who suffered and lost loved ones during the war.

It is important to get this right, and the U.N. and international community can lend useful insight to the efforts of the Sri Lankan people. We would assess how best to focus resources, including our assistance budget and Mission Colombo's expertise, to helping Sri Lankan-led efforts to facilitate closure.

In Maldives, we are worried about the current state of human rights, rule of law, and lack of due process. All citizens should be allowed to exercise their human rights and fundamental freedoms.

If confirmed, I would continue to urge the Maldivian Government to take steps to restore confidence in democracy and the rule of law, including through social media, a powerful vehicle for information-sharing in Maldives. I would continue to encourage and support democracy, judicial independence, and the rule of law in Maldives, joined by regional and international partners who share our strong concerns.

Question. If confirmed, what are the potential obstacles to addressing the specific human rights issues you have identified in your previous response? What challenges will you face in Sri Lanka and Maldives in advancing human rights and democracy in general?

Answer. In Sri Lanka, for any justice and accountability process to be meaningful, it needs to be led and owned by the Sri Lankan people and needs to be credible and transparent. This is too complex a process for any country to tackle by itself. Sri Lanka can benefit from the assistance of the international community, and we stand ready to support those efforts.

In Maldives, the challenges include politically motivated prosecutions against critics of the courts and government as well as attacks on independent institutions and civil liberties. If confirmed, I will continue to urge the Maldivian Government to take steps to restore confidence in its hard-fought democracy.

Question. Are you committed to meeting with human rights and other nongovernmental organizations in the U.S. and with local human rights NGOs in Sri Lanka and Maldives?

Answer. Yes, absolutely; I welcome such opportunities for dialogue. In my previous assignments I have cultivated robust consultation with local and international human rights organizations. If confirmed, I will further this commitment as I believe maintaining this dialogue is crucial to informing U.S. Government policies, advancing our values, and ensuring all voices are heard.

Question. If confirmed, please describe steps that you will take to enhance effective implementation of Section 620M of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, commonly known as the Leahy amendment, within the Embassy.

Answer. Human rights vetting consistent with the Leahy amendment is an integral and essential part of U.S. assistance programs worldwide. The Leahy amendment helps safeguard against perpetrators of gross violations of human rights from benefiting from our training and assistance programs. If confirmed, I will ensure Embassy Colombo will continue scrupulously to adhere to the requirements of the Leahy amendment, and the Department will vet all potential security assistance recipients.

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE KESHAP'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR RISCH

Question. Given the new government how do you see Sri Lanka's rebalance toward China, the United States, and India? What policies should we be considering to assist their reforms? Do you believe their shift is sustainable?

Answer. Our overarching goal is to see Sri Lanka become more prosperous, stable, and secure to the benefit of all of its citizens and to the broader region. The United States promotes regional integration and supports Sri Lanka's cooperation with its neighbors across the Indo-Pacific region, particularly with democracies such as India, with which Sri Lanka shares bonds of history, culture, and traditions of democracy and rule of law. To the extent that India, China, and others in the region lend their energy and support to the efforts of Sri Lanka to strengthen their democracy and enhance their productivity, we welcome those efforts. To the extent that countries in the region contribute to and uphold a rules-based order, commit themselves to peaceful resolution of disputes, and defend freedom of navigation and commerce, we welcome those efforts. To the extent that countries in the region engage in trade and investment that meets the highest ethical and environmental standards, as exhibited by American companies, it can have a positive impact on living standards and prosperity.

We welcome the new Sri Lankan Government's professed desire to partner more closely with the United States, the United Nations, and the international community. It is for the people of Sri Lanka to determine their politics, but the international community can and should help the Sri Lankan people strengthen democracy, civil society, and human rights, including freedom of expression, including by the media, and freedom of religion.

If confirmed, I would work with the government, civil society, and other partners to play a constructive role in helping Sri Lanka achieve its potential and deliver on the ambitions of its people, including meaningful, concrete steps to address outstanding concerns related to democratic governance, respect for human rights, reconciliation, justice, and accountability.

I do believe the shift is sustainable. The Sri Lanka voters turned out in record numbers to send a clear signal that they want to return their country to its roots of democracy, inclusiveness, and rule of law. I believe the people of Sri Lanka will continue to insist that the government move in that direction, and, if confirmed, I would seek to add my energy to U.S. efforts to help them realize their positive vision.

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE KESHAP'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR RUBIO

Question. President Maithripala Sirisena is positioned to lead his country in a new direction that respects religious diversity and freedom. He said in a February 2015 speech, "While protecting the country's main religion Buddhism, we also protect the rights and freedom of Hindu, Muslim, and Catholic people in practicing their religion and create consensus among them to build up this country." Since coming into office, he has created three new ministries to handle religious affairs for the Muslim, Christian, and Hindu communities respectively. In addition, the special police unit created by the former government has been disbanded.

♦ How can the U.S. Government strongly encourage the positive movement that has occurred in recent months? What programs can be undertaken to deepen respect for religious diversity and religious freedom?

Answer. The United States promotes respect for religious diversity and freedom of religion or belief and strongly supports the Sri Lankan Government's recent steps to foster reconciliation between Sri Lanka's religious communities. In a welcome departure from the politics of the recent past, President Sirisena and his administration have exhibited in word and deed a genuine desire to achieve the pluralistic society voters demanded in January.

It is for the people of Sri Lanka to determine their politics, but the international community and the U.S. can, and should, help the Sri Lankan people strengthen civil society and human rights, including freedom of religion or belief. If confirmed, I would work with the U.S. Congress, the Sri Lankan Government, civil society, religious leaders and others to promote respect for freedom of religion or belief and religious diversity, and would work to further U.S. Embassy programs aimed at bringing religious communities together.

TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR COONS

Question. Reconciliation Efforts.—The government of President Sirisena, elected in January 2015, has made reconciliation one of its primary goals. What concrete steps has the government taken toward reconciliation and what more do you think needs to be done? For instance, the Tamil National Alliance said right after the election that the release of political prisoners, return of land, and demilitarization were immediately actionable to show steps toward reconciliation. Have these been accomplished? Will Tamils, Muslims, and other minority groups be given equal opportunities under this new government?

Answer. The Sirisena government has made a public commitment to take credible steps to promote justice, accountability, and reconciliation in relation to human rights violations and abuses. Such processes are always challenging, but the United States will continue to support credible efforts to address these important and difficult issues in a way that facilitates reconciliation as well as a durable and lasting peace for the Sri Lankan people. We have welcomed important steps taken by the Sirisena administration, including releasing political prisoners on bail and returning some land in the North and East, as well as gestures of conciliation, such as allowing the singing of the National Anthem in Tamil.

The Sri Lanka voters turned out in record numbers to send a clear signal that they want to return their country to its roots of democracy, inclusiveness, and rule of law. While it is for the people of Sri Lanka to determine their politics, the administration wants to help the Sri Lankan people strengthen democracy, civil society, and respect for human rights and to pursue an inclusive government that allows for meaningful participation by all Sri Lankans of all ethnic and religious groups. If confirmed, that will be my goal as well.

Question. UNHRC Role.—Since the United States joined the U.N. Human Rights Council in 2012, we have led three resolutions on Sri Lanka regarding accountability for crimes committed during and after the war, and on ongoing human rights abuses. Should Sri Lanka stay on the agenda of the UNHRC? Does the United States plan to lead a fourth resolution on Sri Lanka before the end of our term in December 2015? What are the dangers inherent in allowing Sri Lanka to slip from international attention, such that accountability is pursued unchecked by international actors through domestic efforts on the island?

Answer. We welcome the new government's professed desire to partner more closely with the United States, the United Nations, and the international community. We are heartened by the new government's engagement with the U.N. Office of the High Commissioner in Geneva.

Over the past 5 years, the United States has been steadfast in pursuit of justice, accountability, and reconciliation. The new government in Sri Lanka presents an opportunity for a more collaborative approach. Our focus is on urging a credible process. It is too early at this juncture to determine what our position will be later this year. If confirmed, I will work to encourage Sri Lankan engagement with the U.N. on these vitally important issues, consistent with the attention and focus we have dedicated in recent years.

NOMINATIONS

THURSDAY, JULY 9, 2015

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, DC.

Hon. Michele Thoren Bond, of the District of Columbia, to be an Assistant Secretary of State (Consular Affairs)
Dr. Sarah Mendelson, of the District of Columbia, to be U.S. Representative on the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations

The committee met, pursuant to notice, at 10:03 a.m., in room SD-419, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Hon. Bob Corker (chairman of the committee) presiding.

Present: Senators Corker, Isakson, and Cardin.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. BOB CORKER, U.S. SENATOR FROM TENNESSEE

The CHAIRMAN. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee will come to order.

We thank you for being here.

Today the committee will consider two nominees, the Hon. Michele Bond to be Assistant Secretary of State of Consular Affairs, and Dr. Sarah Mendelson to be the Representative of the United States on the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations with the rank of Ambassador, as well as to be the Alternate Representative of the United States to the General Assembly of the United Nations.

The Assistant Secretary of State for Consular Affairs is responsible for issuing passports to Americans looking to travel abroad, issuing visas to people around the world trying to emigrate or to visit the United States, and assisting American citizens abroad in emergency and nonemergency situations. These duties also include the facilitation of international adoptions, and we certainly are very interested in that, and thank you for your work relative to that in the past.

Ambassador Bond is an accomplished consular officer and currently the Acting Assistant Secretary. I look forward to hearing her views on how to improve the passport and visa issuance processes and better serve Americans abroad. I appreciate Ambassador Bond's efforts regarding the suspension of exit permits and the DRC, especially with her visit this spring to press the Congolese to issue permits to U.S. citizens who have adopted children there. One of our staffers, Sarah Downs, has spent inordinate amounts of time traveling there herself, and again we thank you for your efforts on behalf of so many people. I look forward to hearing about the Bureau's strategy to work to resolve this issue as the DRC Government reviews and approves adoption cases and embarks on implementing adoption reform legislation.

The U.S. Representative to the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations—that is a mouthful—ECOSOC, represents the United States on intergovernmental bodies which oversee the U.N.'s work on economic, social, and human rights issues, and the U.N.'s field operations in the areas of development, post-conflict peace-building, and humanitarian assistance.

The Council's functions and powers include initiating studies and reports on human welfare and the quality of life which drives action at the U.N. General Assembly. Modern slavery is inflicted on as many as 27 million men, women, and children around the globe. Senator Cardin and myself and others have passed unanimously out of this committee a bill that we think can have transformative effects on this issue if we can all make it happen in the appropriate way, so we obviously are very interested in your nomination. It is obviously a very important issue. I look forward to hearing and learning more how you will address this in your new role, if confirmed.

Lastly, with the U.N. General Assembly voting on the Sustainable Development Goals in September, the United States will require strong representation. I hope you can provide some insights on how this process will affect U.S. interests.

I thank you for being here. I know you are going to introduce your families in just a moment. We welcome them.

And with that, I will turn it over to our ranking member.

STATEMENT OF HON. BENJAMIN L. CARDIN,
U.S. SENATOR FROM MARYLAND

Senator CARDIN. Well, let me thank Senator Corker for arranging this hearing on two very important nominations. I thank you very much for accommodating this hearing. I know it is a very busy time for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, but one of our principal responsibilities is to timely consider President Obama's nominees, so thank you very much for scheduling these hearings.

And, Mr. Chairman, I want to welcome two nominees that I have adopted and represent in the United States Senate, along with Senator Mikulski. You see, they are from the District of Columbia, and we have not seen fit to give them full representation here in the United States Congress. So Senator Mikulski and I, recognizing that the District is former Maryland land, we have adopted the residents.

The CHAIRMAN. Actually, I think that is a resolution to the issue, to become a part of Maryland and be done with it. [Laughter.]

Senator CARDIN. One of the problems that we talk about is adoptions, so maybe this is an issue that we will be able to take up.

Welcome to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. I thank both of you for your public service and your willingness to serve our country in two very important positions during a very trying time. And I thank your families, because this truly is a family sacrifice. I know at least in one case it has been a family effort; both serve in the Foreign Service. So thank you both, and thank your families for what you are doing.

The mission of the Bureau of Consular Affairs is to protect the lives and interests of American citizens abroad, and we thank you for that. There are a lot of challenges there. Foreign Service officers perform incredible service to our country. They deal with Americans who have trouble abroad, and that become a major problem for Foreign Service officers. They deal with foreign-sourced adoptions, which is an area that Senator Corker raised that we are very concerned about where some heart-rendering challenges have been imposed to prevent the completion of adoptions. And the visa processing system.

Mr. Chairman, I was just, last week, in Havana meeting with our Foreign Service officers as they were handling applications. I must tell you, that is an incredible chore. They are undermanned from the point of view of the resources that they have, and there is a lot of pressure that they get everything right, and I thank them very much for their service.

In regards to hostage situations, I just want to mention that, because President Obama came out last week with a comprehensive rewrite of how we are going to handle circumstances such as the Weinstein situation we had in Maryland where a USAID worker was kidnapped and ultimately he lost his life. The administration is reorganizing that. I have introduced legislation, along with Senator Cornyn, so that we have a single-point person in order to deal with it, and I am hopeful that we can adopt the administration's proposal but improve it with a single point of contact person that we can hold accountable for coordinating all activities, but it also gives the family an opportunity to have a single-point contact, which was very much missing in the Weinstein case. So we might want to talk about that also during the nomination confirmation process.

It is also a pleasure to welcome Ms. Mendelson to today's hearing. The U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. Economic and Social Council plays an important role in the multilateral diplomacy to advance the U.S. interests in strengthening human rights, sustainable development, and effective humanitarian assistance.

I particularly want to focus on the Millennium Development Goals because that is very timely right now. I have had a chance to meet with Helen Clark of the United Nations. I also represent the United States Senate, along with Senator Johnson, at the U.N. as part of our mission, and I must tell you, I was encouraged and disappointed.

The Millennium Development Goals have been incredibly successful, saved millions of lives. It has produced a worldwide effort to use all resources, including nongovernmental resources, to achieve demonstrable progress on saving young people, babies, helping women, et cetera.

So the next Millennium Development Goals I hoped would get the same serious attention. Instead, I saw a list, I think it was 17 proposed goals, which is too many. I agree, there are too many. But number 16 is the one I think should probably be number 1, and

I am concerned it is getting lost in the shuffle, and that is the concern about corruption and good governance which is so corrosive globally and so responsible for so many of the problems that we face.

So I would hope that I will get a commitment here to make sure that we fight hard to make that part of the Millennium Development Goals and that we elevate its importance in our efforts to try to deal with that issue.

There are many other issues I could talk about. I will mention one other that concerns me, the United Nations Family Planning Association. I say that because the Senate Republican appropriators this week inhibited funding to the United Nations Family Planning Association. I mention that because that is a source of funding right now for what we do in Syria and Jordan that provides normal childbirth delivery services to refugee camps that I am concerned could be cut off that could affect the safety and lives of many maternal cases. I would hope that we would find a strategy to make sure that that type of vital link to child safety is maintained, and I would welcome Dr. Mendelson's comments on this issue and many others.

Mr. Chairman, I look forward to our discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Senator Cardin. I appreciate the way that we were able to work together and make things happen, and certainly coordinating this meeting is much appreciated, so thank you.

I will now turn to our nominees, the Hon. Michele Bond and Dr. Sarah Mendelson.

Our first nominee is Michele Bond, a career member of the Senior Foreign Service, class of Minister Counselor with nearly 40 years of experience. She currently serves as Acting Assistant Secretary for Consular Affairs. Ambassador Bond has served in a range of posts at home and abroad, including Ambassador to Lesotho from 2010 to 2012.

Our second nominee is Sarah Mendelson, who currently serves as Senior Advisor and Director of Human Rights Initiative at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. Prior to joining the CSIS, Dr. Mendelson was Deputy Assistant Administrator for the Bureau of Democracy, Conflict, and Humanitarian Assistance at USAID.

We want to thank you very much for being here and sharing your thoughts. Your full statements will be entered into the record without objection, and if you would just give us about a 5-minute introduction, we will ask a few questions. I know you want to introduce your families, but thank you for being here, and we will start with Ambassador Bond.

STATEMENT OF THE HON. MICHELE THOREN BOND, NOMINATED TO BE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE FOR CONSULAR AFFAIRS

Ms. BOND. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Cardin, and distinguished members of the Foreign Relations Committee. It is the honor of a lifetime to be here with you this morning. I am grateful to the President and Secretary Kerry for the confidence and trust they placed in me by selecting me for this position.

I am proud to introduce three of our four children, Robert, Elizabeth, and Lillian Bond. My family is the center of my life. I could not have been successful without their love and support. My family is also one of dedicated public servants, and that is why my husband and our younger son cannot be with us today. My husband, Ambassador Clifford Bond, is a retired Foreign Service officer currently working at the U.S. Embassy in Kiev, Ukraine, coordinating U.S. aid to Ukraine. Our son, Matthew, is a Peace Corps Volunteer, teaching English in Indonesia.

My mother was the earliest and most influential inspiration for my life and for my career. She worked for the Department of State in post-war Stockholm when she was only 21, and years later at NATO and in Washington. She introduced me to public service. Through her, I met smart, dedicated Foreign Service officers and began to understand how diplomacy affects the lives of individuals and benefits our country.

I began working at State as a college student during summer breaks and served on my first crisis task force in 1974, the invasion of Cyprus. Our resources were rudimentary compared to what we have now, but the issues would be familiar to any of my colleagues today. Desperate families called seeking information about loved ones in Cyprus and Greece. We scribbled details and contact information on 3-by-5 cards. It is an extraordinary honor to lead a Bureau that has the same dedication and focus today that I first experienced more than 40 years ago.

Fortunately, we now have far more sophisticated tools, thanks in part to Congress' recognition of the vital importance of our work. The services we provide matter deeply and personally to our customers, your constituents. At its heart, Consular Affairs is about service. We provide assistance in small emergencies like lost passports, and large ones such as natural disasters. We are keenly aware that what we do is never routine for the people we serve. Given tens of thousands of daily opportunities to assist our customers, we are committed to meeting the highest standards of transparency, efficiency, and professionalism, creating lasting positive impressions of the United States and its government.

This week I was named the recipient of the 2015 Thomas Jefferson Award by American Citizens Abroad. I am honored and humbled by this award which recognizes commitment to the Department of State's highest priority, the protection of American citizens overseas. I am proud, too, of the values it represents, openness, listening and responding to the needs of our citizens, and meeting those needs with friendly, professional efficiency, values I pledge to uphold should I be confirmed.

Adoption, as you mentioned, Senator, is one of the most personal and sensitive issues in which we become involved, and it is one that matters to me deeply and has been a focus of my work for many years. My grandmother and her sister were adopted. I have worked on adoptions from behind the interview window overseas and at the policy table in Washington. I carry with me the stories of the families and children I have met. They inspire in me an abiding passion to bring greater transparency and accountability to intercountry adoptions. I am proud to have contributed to the United States leading role on the Hague Adoption Convention and, if confirmed, I will intensify our efforts to make intercountry adoption a real option for vulnerable children everywhere who need a family.

Through careful adjudication of U.S. passport and visa applications, consular officers strengthen border security while facilitating legitimate travel that promotes economic growth, generates jobs across the country, and fosters good will and understanding about the United States across the world. If confirmed, I will ensure we continue to provide secure, efficient passport and visa services to protect our Nation, grow our economy, and unite families.

In Consular Affairs, we are one team with one mission. But, of course, we do not work alone. I am committed to a whole-of-government approach to serving our citizens. I take tremendous pride in leading a dedicated, talented team of over 13,000 professionals working in nearly 300 offices around the world. We come from all walks of life and all corners of our Nation. We proudly include hundreds of veterans, and my team works hard to ensure that we are a diverse one. We work closely with Congress on every issue in our portfolio. We engage with your staff daily on issues that impact your constituents and their communities. If confirmed, I will sustain and build on Consular Affairs' reputation as a model for cooperative, productive relations with Congress.

Thank you for your attention. I look forward to your questions. [The prepared statement of Ms. Bond follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF MICHELE THOREN BOND

Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Cardin, and distinguished members of the Foreign Relations Committee, it is the honor of a lifetime to be here today. I am grateful to the President and Secretary Kerry for the confidence and trust they placed in me by selecting me for this position.

I am proud to introduce three of our four children, Robert, Elisabeth, and Lillian Bond. My family is the center of my life. I could not have been successful without their love and support. My family is also one of dedicated public servants, and that is why my husband and younger son cannot join us today.

My husband, Ambassador Clifford Bond, is a retired Foreign Service officer currently working at the U.S. Embassy in Kiev, coordinating U.S. aid to Ukraine. Our son Matthew is a Peace Corps Volunteer, teaching English in Indonesia.

My mother was the earliest and most influential inspiration for my life, and my career. She worked for the Department of State, in post-war Stockholm, when she was only 21, and years later at NATO, and in Washington. She introduced me to public service. Through her, I met smart, dedicated Foreign Service officers, and began to understand how diplomacy affects the lives of individuals and benefits our country.

I began working at the Department of State as a college student, during summer breaks. I served on my first crisis task force in 1974—the Cyprus invasion. Our resources were rudimentary compared to what we have now, but the issues would be familiar to any of my colleagues today—desperate families called seeking information about loved ones in Cyprus and Greece. We scribbled details and contact information for each family on 3x5 cards. It is an extraordinary honor to lead a Bureau that has the same dedication and focus today that I first experienced more than 40 years ago. Since then, I have had the privilege of serving in places as varied as the Netherlands, Guatemala, Russia, and Lesotho. The positions I held over the course of my tenure prepared me well to lead the Bureau of Consular Affairs.

Bureau of Consular Affairs

My Bureau, CA, directly touches lives across the globe. We serve on the front lines of U.S. diplomacy, and our work is central to the advancement of U.S. foreign policy. We guard against foreign and domestic threats by assisting U.S. citizens overseas and safeguarding our borders at home. We are committed to protecting the integrity of our processes and decisions. We are there for our citizens during the best and worst days of their lives abroad—assisting with overseas adoptions, aiding those who have lost a loved one, or organizing an evacuation to get our citizens to safety. We open up the world to our citizens with one of the world's most coveted travel documents—the U.S. passport. The impact of our work is felt across the Nation. Our work affects the lives of everyone in this room and every one of your constituents.

Our most valuable asset, by far, is our staff. The members of the consular team are incredible public servants. I have seen how the Bureau has met the challenges of 21st century diplomacy, adapted technology to improve the speed, scope, and quality of our service, learned from experience and embraced innovation. Investment in CA's human capital is vital to engage, develop, and retain these talented professionals. If confirmed, I will build on the hard-won achievements of my predecessors by sustaining a well-trained, motivated, dynamic, and efficient workforce.

I pledge that the Bureau of Consular Affairs will continue to protect our citizens abroad and provide all available assistance for any U.S. citizen in need overseas. We will continue to vigilantly protect our Nation from those who wish to harm our citizens. We will further our efforts to make international adoption a real option for children who need permanent families, knowing they will be welcomed into American hearts and homes. Today I will discuss a few of the many achievements of our great team and how we develop leaders and innovators in foreign policy by furthering the vibrant culture of the Bureau of Consular Affairs.

Overseas citizens services—CA's number 1 priority

The safety and protection of U.S. citizens overseas is among the U.S. Government's highest priorities, and CA's number one priority. CA has assisted U.S. citizens affected by a number of recent crises, including earthquakes in Nepal, political strife in Burundi, and the influx of those fleeing Yemen to Djibouti and other countries. In FY 2014, CA evacuated U.S. citizens from areas affected by hurricanes, typhoons, and Ebola; continued our engagement on detainee and hostage cases; visited 8,600 prisoners; performed 30,000 welfare and whereabouts checks; documented 66,000 U.S. citizen children born abroad; and consoled 10,200 bereaved families. We assisted thousands of U.S. citizens affected by abuse, mental illness, and crime abroad.

We promote intercountry adoption as a viable option throughout the world. We work to prevent international parental child abduction and to seek the return of abducted children.

Over a third of U.S. citizens hold a U.S. passport. Increasingly, they travel to destinations off the beaten path and engage in more adventurous activities. Our job to protect their safety and welfare remains the same, but is now more challenging. We proactively reach out to citizens to deliver the information they need to travel safely and responsibly. Our Consular Information Program, including Travel Alerts, Travel Warnings, and the Worldwide Caution, is the Department's primary tool for providing U.S. citizens with timely, accurate information about potential threats to their safety abroad.

We continuously harness new technologies to keep information flowing during rapidly changing circumstances or crises overseas. We are on duty 24/7 to respond immediately as crises arise. Our Office of Policy Coordination and Public Affairs works with colleagues overseas to send messages out through social media outlets including Facebook and Twitter. Constant engagement with the public through these venues allows us to get the message out quickly in times of crisis. Our goal is to provide our citizens with the information and resources they need to make their own appropriate decisions in real time.

CA understands the gravity of our responsibility to U.S. citizens traveling overseas, and we consult closely with interagency partners and Congress on policies and issues affecting our citizens' safety abroad. We have steadily increased our ability to inform and assist families during intercountry adoptions, for example.

U.S. Citizen Hostages Policy: CA played a key role in the interagency group tasked with a Presidentially directed, government-wide review of the management of overseas hostage cases. Based on the hostage policy review, the President has established a Washington-based, FBI-led interagency Hostage Recovery Fusion Cell (HRFC), a National Security Council-convened Hostage Response Group (HRG) providing policy guidance to the HRFC, and a Special Envoy for Hostage Affairs at the State Department who will lead diplomatic engagement on U.S. hostage policy and coordinate all diplomatic engagements in support of hostage recovery efforts. CA has assigned a consular officer fulltime to the HRFC as well as staff to support the Special Envoy's Office and to support hostage victims' families.

U.S. Detainees Abroad: In the Bureau of Consular Affairs, we continually monitor the cases of citizens detained abroad and work to obtain the release of those wrongfully held overseas. U.S. citizen detainee cases can be highly visible, resource-intensive, and difficult to resolve, especially in countries without U.S. embassies.

Three U.S.-Iranian citizens—Saeed Abedini, Amir Hekmati, and Jason Rezaian—are currently imprisoned in Iran. Abedini and Hekmati have been charged, tried, and sentenced; Rezaian has been charged but not tried. President Obama, Secretary Kerry, and Under Secretary Sherman have raised these cases with their Iranian counterparts. Department officials also regularly raise the case of Robert Levinson, a former FBI agent who has been missing in Iran since March 2007.

International Parental Child Abduction (IPCA): CA is the U.S. Central Authority for the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Parental Child Abduction. We work closely with 73 Hague partner countries, and with authorities in non-Hague countries, to prevent situations where one parent wrongfully removes or retains a child away from his or her habitual residence, and to help left-behind parents seek return of, or access to, children who have been wrongfully removed or retained. CA recently released its first annual report under the Sean and David Goldman International Parental Child Abduction Prevention and Return Act of 2014. In 2014, 781 abduction and access cases were resolved. CA continues to encourage non-Convention partner countries to become party to the Convention. After years of diplomatic effort, CA and colleagues across the Department celebrated Japan's accession in April 2014.

Universal Accreditation Act (UAA): We are delighted Congress passed the UAA. CA has engaged adoption service providers, advocacy groups, and national adoption organizations to inform them of the changes UAA introduced, to train on practical aspects of implementation, and to address issues and concerns as they arose before and after the UAA entered into force last July. Before the UAA, the standards of ethical conduct embodied in the Hague Adoption Convention applied in fewer than half of all intercountry adoption cases. Now, all U.S. citizens adopting abroad benefit from uniform standards governing the conduct of all U.S. adoption service providers. UAA also provides for universal monitoring and oversight of service provider adherence to those standards. The UAA closed a critical gap in protection for U.S. adoptive families.

Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) Adoptions: The Department is seeking to unite nearly 600 Congolese children adopted, or in the process of being adopted, by U.S. citizens with their new families. The Congolese Government abruptly suspended issuance of exit permits almost 2 years ago. Without exit permits, these children cannot join their families in the United States. We are addressing this issue on multiple levels. In addition to constant engagement by Embassy Kinshasa and Ambassador Swan, the Department's Special Advisor for Children's Issues, Ambassador Susan Jacobs, led a delegation to the DRC in December and pressed the Congolese Government on these issues. I visited Kinshasa in March, where I met government and parliamentary representatives, and some of the American parents who are living in Kinshasa with their children. I continue to follow this issue closely.

Secretary Kerry urged President Kabila to lift the suspension in May, August, and October 2014. Last August, President Kabila and Secretary Kerry agreed to establish a joint commission to discuss options to allow children with finalized adoptions to depart and to consult on adoption reforms. Some progress has been made; 10 children with life-threatening medical conditions have received exit permits and several other cases are waiting to be reviewed by DRC officials. We are working with the other countries affected by this suspension, including Canada, Italy, Belgium, France, and the Netherlands, to press the DRC to resolve this protracted situation. We have met numerous times with congressional staff to keep them informed about this situation. If confirmed, I commit to you that I will continue to push for urgent resolution of these cases. These children belong with the loving families who have adopted them. We will continue to keep lines of communication open.

Passports—safeguarding the most coveted travel document

The Bureau of Consular Affairs opens the world to millions of U.S. citizens. Our passport agencies unlock the gate to global experiences and mutual understanding for U.S. citizen travelers. By accurately and efficiently adjudicating U.S. passport applications, U.S. passport agencies and fraud prevention teams reliably provide U.S. citizens with the world's most coveted travel document, and keep that document out of the hands of criminals. We know Congress shares our goal of continually improving the integrity of the passport issuance process, and in this regard, we trust Congress and staffers will do everything possible to ensure that we have access to all needed databases, including the full Social Security Administration death file, access to State driver's license information, and both Federal and State level incarceration information.

CA operates 27 domestic passport agencies, two document print centers, and two passport information and call centers across the United States. We have established 12 new passport agencies since 2008 to handle rapidly increasing demand. We adjudicated 14.1 million passport applications in FY 2014, delivering more than 99 percent of those products within their targeted timeframes. There are currently nearly 1 million applications in the system—the highest volume since 2009. In the last 2 fiscal years, passports generated nearly $3 billion in revenue. There are approximately 123 million valid passports in circulation.

Foreign Terrorist Fighters: CA initiated policies and streamlined procedures to deny or revoke passports of U.S. citizens engaged in activities as Foreign Terrorist Fighters (FTFs) who pose significant threats to U.S. national security and foreign policy. CA works diligently with our federal partners to ensure that appropriate passport denial or revocation helps to keep the United States safe. We work closely with the FBI's Counterterrorism Division and other government departments and agencies to ensure broad familiarity with the availability and use of passport denial and revocation to prevent travel. We engaged with the Terrorism Screening Center and partnered with Diplomatic Security (DS) to provide assistance to the National Joint Terrorism Task Force.

To address the potential threat posed by other FTFs using the identities or passports of "unreported deceased" individuals, we implemented procedures to cancel the U.S. passports of deceased FTFs and of hostages killed by terrorists. Cancelled passport information is available to all overseas posts and passport agencies, and is provided in real time to the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) and Interpol. We continue to work with the intelligence community and the National Counter Terrorism Center on potential passport revocation of suspected U.S. citizens serving as FTFs, and will facilitate revocation appropriately where sufficient evidence exists and the action is appropriate.

Our domestic passport agencies and overseas posts remain on alert for terrorism-related information in conducting adjudications and work with DS to share relevant information with our federal partners.

Passport Surge: The projected demand for passport applications for FY 2015 was recently revised to 14.5 million. We expect an unprecedented passport renewal surge in the coming years. To prepare for this, we are modernizing our information systems, including planning for online passport renewals, automated refunds, and additional payment options, to improve customers' overall experience and manage our workload more efficiently.

Next Generation Passport: CA will begin systemwide deployment of the Next Generation Passport in FY 2016. This upgraded document features security enhancements designed to prevent counterfeiting and fraudulent use of lost or stolen passports. The most prominent enhancement is a laser-engraved polycarbonate data page.

Visas—uniting families, growing the economy, securing our Nation

Secretary Kerry believes that foreign policy is economic policy and this is particularly true when it comes to visa policy. The Bureau of Consular Affairs directly affects businesses across the country by facilitating international tourism and helping local entrepreneurs recruit the world's innovators to help them develop the next generation of technology. Demand for visas to visit the United States has skyrocketed worldwide.

Others have recognized our achievements as well: the United States Travel Association awarded the Bureau's Deputy Assistant Secretary for Visa Services the "Distinguished Partner Award" in March 2015, writing that he "helped create an environment that welcomes international visitors to the United States, who bring with them spending dollars and good will that have helped advance the U.S. economy and American public diplomacy." In 2014, a record 75 million international visitors traveled to the United States, a 7-percent increase over 2013; they spent over $220 billion. Tourism is America's largest services export and one that can't be outsourced.

Our investments to increase visa processing capacity and decrease visa interview wait times worldwide create jobs across the United States. International travelers support 1.1 million U.S. jobs. In a January 2012 Executive order, President Obama directed State to increase visa-processing capacity in China and Brazil by 40 percent in 2012 and to ensure 80 percent of applicants worldwide wait less than 3 weeks for their visa interviews. We exceeded both goals. CA reached the global target for wait times in August 2012, and wait times in key markets such as Brazil, China, India, and Mexico have rarely exceeded single digits since 2012. More than 95 percent of visa applicants requiring an interview receive an appointment in less than 3 weeks.

The United States will continue to attract tourists, businesses, students, and talent from around the world—in fact, President Obama's goal is to welcome 100 million international visitors annually by 2021. The vast majority of visitors travel to the United States with no malicious intent. However, some visa applicants are criminals or terrorists. Every visa decision we make, thousands of times a day, is a national security decision. Each of our consular officers understands this. CA is diligently working with DHS to expand visa reciprocity, the Visa Waiver Program, and the Interview Waiver Program, as appropriate, because these efforts allow us to focus our resources where the risks are highest.

Afghan and Iraqi Special Immigrant Visa (SIV) Programs: We could not do our jobs overseas without the dedication and expertise of our locally engaged staff. Working for the U.S. Government sometimes comes at a personal cost to our staff and their families. In Iraq and Afghanistan, this work has placed some local colleagues in grave danger. CA works with the interagency to adjudicate and efficiently issue Special Immigrant Visas to colleagues in Iraq and Afghanistan who worked alongside our soldiers and diplomats.

As of December 14, 2014, we had issued all 4,000 Afghan principal applicant SIVs authorized for use by the Consolidated Appropriations Act for FY 2014 (3,000 SIV numbers, available through September 30, 2015) and the Emergency Afghan Allies Extension Act of 2014 (1,000 SIV numbers, available through December 31, 2014). The FY 2015 National Defense Authorization Act authorized 4,000 additional Afghan SIVs for use by March 31, 2017. To date, we have issued more than 800 of these SIVs. As of June 26, more than 13,000 Afghans are at some point in the SIV application review process. The Iraqi program has enough visa numbers available to respond to demand. Although we issued record numbers of SIVs in FY 2014, there remain some long-pending cases undergoing security vetting. We are working with the interagency to speed processing and resolve cases while steadfastly maintaining the security of our immigration system and of the United States.

Visa Waiver Program and Interview Waiver Pilot Program: The Visa Waiver Program is essential to achieve the administration's policy and security goals, and maximize efficiency for our customers. We work with DHS to expand the Visa Waiver Program as appropriate, with Chile joining in 2014. With DHS concurrence, we indefinitely extended the Interview Waiver Program, which allows us to waive interviews for applicants in certain low-risk populations—over 1 million applicants in 2014—allowing us to focus on higher-risk applicants. We continue to work with our partners to determine the feasibility of expanding the Visa Waiver Program, the Interview Waiver Program, and reciprocal visa validities in support of the President's goal to attract 100 million visitors to the United States annually by 2021.

Foreign Fighters and the Visa Waiver Program (VWP): The protection of U.S. borders is of the utmost importance to CA. We collaborate closely with DHS to support its mission of protecting the United States by promoting effective aviation and border security screening with our foreign partners through enhanced information-sharing. To travel without a visa under the VWP, an applicant must obtain authorization through the Electronic System for Travel Authorization (ESTA) prior to boarding a U.S.-bound air or sea carrier. Should standard ESTA screening indicate that a traveler might be ineligible, that individual's ESTA application is denied, and the traveler is directed to the nearest U.S. Embassy or consulate to apply for a visa. In November 2014, ESTA enhancements went into effect that allow the U.S. Government to more effectively identify travelers who might pose a risk to the United States, including foreign fighters.

Ten-Year Validity for Chinese Visas: The Bureau of Consular Affairs was instrumental in negotiating and shepherding the expansion of Chinese visa validity, which President Obama announced in November 2014. Visa demand in Mission China has risen by more than 53 percent in the wake of the announcement and the Chinese are issuing visas with the same reciprocal validity to U.S. citizens. This has a significant impact on travel and tourism in both countries and helps boost people-to-people engagement. It will be a tremendous boon to U.S. businesses and have a significant effect on our economy. From January to May 2015, CA issued 1.5 million visas to Chinese travelers.

Modernized Immigrant Visa: As a global service organization, CA must constantly ensure that our processes meet the needs of our customers. We are working with DHS, private and nonfederal public actors, and technology experts to implement a streamlined, electronic immigrant visa process that will save time and money.

Fraud prevention—facilitate travel, maximize security measures

Fraud prevention and detection are a critical part of our operations. As the demand for our services increases, so do efforts by criminal elements, or those who think they can catch us off guard. We must remain vigilant in our work while still maintaining efficiency. New tools and technologies help identify and malafide applicants. One of CA's priorities for 2015 is to develop programs and techniques to prescreen applicants prior to their interviews. Our global fraud tracking database allows us to more efficiently document and analyze fraud research. Our fraud prevention and detection efforts are successful in part because of increased collaboration across the U.S. Government, and access to better information and technology.

CA systems—keeping up with demand in a changing world

Stable technological systems are a top priority for CA. This is key to improving customers' overall experience and managing our workload efficiently.

Systems modernization: The growing demand for our services puts unrelenting strain on our aging systems. A systems outage in June disrupted service and caused considerable hardship for some customers across the globe.

A June 9 hardware failure halted the flow of biometric data for visa application security checks to posts overseas, preventing posts from issuing visas and processing new visa applications. The effort to switch to the standby system failed due to corrupted data. CA collaborated with private sector experts and the White House's U.S. Digital Services team and worked around the clock to restore service by taking a database with 6-month old data and merging the data from the failed production system into the new one. CA then reconnected posts to the central biometrics database in a staggered worldwide rollout, beginning with our largest nonimmigrant visa and immigrant visa processing posts. All visa-issuing posts were reconnected by June 26.

Taking into account the legal requirements to conduct security screening for visa applicants, CA explored every available option to facilitate legitimate travel during the outage. We secured strong cooperation with DHS/CBP on port of entry (POE) document waiver requests for cases with humanitarian or high-level U.S. national interest and for more than 250 critically needed temporary agricultural workers. We issued more than 3,500 visas for urgent and humanitarian travel in cases that did not require fingerprints, including visas for adopted children, diplomats on official travel, and some temporary workers. After the systems were restored, consular sections overseas worked extended hours and through the weekend to rapidly return to normal processing times.

CA is committed to modernizing consular systems to prevent future recurrences of these problems. We are migrating our databases to a significantly more robust combined hardware and software Oracle Exadata platform. We recently installed new servers in Beijing, Guangzhou, and Shanghai that can handle up to four times the workload. We will install the same servers in our busiest missions over the course of the year.

ConsularOne: We are in the development phase of ConsularOne, a major IT initiative to consolidate all consular applications into one integrated system. This will reduce inefficiencies and data duplication, improve our ability to track demand, and help us to better detect trends and anomalies across all consular services. ConsularOne is a key component of online passport renewal, which we plan to introduce next year.

CA Budget and Resources—Responsibly Use Public Resources Without Burdening Taxpayers

If confirmed, I am committed to ensuring we are fiscally responsible and shrewd stewards of our funds. CA is funded by consular user fees, not by taxpayers. In FY 2014, CA generated $3.6 billion in revenue, which supports all consular operations in the Department and provides border security-related funding to some interagency partners.

CA funds: CA is fully fee funded, and collects and retains fees for certain visa and passport services pursuant to specific statutory authority. We do not collect fees for every service we perform. Under current fee statutes, we are allowed to retain approximately 80 percent of the fees we collect, with the balance going to the Treasury. Currently, CA has 12 Partner Bureaus with programs or positions directly supported through retained consular fees. If confirmed, I would ask your consideration in enhancing our ability to retain and spend the funds generated through consular fees. With added flexibilities, we can improve and expand our work to secure the safety and security of U.S. citizens abroad.

Cost of service model: CA's cost of service model uses activity-based costing methodologies to calculate the true cost of consular services, to recommend appropriate fees for services, and to inform CA's funding strategies so CA appropriately administers the Department's Consular and Border Security Programs (CBSP). Fee flexibilities included in the FY 2016 President's Budget Request will ensure future efficient and responsible disbursement of CBSP funds that is in line with how fees are set. We will also create, implement, and institutionalize an authoritative CBSP plan and overarching governance process to guide budget planning, execution, and monitoring.

Consular leadership—developing the workforce of the 21st century

CA is a global operation with a significant footprint. We have a workforce of over 13,000 highly trained professionals including Civil Service employees, Foreign Service officers, and Locally Employed staff, in more than 300 domestic and overseas offices.

Our colossal and growing workload can only be managed by a first rate workforce that leverages cutting-edge technological and management tools. I have every confidence in my team and in CA's senior leaders. I am committed to fostering the culture of leadership, management, and innovation excellence that is a hallmark of the Bureau.

We run our operations as effectively and efficiently as possible. I would like to say that the Bureau of Consular Affairs is a well-oiled machine, but we are not machines. We are a compassionate, disciplined, and highly trained corps of individuals dedicated to the dual mission of protecting U.S. citizens overseas and protecting our Nation's borders.

To build a team of consummate, compassionate professionals and prepare the next generation of FSOs, we developed 1CA: one Consular Affairs team. 1CA is the Bureau's office of leadership, management, and innovation, a proactive effort to promote excellence in an environment of budgetary restraint and increasing demand for our services. 1CA created a management framework based on private industry leading practices but customized for consular professionals. 1CA has introduced a practical set of tools and resources that promote collaboration and help consular teams identify, prioritize, and resolve management and leadership challenges. Through these tools, our consular sections across the globe have increased adjudication numbers and reduced processing times and customer wait times.

It is my hope that CA will continue to foster a culture of leadership, sound management, and performance principles which exerts a broader influence across the Department. CA is proud to be the training ground for the next generation of Foreign Service officers. All entry-level officers serve in Consular Affairs on their first or second tours. The capabilities and skills of our diplomats are greatly enhanced by the tools they learn during their consular tours.

1CA has become a model for how the Department approaches the development of human capital. Recently, State rolled out the Department's Leadership and Management Principles, tracking closely to CA's tenets. Our success has inspired the creation of Teamwork@State, the Department-wide initiative that provides toolkits and resources on teamwork across bureaus, posts, and offices.

If confirmed, I will do my utmost to continue to equip my team with the tools and resources necessary to fulfill their duties. I will also continue to work with the Department to prepare our new diplomats for future global challenges.

Relationship with Congress

The work of Consular Affairs often touches our citizens on a deeply personal level. I am committed to ensuring your constituents receive the assistance they require from CA in a timely manner and that information is presented clearly and transparently. If confirmed, I am committed to strengthening the relationship between Congress and the Bureau of Consular Affairs. In FY 2014, CA conducted more than 150 legislative briefings, testified at three hearings, and cohosted the annual Immigration and Consular Conference for all congressional staff. We conducted domestic agency and border post tours for constituent services staffers. We want Congress to be well informed of our issues and wish to be available to you for any inquiries you may have. Two consular liaison officers have offices on the Hill to respond to congressional inquiries, connect you with our subject matter experts, and engage on consular matters via webinars, conferences, and briefings. We have a dedicated Web site for congressional staff—travel.state.gov/congress—and dedicated congressional contacts at every overseas post, domestic passport agency, the National Visa Center, and the Kentucky Consular Center. During overseas crises, we establish a dedicated congressional email address for inquiries concerning constituents in the affected area.

Whole of government approach

If confirmed, I hope to amplify the cooperation among agencies, and with Congress, to use our resources as efficiently as possible, bringing a whole-of-government approach to serving the needs of our citizens. I will continue the close collaboration we enjoy with other bureaus across the Department and other government agencies to fulfill our mission of protecting U.S. citizens abroad and facilitating legitimate travel to the United States.

Conclusion

Mr. Chairman, if confirmed, I will work with the Secretary to ensure consular support for America's foreign policy objectives. If confirmed, I will continue to keep you informed of our resource needs, and work with you to ensure that the Bureau of Consular Affairs continues to meet its obligations to our citizens and to our Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. Dr. Mendelson.

STATEMENT OF DR. SARAH MENDELSON, NOMINATED TO BE U.S. REPRESENTATIVE ON THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL OF THE U.N.

Dr. MENDELSON. Chairman Corker, Ranking Member Cardin, and distinguished members, thank you for the opportunity to appear before you as President Obama's nominee to be the United States Representative to the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. I am grateful to President Obama, Secretary Kerry, and Ambassador Power for this opportunity and for their confidence in me.

I would like to acknowledge my husband, John Harvey, who is here with me today and whose own career has been defined by public service and the safeguarding of U.S. national security interests. I depend every day on his love and support.

I also want to acknowledge my family and friends watching from many different parts of the globe. As a first-generation American, it is truly an honor and privilege to be here. In my office I have a photograph of the shtetl in Lithuania where my father was born, which serves as a reminder of how far and how fast my family's journey has been.

Virtually my entire professional career has focused on advocating for democracy and human rights internationally. This work is not easy, nor does it bring quick results. I keep close a copy of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. In a world filled with cynicism, it is an important reminder of the United Nations' potential.

I know firsthand about the United Nations' imperfections. While at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, my intellectual home for many years, I investigated the trafficking of women and girls in and around peacekeeping missions in Bosnia and Kosovo. But this work also brought me into contact with brave U.N. officers dedicated to advancing gender equality and human rights.

I have seen firsthand that when the United Nations works best, we can effectively work with partners to promote our interests and values. During the 4 years I served at USAID in the Bureau for Democracy, Conflict, and Humanitarian Assistance, my colleagues and I responded to multiple Level-3 humanitarian assistance crises. I was exposed on a daily basis to the development, human rights, humanitarian assistance, peacebuilding, and democracy promotion challenges confronting various U.N. agencies, nearly all of which depend on vital U.S. leadership and support.

My service in government also coincided with the expansion of the digital era. From Brazil to Indonesia, from Mexico to South Africa, the spread of affordable information and communication technologies has helped to expose corruption and driven demand for governments to be more transparent and accountable to their citizens. Initiatives such as the Open Government Partnership, launched by President Obama and seven other heads of state at the U.N. in 2011, reflect this growing international movement of civic-based activism.

This digital era has been met also with a backlash, a closing of public space around civil society where governments are threatened by the increased empowerment of citizens. There are many dimensions to closing space including onerous requirements on non-governmental organizations, the targeting of journalists, national legal measures targeting the LGBT community, the rise of anti-Semitism and targeting of religious minorities, and the murder of activists dedicated to exposing abuse.

I know from my travels around Africa, Asia, Europe, Eurasia, and Latin America just how much members of vulnerable and marginalized populations look to the United States and the United Nations for leadership and pushing back on such repression. If confirmed, I pledge to work with U.N. agencies and like-minded member states to mobilize support for and address this issue and give voice to those who have been silenced.

If confirmed, I will also continue the work I began over 15 years ago on human trafficking, elevating the need to combat modern slavery as a vital 21st century development challenge. The global movement has made great strides, yet as this committee has recognized under the chairman's leadership, there is more work to be done to strengthen international efforts to address human trafficking. The U.S. role, as this committee has also noted, is critical. The United Nations has an important role to play as a platform to expand and broaden constituencies engaged in ending slavery.

If confirmed, I will work with the leadership of U.N. agencies in New York to combat human trafficking, and support smart investments that lead to sound development outcomes and elevate the focus on women and girls. I will work with colleagues across the U.N. system to deliver assistance to those experiencing food insecurity and displacement, and join others in the quest for greater resilience in the face of disaster.

As the world finalizes its commitments for the Post-2015 Development Agenda, I will work with the leadership of U.N. agencies, funds, programs, and member states for meaningful implementation of the goals. We must never forget that inclusion, sound governance, sustainable environmental practices, and respect for human rights are the essential foundations for achieving and sustaining development.

And finally, across the full spectrum of the issues and activities in my portfolio, I will contribute actively to this administration's fight against the disproportionate bias that remains persistent in the U.N. system targeting Israel.

If confirmed, I would be honored to join the administration's commitment and efforts to make the United Nations live up to its potential and further American values and ideals. Working with this committee and others in the administration, I would do my utmost to help the U.N. address humanitarian challenges and meet opportunities to make the world more secure.

Thank you. I look forward to answering your questions.

Thank you. I look forward to answering your questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you both very much.

We will now have 5 minutes of questioning by each of the Senators who wish to do so.

Ambassador Bond, a number of American families adopting Congolese children are stuck in the DRC exit permit suspension. I know you are very aware of that. Yesterday there was an announcement where numbers of cases were going to be approved. They are waiting on authorization by President Kabila, I guess, at this moment.

Can you tell us a little bit about what you think the best strategy will be for you to deal with this issue with the DRC and getting adopted children out of the country?

Ms. BOND. Thank you for that question, Senator. As you may know, I visited Kinshasa in March and had an opportunity to meet with several of the waiting families who have actually moved to the DRC in order to live with their children while they wait for action by those officials. But there are hundreds of other families who are not able to do that and who are waiting in the United States to be able to bring their children home.

While I was in Kinshasa, I met with a Member of their Parliament and with a number of senior officials in the government to press them to take action now on these cases, and I emphasized to them the fact that it is not a matter of indifference. Every single day that passes is a cost, a real cost, and in some ways an irreparable one, to the children who are losing ground because they are not in the families that are waiting for them, who have adopted them and would give them the kind of love and support that every child needs.

As you say, there was a meeting yesterday between U.S. Embassy officials and the head of the DRC Adoption Inter-Ministerial Commission, and a member of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was also there. They reported that the Commission has approved a number of cases of children adopted by citizens of the United States, and also families from Canada, France, Italy, and the Netherlands. They say that those have been reviewed by the Commission and passed to President Kabila for his action.

They suggested that a decision could come as early as next week, and we are pressing that administration hard to make a decision on these children, the first tranche, but on every single case to get those kids home to their families.

It has been suggested by one of the members of the Commission that they believe that having succeeded in creating this first tranche and moving those names and files to the President, that they will be able to move more quickly on subsequent cases. They have established their process now, and I hope that is true, but we are indeed going to be pushing them to recognize that this is an urgent matter. This is something that needs to be done in a matter of hours or days, not weeks and months.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Dr. Mendelson, can you tell us a little bit about ECOSOC's role in combating slavery and talk to us a little bit about how you plan to pursue this issue when confirmed?

Dr. MENDELSON. Thank you, Senator, and thank you for your leadership on combating trafficking. It is widely appreciated, and that of the committee.

ECOSOC is a broad portfolio. Trafficking is a global problem. We need a global platform to address it, and I think ECOSOC presents an excellent opportunity.

Very specifically, we need, as you have widely recognized, we need every Ambassador to be engaging on this issue. We need every mission to be thinking about this and being champions for this. The SDG process, the Sustainable Development Goals process, actually provides an opportunity. There is a lot of language particularly focused around ending the trafficking of minors, and I have seen how when countries commit to the goals, assistance follows. It is my expectation that, and I would be a champion if confirmed, to make sure that those commitments include a focus on combating child trafficking and raising this issue, using the convening power to bring missions together and leadership.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there some specific countries that you think would be best for us to work with? Name some of them. I know you cannot name all of them, but obviously we want to put together a global effort. Hopefully we have the beginning stages of that now. But what are some of the other countries around the world that you think care deeply about this issue which would be great partners for the United States?

Dr. MENDELSON. We have very close relations with the United Kingdom, with many Nordic countries. Surprisingly, those development agencies are not already committed to combating trafficking. In my travels in my job at USAID, I met with foreign officials many times urging that this be a focus, and there was some resistance. So I think there is work to be done. I think this platform will be, if confirmed, a wonderful opportunity to work with missions again through the commitment that is involved with the Sustainable Development Goals.

I think you are going to find that countries are going to turn to say, yes, we are going to commit to this, and it will come on to their radar, come on to their agenda. So Sweden, with whom we have very close cooperation, would be a target, other Scandinavian countries, and certainly the United Kingdom.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you both.

Senator Cardin.

Senator CARDIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Again, I thank both of you for your service.

Dr. Mendelson, you mentioned the vital U.S. leadership and support. That was particularly true in the Trafficking in Persons, the TIP report, the gold standard. I look at that foreign beat with guests from other countries to see how they are doing, and the United States has really provided, I think, the international leadership to make a huge difference in trafficking.

I want to see us do the same thing on corruption. I was proud that in the State Department reauthorization that this committee took up, we started to take steps to require the State Department to analyze the status of corruption in countries around the world.

So I want to focus on the Millennium Development Goals just for one moment. If I had Ambassador Bond's husband, spouse here, I think he would tell us the problems in Ukraine was not so much the relationship with Russia and the European Union, it was more about corruption. After the revolution, people were very optimistic, but then they got a corrupt government, and that caused many of the problems. If we look at the deep problems in Russia today, the motivation there is more corruption than anything else, and I could go through so many other countries around the world.

So we have a chance with the Millennium Development Goals, and there is a commitment to deal with human rights and corruption, but it seems buried. So I would like to get your commitment to be a fighter on this issue. You have a great tradition on human rights. This is our opportunity.

So, are you going to be a fighter to make sure that we have this as a visible goal under the Millennium Development to make sure that we can make some progress internationally on this corrosive human rights issue?

Dr. MENDELSON. Thank you, Senator, for the focus on corruption. I very much share your sense of urgency on this issue. I think it is one that the human rights community in general is gradually beginning to spend more attention to. I note also that there is a large transparency and accountability community that does not always talk to the human rights community. You mentioned Ukraine and, of course, the Dignity Revolution. The Euromaidan was about precisely demanding transparency and accountability, and I think that there are very brave people today who are still working on these issues.

I promise you that in Sustainable Development Goal number 16, that has good governance, sound governance and anticorruption in it, it will be an enormous priority. It is something that I spoke to Ambassador Power about when we were talking about this possibility, and I know she shares the commitment. So, yes, I promise.

Senator CARDIN. How about getting in the top five rather than number 16? I hope that you will work for that.

Ambassador Bond, people who want to come to the United States, spend money, learn about our way, advance U.S. goals which are basically global values, we make it so tough. It costs a lot of money. It takes a lot of time. What vision do you have to make it easier for people who want to visit the United States to be able to get through the bureaucratic process of obtaining a visa?

Ms. BOND. Thank you, Senator. What a good question, because that is one of our primary goals too. We have to screen visitors who are applying to come to the United States because we need to know who they are before we can give them permission to come. However, we also want to do everything we can to facilitate legitimate travel. We want to bring those travelers to the United States, and we want to encourage them to come back again and again.

So one of the things that we do is we try to make sure, and we have invested significant resources—people, training, real estate—into making sure that if someone notifies us that he is interested in getting a visa to the United States, we interview that person as quickly as possible at a date that is convenient for them.

As you may know, in November, President Obama and the President of China jointly announced that they were going to extend the validity of visas for tourists and business travelers from 1 year to 10. And since then, just in the months since November, we have seen a 53-percent increase in the number of new applications for visas to come to the United States. Millions of people are traveling to the United States, and because they will have a 10-year visa, they can plan ahead. They can say, hey, next year is our anniversary, and let's plan to go to San Francisco. Next year is whatever, 5 years from now is whatever.

So we are doing everything we can to encourage travelers who have been vetted and examined so that we know that they are not a risk to the United States. We want them to come and we want them to see as much of the country as they can and spend their money.

Senator CARDIN. Also take a look at your computer system. It has broken down many times. You need to have a more reliable way to be able to handle this. If it is not working, a person may have traveled overnight to get to one of our locations only to find they have to come back another day. It just makes no sense, and we have to provide better service.

I want to do the screening—we have to do that—but we could do it in a more friendly way, and I would just urge you to make that the highest priority.

Last point, Mr. Chairman, just to comment.

Thank you for mentioning your commitment for Israel. There is no question that there is only one country that will stand up to the discriminatory actions that the international community in this international organization has focused on Israel, and the United States must remain firm against those discriminatory actions taken in the international community. So, thank you very much for mentioning that today.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Isakson.

Senator ISAKSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you very much for calling this hearing today. I know U.N. Ambassador Power is very interested in Dr. Mendelson getting to New York as fast as she can, particularly with the U.N. session beginning this summer, so I hope we can move this forward, and I appreciate very much your willingness to call it.

I want to follow up on what Senator Cardin said, Dr. Mendelson. Your statement says, "I will contribute actively to this administration's fight against the disproportionate bias that remains persistent in the U.N. system targeting Israel," and I want to thank you for including it both in your printed remarks as well as your verbal remarks today, because there are significant biases against Israel in the U.N. If we do not stand strong with our partner Israel, we could have some big problems.

In particular, I think it is U.S. policy, at least my recollection is it is our stated policy of this administration that any recognition of a Palestinian state should be negotiated between the State of Israel and the State of Palestine, not determined by a third party. Is that correct?

Dr. MENDELSON. Thank you, Senator, for raising this issue. It is, again, a key issue that Ambassador Power and I discussed when this opportunity arose.

You are correct, and I will fight vigorously to oppose any possibility that erodes a two-state solution. I will fight for the inclusion of Israel in various fora and to normalize Israel's status at the United Nations. I will fight tirelessly to oppose the bias that you see across the system, including in one-sided biased resolutions.

Senator ISAKSON. Well, thank you very much for that commitment, because it is absolutely necessary. I know Samantha Power, Ambassador Power, feels exactly the same way.

Ms. Bond, you are going to be in charge of all passports. Is that right?

Ms. BOND. Yes, sir.

Senator ISAKSON. I have a question for you. Every time I turn on the television or read anything about ISIL and about lone wolves, I read about Americans going to Syria for training with ISIL or going into Iraq for training with ISIL. What is the State Department doing and what role can the State Department have through passports, visas, and the like to track people who are doing that, or to curtail the access to be able to do that for American citizens going to that part of the world for that purpose?

Ms. BOND. Sir, you have raised a very serious concern. We recognize fundamentally the right of U.S. citizens to travel and the importance of citizens who are interested in traveling abroad to be able to apply for a passport and get one quickly and efficiently.

At the same time, we also are carefully vetting every application for a U.S. passport for us to make sure that that person qualifies, is that person a U.S. citizen, and there are screens in place. We work very closely with law enforcement, with the intel community, in order to be able to identify travelers who may be planning to travel for illegal purposes, travel for terrorism purposes.

So there is a lot of coordination within the government to track known or suspected terrorists, and whether they are foreigners applying for visas or Americans who are traveling abroad on passports to make sure that we try to identify those people and try to interdict their travel if we can.

Senator ISAKSON. I hope you are successful at accomplishing exactly that, because it is a worrisome fact that as many Americans as are expected or that we anticipate are trying to find their way to Syria or to ISIL to be trained and come back to be a threat to this country. So your role in that will be critically important to our country's security, and I wish you the best of luck in your future endeavors as far as Assistant Secretary of State, as I do with Dr. Mendelson at the U.N.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Senator.

Look, I cannot imagine having two more highly qualified people for these positions, and we thank you both for your willingness to serve in this capacity and your commitment to the kinds of issues you are going to be dealing with for a very long time.

So, thank you for being here and having your families here. We will make this as painless as possible, getting ready to adjourn, and we hope other members will ask questions. We hope that those questions will be in by noon Monday, and then you would respond promptly to those.

But we thank you for being here. Again, we thank you for your commitment to these issues, to our country, and your willingness to serve in this capacity.

Senator CARDIN. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. The meeting is adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 10:45 a.m., the hearing was adjourned.]

ADDITIONAL MATERIAL SUBMITTED FOR THE RECORD

RESPONSES OF DR. SARAH MENDELSON, NOMINATED TO BE U.S. REPRESENTATIVE ON THE U.N. ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

REPRESENTATIVE-DESIGNATE MENDELSON'S RESPONSES TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CORKER

Question. Given the multitude of Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs), which ones should the United States prioritize?

Answer. From the outset of the process, the U.S. Government has prioritized a universal Post-2015 Development Agenda to ensure it can drive real impact and results on the ground. The United States is supportive of the draft Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) because they address a range of issues that were left out of the Millennium Development Goals yet which are critical drivers of development such as the role of sound governance. The United States also recognizes that this more robust understanding of development means having a larger set of goals and targets to work toward. The 17 goals and 169 targets articulated in the current draft SDGs document include U.S. Government priorities—such as the unfinished business of the MDGs; gender equality and the empowerment of women and girls; sustainable energy; oceans and natural resources; inclusive and sustainable economic growth; governance and peaceful societies. The Department has prioritized 13 areas for the Post-2015 Agenda: including Goal 16 on peace and governance but also poverty, food security, health, education, gender equality and the empowerment of women and girls, economic growth, water, energy, natural resources, oceans, and global partnerships.

Question. How will the SDGs affect the way the United States approaches international development?

Answer. Policy decisions, priorities, and budgets of the United States will always be made by the United States. The SDGs offer global targets to help guide national development priorities while leaving individual countries the space to determine their own policies about how to meet those priorities. The draft SDGs and targets reflect issues that have long been components of U.S. foreign assistance, including combating human trafficking and modern slavery, fighting poverty and hunger, promoting education and gender equality, improving access to safe water and affordable and reliable energy, and support for transparent, responsive and accountable democratic institutions. As the agenda has not yet been adopted, it is too early to say how the final agreement will impact U.S. priorities and policies, and the allocation of U.S. resources.

Question. What is ECOSOC's role in the post-2015 Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) development agenda and how will the Council contribute to the implementation of the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs)?

Answer. The Millennium Development Goals were introduced in 2000 and span a 15-year period that concludes this year. The Post-2015 Development Agenda, including the Sustainable Development Goals, are currently being negotiated through an intergovernmental process under the auspices of the General Assembly. The importance of a robust followup and review framework is one of the key lessons learned from the experience with the MDGs, and as the U.N. organ mandated to conduct followup and review of conferences and summits relating to development, economic, social, and environmental issues, ECOSOC will play a key role in monitoring implementation of the SDGs. Analysis of specific areas of the SDGs will occur throughout the year in ECOSOC's functional commissions and subsidiary bodies (e.g., Commission on the Status of Women or the U.N. Forum on Forests). ECOSOC will also conduct an annual review of the SDGs at the High Level Political Forum (except every 4 years when the High Level Political Forum will meet under the auspices of the General Assembly).

Question. What were the biggest hurdles to the implementation of the Millennium Development Goals and what lessons can be learned as the U.N. transitions to the Sustainable Development Goals?

Answer. In addition to being a powerful symbol of a global commitment to eradicating extreme poverty, hunger, and disease, the MDGs served as a motivating set of goals to drive common action and have helped reap remarkable progress for global development. Even when particular MDG targets were not met, such shortcomings served to catalyze additional global action. For example, on child survival, the 2012 Child Survival Call to Action, which resulted in a new pledge to end deaths of children under 5 by 2035, stemmed from a recognition that MDG 4 (reducing child mortality) would not be reached by 2015.

It is worth noting that overall, since 1990, extreme poverty has been cut by more than half with nearly 900 million people rising above the $1.25-a-day line. Per capita incomes in the developing world more than doubled. A child born today is twice as likely to survive into adolescence as in 1990; malnutrition has been cut by 40 percent; youth literacy has been cut by 39 percent, and lack of access to modern energy services has fallen by a third.

The Millennium Development Goals helped advance the U.S. development agenda in a number of key areas. The MDGs helped pull people out of extreme poverty, especially those who were just below the extreme poverty line, but often not the most marginalized and extreme poor. In the follow-on effort, the United States will be working to incorporate additional areas considered key to the U.S. development agenda, including a focus on sound governance, institutions and peace, particularly in fragile and post-conflict states, in generating sustainable development, and on gender and environmental issues. One criticism of the MDGs was that they were too narrowly defined in that they did not take into account development writ large. In some cases, this led to siloed approaches rather than a more holistic, integrated approach. In the Post-2015 development agenda, the United States will work to ensure that issues that cut across multiple areas of focus, such as health, gender, transparency and accountability, and education, are addressed in an integrated manner.

Question. If confirmed, what will be your role in determining the success of the SDGs and more specifically, how do you think they should be measured and evaluated?

Answer. The United States is closely engaged in the efforts of the U.N. Statistical Commission to develop a comprehensive multilateral framework to measure, evaluate, followup, and review progress on the SDGs. The U.S. Government supports an indicator and monitoring framework that is science-based, with an elevated focus on data. It should also be practical and achievable; one that enables evidence-based decisionmaking in support of the agenda at all levels. Because implementing the SDGs will mean different things in different contexts, the monitoring and evaluation framework needs to be flexible rather than overly prescriptive, focused on outcomes, and one that accommodates different structures and challenges. Reporting and evaluation of progress should occur at the national, regional, and global levels, and it should be a collaborative effort between the U.N., its member states, and various subnational public and private actors, including nongovernmental organizations. The objective of follow up and review is to support decisionmakers, inform policy choices, and mobilize partnerships for implementation, thereby supporting the successful implementation of the goals.

The administration hopes to build on and improve its experience with the MDGs regarding followup and review, including by disaggregating data appropriately according to key demographic variables including sex, age, and disability status, and sharing data in an open, dynamic, real-time manner to maximize its relevance and the decisionmakers' ability to act on it. Increased availability and more effective use of data to monitor and drive sustainable development in real time, including on issues that have not previously benefited from an elevated focus on data such as sound governance or combating human trafficking, have the potential to be the game-changing innovation of the next decade. If confirmed, I would actively participate in how implementation and evaluation decisions are shaped and contribute to decisionmaking about how to measure the success of the SDGs.

Question. ECOSOC Resolution 2008/33, “Strengthening coordination of the United Nations and other efforts in fighting trafficking in persons” urged “. . . all States, individually and through international cooperation, as well as the United Nations system, to increase, in a coherent, comprehensive and coordinated manner, efforts to counter trafficking in persons.”

♦ Given that ECOSOC is on record with regard to combating human trafficking, what specific followup has ECOSOC taken with regard to this resolution and what additional steps can ECOSOC take to address human trafficking?

Answer. Thank you for the question, Senator. As you point out, the Economic and Social Council has been active on the issue of combating human trafficking and, if confirmed, I will continue that effort as I recognize we all have a long way to go in addressing this critical human rights issue. In 2006, the United Nations General Assembly set up an Inter-Agency Coordination Group against Trafficking in Persons (“ICAT”), comprising 17 U.N. agencies and related organizations, with ECOSOC coordinating on this issue within the U.N. system. The ICAT includes agencies such as the International Organization for Migration (IOM), the International Labor Organization (ILO), UNICEF, the U.N. Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR), and the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR).

Attention to trafficking issues through the ICAT and at ECOSOC, its subsidiary bodies, and other U.N. organizations has provided a useful way to highlight best practices in addressing trafficking in persons. For example, earlier this year, the United States and other delegations cosponsored a panel discussion with the ILO on forced labor, the vulnerability of workers to exploitation, and the impact on national and global development.

Numerous other initiatives to counter trafficking in persons have occurred throughout the U.N. system. If confirmed, I will continue this sustained engagement, using the platform of the USUN mission to elevate the issue and highlight the need for additional action to combat trafficking. I appreciate very much the efforts of this committee to address the problem of human trafficking and modern slavery and, if confirmed, look forward to working closely with you to achieve impact on this important issue.

NOMINATIONS

WEDNESDAY, JULY 15, 2015

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, DC.

Laura Farnsworth Dogu, of Texas, to be Ambassador to the Republic of Nicaragua
Hon. Roberta S. Jacobson, of Maryland, to be Ambassador to the United Mexican States
Perry L. Holloway, of South Carolina, to be Ambassador to the Co-operative Republic of Guyana
Peter F. Mulrean, of Massachusetts, to be Ambassador to the Republic of Haiti

The committee met, pursuant to notice, at 3:52 p.m., in room SD-419, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Hon. Marco Rubio presiding.

Present: Senators Rubio, Flake, and Menendez.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. MARCO RUBIO, U.S. SENATOR FROM FLORIDA

Senator RUBIO. The hearing today is to consider the U.S. Ambassador nominees to Guyana, Nicaragua, Mexico, and Haiti. All of these countries face different challenges, and I look forward to discussing them with our nominees today.

I want to thank all of our nominees for their dedication to public service, and welcome their families and friends who are present here today.

In a moment, I will recognize Ranking Member Boxer upon her return for opening remarks. The Senate is currently in the middle of a series of votes, and in a moment, I want to address that with each of you. But she will be here in a moment.

Our nominees are Mr. Perry Lee Holloway. He is the nominee to Guyana. He is a career member of the Senior Foreign Service who most recently served as political military counsel to the U.S. Embassy in Kabul, Afghanistan.

Ms. Laura Farnsworth Dogu is the nominee to Nicaragua. She is a career member of the Senior Foreign Service and currently serves as the deputy chief of mission at the U.S. Embassy in Mexico City.

Ms. Roberta Jacobson is the nominee to Mexico, and she is also a career member of the Senior Foreign Service and is currently the Assistant Secretary of State for Western Hemisphere.

I would add that I am sorry to hear about your son's recent accident, but we pray that he will have a speedy recovery, and we know it has been a difficult few days for you.

And Mr. Peter Mulrean is the nominee to Haiti, and he is also a career member of the Senior Foreign Service and currently serves as deputy chief of mission of the U.S. mission to the United Nations in Geneva.

Let me just say at the outset, I was hoping we might just dispense today with opening statements, unless any of you feel passionately about making them. They are written and in the record. The problem is that at 5 o'clock, there is an all-members meeting on the Authorization for Use of Military Force, so we will have to stop this hearing in less than about an hour and 5 minutes. And with votes going on, we are going to have members coming in and out.

So unless any of you feel passionately about the need to read your opening statements in the record, they have been duly noted, and I will just begin with questions.

I will start with Ms. Jacobson.

Mexico, as I know you believe and understand, is an important friend and ally in dealing with a wide range of bilateral and hemispheric issues. We share close cultural and economic and security ties with them. And that is why I think all Americans are very concerned about the events of this past week.

On Saturday, their most notorious drug lord, Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman broke out of a high-security prison on Saturday night for the second time, escaping in a tunnel built right under his cell despite, according to press reports, the Mexican authorities having been warned by the DEA as early as 2014 about his escape plans. So given this and given El Chapo's history of escape, his reported limitless resources, and the known corruption within the justice system and parts of Mexico, are you aware if the Department of Justice formally submitted an extradition request to the Department of State for El Chapo Guzman?

Ms. JACOBSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you for your good wishes on my son. I greatly appreciate that.

We are incredibly frustrated and disappointed by the escape of Chapo Guzman. We obviously, along with the Mexican Government, will work in support of the Mexican Government to recapture him as quickly as possible.

What I can say is that obviously we are always interested in the extradition of criminal suspects in other countries who face charges in the United States. And there were pending charges against Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman in the United States. And further detail, I cannot get into in terms of pending or possible extradition matters. Those are matters that the Justice Department would have to respond to that. But we can say that we are always interested in the extradition of those who face multiple serious crimes in the United States.

Senator RUBIO. Let me switch to another topic. According to the International Christian World Concern and Christian Solidarity Worldwide, religious intolerance frequently characterized by violence and forced displacement are common in the states of Oaxaca, Guerrero, Puebla, Hidalgo, and Chiapas. These religious freedom groups have pointed out that state government officials tasked with dealing with these kinds of issues and cases often have little or no training in human rights or religious freedom, leading to the proliferation of these types of abuses in violation of Mexico's Constitution.

So, if confirmed, will you prioritize the issue of religious freedom and tolerance in Mexico? And what approach will you take to engage the Mexican Government on the state and federal levels to support efforts to train government officials on religious freedom and other basic human rights and upholding the rule of law?

STATEMENT OF ROBERTA S. JACOBSON, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE UNITED MEXICAN STATES

Ms. JACOBSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Certainly, I would make that a priority, as I think it is one for this administration. I do think that we appreciated your staff bringing these cases to our attention. The Embassy has already raised these issues at the federal and state level, and I would, certainly, prioritize continuing to do so with the Mexican Government as well as with civil society organizations.

Senator RUBIO. Before I pivot to one of the other nominees, I wanted to briefly discuss your existing record of service to our country by examining for a moment the Venezuela Defense of Human Rights and Civil Society Act of 2014, which imposed targeted sanctions on persons responsible for the violation of human rights of antigovernment protesters in Venezuela. As you know, the President eventually signed this bill into law.

Could you tell us a little bit about your role in the administration's decisionmaking about the implementation of this legislation, specifically, which individuals would be sanctioned, et cetera? What role did you play in that process?

Ms. JACOBSON. In the process of developing the names that would be sanctioned under that law, and remember we are talking about two kinds of sanctions, as you well know, of course, both visa sanctions and financial sanctions, visa sanctions, we had already at the time of the passage of the law and subsequently, we have sanctioned a total of, I believe, 62 Venezuelan individuals. And those names were generated by a combination of various offices within the interagency community as well as our Embassy in Caracas.

The same process is used for the list that is developed for financial sanctions, working, in particular, with the Treasury Department as well as other entities of the U.S. Government. And as those names are developed, the Assistant Secretary is not in the position of actually reviewing and saying particular names should go on or off, but a list is presented after the interagency has come up with the most information they can on candidates.

So I did see the list of names once it had been developed by the interagency community.

Senator RUBIO. In specifics, Diosdado Cabello, who is the president of the National Assembly of Venezuela, and perhaps the most corrupt individual in Venezuela, which is a very high mark, was not included in that list.

Is there any insight you can provide as to why he was not included?

Ms. JACOBSON. I really cannot. I know that there is a standard of information that is reviewed, and whether someone is on the list or not on the list depends on the kind of information that various agencies may have. So I cannot say why his name would or would not be on the list when that list would come to me or others to approve it.

Senator RUBIO. Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Jacobson follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF ROBERTA S. JACOBSON

Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Boxer, and members of the committee, it is a great honor and privilege to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to serve as the next United States Ambassador to Mexico. I am deeply appreciative of the confidence the President and Secretary Kerry have placed in me by my nomination. I am also very grateful for the support of my family, beginning with my husband, Jonathan, and our sons, Gil and Daniel.

I have spent my entire 30-year career with the Department of State working on the relationship between the United States and the Americas/Western Hemisphere. As Director of the Office of Mexican Affairs for nearly 5 years, I became acutely aware of Mexico's gravitational pull on the gamut of U.S. interests in Latin America.

That relationship is unique in its enormous breadth and complexity and in its direct impact on the security, prosperity, and well-being of U.S. citizens every day. All evidence points to an even more interdependent future for our two countries. Almost $1.5 billion in trade crosses the U.S.-Mexico border each day, supporting millions of U.S. jobs. Hundreds of thousands of people cross our nearly 2,000-mile long border legally each day and Mexico is, by far, the top foreign destination for American travelers. Fully 10 percent of all Americans—more than 33 million—are of Mexican heritage. The Mexican-American community is a vital part of our culture, our politics, and our values.

I led the team that worked closely with you in Congress to develop the U.S. proposal for the Merida Initiative, negotiated with Cabinet-level Mexican counterparts, and supervised the delivery of U.S. training and equipment over a 4-year period that gave Mexico an equity partnership in supporting our mutual security needs. We now have an unprecedented level of cooperation that is a model for security partnerships everywhere. In my 4 years as Assistant Secretary of State for Western Hemisphere Affairs, I have remained deeply engaged in all aspects of our complex ties with Mexico and I am deeply honored that the President has nominated me to serve as Ambassador to Mexico.

If I am confirmed, I will continue to lead our team in further nurturing U.S. interests in Mexico. And while every nominee looks forward to working with, and seeking the advice and counsel of, this committee and the Congress, Mexico is a special case: This body enjoys its own wealth of experience on Mexico, and I intend to mine that wisdom to advance U.S. interests in all aspects of our relationship. My Job One, of course, is to secure and protect our mission personnel and their families as they serve our country in Mexico.

If confirmed as Ambassador, I will continue this administration's focus on a number of key priorities. The first will be to advance U.S. economic competitiveness and deepening the economic ties that are so central to opportunities, good jobs, and growth. And those ties are indeed impressive: two-way trade in goods and services reached $592 billion in 2014—that is more than $1.5 billion daily. Mexican exports to the United States contain on average 40 percent U.S. content. The United States buys more than 70 percent of Mexican crude oil exports and supplies Mexico with refined products and natural gas. Now, more than ever, there are increased opportunities for close partnerships between the United States and Mexico. In May 2013, Presidents Obama and Peña Nieto established two new mechanisms—the High Level Economic Dialogue and the Bilateral Forum on Higher Education, Innovation, and Research—to promote economic opportunities, education and research collaboration, and North American competitiveness. The United States and Mexico are both committed to expanding trade and investment throughout the Asia-Pacific region through the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade agreement.

It will also be essential to reinforce American security through continued cooperation and partnership under the Merida Initiative. The Initiative represents a new chapter in the history of our relationship; one explicitly based on mutual respect and on shared responsibility for combating transnational criminal networks and protecting our citizens from the crime, corruption, and violence they generate. Neither of us can do this alone—nor, under these two administrations, do we have to. The State Department has forged strong partnerships to improve civilian security in affected areas to fight drug trafficking, organized crime, corruption, illicit arms trafficking, money laundering, and demand for drugs on both sides of the border. The U.S. Government also is accelerating efforts to support and hold accountable the institutions that are essential to a stable society—police, justice systems, and civil society organizations—to adequately protect and defend the rule of law and human rights. If confirmed, I will focus on these efforts as the United States continues to promote respect for human rights and the rule of law through our continued high-level diplomatic engagement.

The border is the seam where cooperation is most important to U.S. interests. Improving our ports of entry ensures the safe and efficient flow of people and goods, vital to our economy and that of Mexico. We are committed to bringing our border infrastructure into the 21st century. We have renovated and expanded one of the world's largest border crossings at the San Ysidro port of entry near San Diego, where 50,000 vehicles and 25,000 pedestrians enter the United States each day, as part of ongoing efforts to make crossings as efficient and secure as possible in support of economic growth and development. We are building an innovative pedestrian terminal that will cross the border at the Tijuana Airport to facilitate and expand regional travel for business and pleasure. Nearly 40 percent of the Mexican produce we buy in U.S. supermarkets passes through the Nogales, Arizona, crossing, and our renovations will expedite this vital trade. As we address Mexico's role in legal and clandestine migration to the United States, we must ensure orderly, safe, and lawful migration and protect the most vulnerable migrants. We also must continue close collaboration to address the enomenon of unaccompanied children from Central America.

The United States enjoys robust and historic people-to-people ties with Mexico, to our benefit. We are focused on tapping that great human potential to enrich us both economically and culturally. More than 4,000 U.S. and Mexican students, teachers, and scholars have participated in our binational Fulbright-Garcia Robles program since 1948, and the United States is the top destination for Mexican students studying abroad. The United States and Mexico can accomplish great things together; through educational exchange, English language learning, professional training, and leadership development we can deepen people-to-people ties, develop a 21st century workforce, and expand economic opportunities for our citizens. I will build upon the success of President Obama's 100,000 Strong in the Americas initiative and other innovative ways that expand the opportunities for Americans and Mexicans to build a common future.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, thank you again for the opportunity to appear before you today. If confirmed, I will continue to work diligently to cement the U.S. partnership with Mexico. Muchas gracias, and I will be happy to answer any questions.

Senator RUBIO. Ms. Dogu.

Am I pronouncing this correctly? Is it Dogu?

STATEMENT OF LAURA FARNSWORTH DOGU, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF NICARAGUA

Ms. DOGU. Yes, sir.

Senator RUBIO. Okay, thank you. I just want to make sure I did not mess it up the first time I said it.

So thank you for your service to our country and for your willingness to continue to serve.

I wanted to ask you your thoughts on the potential of a canal that would act similarly to the Panama Canal and connect the Pacific Ocean and the Caribbean Sea through Nicaragua. What are the potential economic and environmental impacts this project can bring to the area?

Ms. DOGU. Thank you for your question, Mr. Chairman.

I have been following the situation with the canal as I have been preparing for this hearing today. Clearly, the United States Government is interested in that, and there are potentially large eco-conomic and environmental impacts. We are concerned with the lack of transparency as this project has been moving forward at this point, and we are watching that very, very carefully.

At this point, we actually do not see that there are sufficient funds to start the construction of the canal at this time. There have been no investors identified other than one company, and we are not sure how that is going to play out.

But if confirmed, I will continue to monitor that situation carefully.

Senator RUBIO. If you are confirmed, I am sure you are aware that there are a number of outstanding property claims from United States citizens against the Nicaraguan Government.

If confirmed, what will be your strategy or your approach to helping with these claims that U.S. citizens currently have against that government?

Ms. DOGU. Thank you, sir. Yes, I have been monitoring that situation as well.

The 527 claim situation is actually in a very good position at this time. It appears that we may be close to resolving the last of those cases for the continuous claimants. Those are people who were U.S. citizens at the time their property was confiscated. There are, however, still many other cases of people who have become U.S. citizens since their property was confiscated. And if confirmed, I will continue to work on this through the U.S. Embassy, both through support through consular operations and through our property office at the Embassy.

But there has been good progress made in that area, and I will continue to work with the Government of Nicaragua to make sure that we continue to move that forward.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Dogu follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF LAURA F. DOGU

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, it is an honor to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to serve as the next United States Ambassador to Nicaragua.

I am grateful for the trust and confidence President Obama and Secretary of State Kerry have shown by sending my name to the Senate for consideration. If confirmed, I look forward to working with you and your colleagues in Congress to protect and support U.S. citizens in Nicaragua. I will also work to promote a Nicaragua with transparent democratic institutions and values and a commitment to human rights, that is more economically integrated with other Central American countries, and that collaborates effectively with us on a growing range of issues.

Growing up, I learned firsthand about the value of serving your country from my father, a career Navy officer who spent a lifetime protecting America with tours of duty across the United States, abroad, and at sea. I would also like to recognize my family, friends, and colleagues who have guided and supported me throughout my life and career.

In preparation for the opportunity to lead our Embassy in Managua, I carefully reviewed White House, Department of State, and Bureau of Western Hemisphere Affairs guidance related to advancing America's interests in global security, inclusive economic growth, climate change, accountable governance and freedom for all. Two points made by President Obama and Secretary Kerry's stood out as particularly relevant to Nicaragua.

President Obama rightly maintained, no system of government can, or should be, imposed upon one nation by any other . . . however, the United States is committed to governments that reflect the will of the people. Each nation gives life to this principle in its own way, grounded in the traditions of its own people. America does not presume to know what is best for everyone, just as we would not presume to pick the outcome of a peaceful election. But . . . all people yearn for certain things: the ability to speak your mind and have a say in how you are governed; confidence in the rule of law and the equal administration of justice; government that is transparent and does not steal from the people; the freedom to live as you choose. Those are not just American ideas, they are human rights, and that is why we will support them everywhere.

If confirmed, I will be a strong proponent for these universal values. Nicaragua, in which human rights, democracy, and a vibrant civil society flourish, represents the surest path to attracting direct foreign investment and tackling endemic poverty in the country. More importantly, the universal values reinforce the importance of the people of Nicaragua choosing their own destiny as a people and nation. If confirmed, the Embassy will continue to regularly maintain contact with a wide range of Nicaraguan advocates on behalf of human, civil, and political rights. I will also seek opportunities to make the same case with leaders at the highest level.

Secretary Kerry said, “. . . we have to work together to eliminate extreme poverty through inclusive economic growth—because we know that no society can thrive when entire segments of the population are excluded from opportunity.”

From 1991 to 2006, three successive Nicaraguan administrations focused on free market reform as the path to recovery after 12 years of economic free-fall during the period of revolution and civil war. These policies achieved macroeconomic stability, cutting inflation from 33,548 percent in 1988 to 6.43 percent in 2014. Nicaragua also benefited from significant debt reduction through the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) Initiative. Since 1995, the economy has expanded at an average annual real growth rate of 4 percent. Even so, with a gross domestic product of $11.8 billion and a per capita income of $1,904 in 2014, Nicaragua remains the second-poorest country in the Western Hemisphere. Growth must almost double to significantly reduce the rate of poverty. Such growth is possible only with strong, more accountable public institutions.

If confirmed, I will work hard to promote trade links, transparency, and the rule of law. Trade and investment opportunities are mutually beneficial and open the door for greater engagement on other essential U.S. priorities such as the development of stronger democratic institutions.

Along these lines, the Strategy for U.S. Engagement in Central America promotes prosperity, governance, and security. Key to Central America's success is regional economic integration. Central America must integrate economically in order to compete globally. Our engagement with Nicaragua under this strategy will advance governance, regional integration, prosperity, and security.

The occasion of my nomination as Ambassador leads me to reflect on my Foreign Service career. In posts as far flung as El Salvador, Turkey, Egypt, and twice in Mexico, as well as in Washington, DC, I have led dynamic teams, which have made real progress addressing rule of law, democracy, economic growth, transparency, and the protection of American citizens. Taken together, this extensive experience has prepared me to serve as Ambassador to Nicaragua if confirmed.

Mr. Chairman, committee members, I thank you again for your consideration of my nomination and I welcome your questions.

Senator RUBIO. Mr. Holloway, after the recent discovery of oil off the coast of Guyana, Venezuela has made territorial claims into the Caribbean Sea, including the oilfield discovery that already belongs to Guyana.

So what is our current U.S. policy with regards to this dispute between Venezuela and Guyana?

STATEMENT OF PERRY L. HOLLOWAY, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE COOPERATIVE REPUBLIC OF GUYANA

Mr. HOLLOWAY. Thank you, sir.

In spite of an 1899 decision, which granted most of the territory in dispute to Guyana, Venezuela has historically maintained claims to different parts of up to 67 percent of Guyana and parts of the coastline. Our policy so far to date is that we have been, as we have in many disputes like this, have encouraged both countries to seek out a peaceful resolution, whether it be by the U.N. or any other appropriate international fora.

But at the same time, any country that makes claims still has to respect the Rule of the Sea and other international obligations, so we are monitoring it very closely.

The Venezuelans put out another statement very recently, which replaced the one that had been done a few weeks ago. We are still trying to analyze that and understand it better.

But we are encouraging both sides to reach a peaceful resolution. Senator RUBIO. Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Holloway follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF PERRY L. HOLLOWAY

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today. I am deeply honored that President Obama has nominated me to serve as the United States Ambassador to the Cooperative Republic of Guyana. If confirmed, I look forward to working closely with this committee and all Members of Congress to advance our Nation's interests in Guyana and the broader Caribbean region.

I would like to take a moment to recognize the tremendous support throughout my career from my wife, Rosaura Holloway, who is here with me today, and my daughter Paula, who is also here, and my son Nicholas, who could not be here. They have all benefited and suffered as a result of my career choice, and I want to thank them for their support. I would also like to single out my mom, Peggy Franklin, who is in South Carolina and who laid the basic foundation for me to have the opportunity to appear before you today.

Mr. Chairman, I have had the honor to serve our country as a Foreign Service officer for the past 26 years in nine countries. I have served primarily in countries in the Western Hemisphere, so I am familiar with the types of challenges and opportunities that exist in Guyana. I have worked on programs dealing with security, drug trafficking, democratic values and human rights, energy and the environment, trafficking in persons, corruption, and the exchange of people and ideas. I have extensive experience with interagency partners like USAID, DOD, Peace Corps, DEA, and DHS. If confirmed, I believe that my experience in the region and my work with other agencies has prepared me well to lead the U.S. mission in Guyana.

Guyana is a country with tremendous potential. It has vast pristine rainforests, fertile agricultural lands, proven mineral resources, potentially large oil reserves, and a close affinity with the United States. It is also a country facing challenges from crime, poverty, corruption, HIV/AIDS, natural resource management, and drug trafficking. If confirmed, I will work with the government and people of Guyana to confront these challenges and to continue to bolster economic growth, strengthen democracy and governance, improve the respect for human rights and rule of law, and promote opportunity for all. These are clearly areas of mutual interest.

Guyana is also a key partner in bolstering regional security. Through the President's Caribbean Basin Security Initiative, we are cooperating to counter the threats of transnational crime and terrorism. Improved security for all citizens of the Caribbean is essential to the region's future stability and prosperity, as well as to our interests. I will work closely with the appropriate agencies of the U.S. Government to strengthen our security cooperation with Guyana.

Guyana is one of the poorest countries in the hemisphere. That is why we have historically worked with the government and private sector to support efforts to diversify the economy and create new opportunities in agribusiness, aquaculture, wood products, and ecotourism. If confirmed, I will continue to work with the government and private sector to strengthen Guyana's market competitiveness, build its trade capacity, improve the investment climate, and promote greater two-way trade with the United States.

Guyana is also a leader in efforts to address global climate change through its low carbon development strategy that is helping preserve its vast rain forest. We have worked with the Government of Guyana to develop sustainable forestry and ecotourism and to enhance its capacity to implement the Reduced Emissions from Deforestation and Forest Degradation, or REDD initiative, while also encouraging sustainable economic development. I hope to have the opportunity to continue these efforts.

HIV/AIDS is a problem in Guyana and the United States has made a significant contribution to combating this disease with over $165 million invested since 2004. Our funding has made a difference. Guyana's prevention and care programs, central laboratory, and state-of-the-art logistics system are models for others in the region. The program has also benefited Guyana's health systems by enhancing the country's laboratory capacity, improving the ability to store and distribute medicines, and strengthening the management of broader health services. As a result of these U.S. Government investments, Guyana now is able to respond to the threats from infectious diseases. If confirmed, I will work with the government and other health partners to sustain the gains we have made and transition ownership of the programs to the Government of Guyana.

Mr. Chairman, Guyana recently held national elections and the party that had been in power since the country's first democratic elections nearly 23 years ago was replaced. The elections were deemed free and fair by the international community. This is an important indicator that Guyana is continuing to build on progress it has made since emerging as an independent nation in 1966 and instituting multiparty democracy in 1992. The new President and his multiethnic coalition government have embarked on an ambitious transformative agenda for the country that centers on eliminating racial and ethnic exclusion, countering organized crime, combating corruption, developing infrastructure, broadening economic growth, and establishing sustainable management of the country's natural resources. The government's agenda largely coincides with our own interests, providing us new opportunities to confront long-standing challenges. I look forward to working with all relevant actors to ensure that the bilateral relationship continues to be one based on shared interests and mutual respect. If confirmed, I will continue the work we have been doing with the government and civil society on programs to strengthen governance structures, promote constructive political dialogue, and encourage greater citizen participation in the political process—all necessary for a strong democracy.

The United States has a special link to Guyana through the many Guyanese who live in our country. It is estimated that there are more than 300,000 Guyanese in the United States and maybe another million people here of Guyanese descent. In Guyana itself, estimates are that over 70 percent of Guyana's citizens have family living in the United States. If confirmed, I look forward to collaborating with the hard-working diasporas in New York, New Jersey, Florida, and other states to find ways that they can contribute to a more stable and prosperous Guyana.

Guyana is a Caribbean country located in South America. The Caribbean Community, or CARICOM, headquarters is in Guyana. If confirmed, I would also serve as the U.S. representative to CARICOM, whose 15 member states work together to promote regional integration and cooperation. CARICOM has a vital role in building a secure and prosperous Caribbean, and I look forward to working with the Secretary General and CARICOM states to strengthen the Organization and our relationship with it, while also advancing our common interests throughout the Caribbean with respect to trade, investment, energy, development, and security.

Mr. Chairman, these are just some of the opportunities and challenges that the United States is addressing in Guyana and within the Caribbean. If confirmed, I look forward to working with you and your colleagues to improve the already close and productive partnership between the United States, Guyana, and CARICOM. You can count on me to work hard to protect American citizens, promote U.S. business in the region, manage U.S. programs efficiently, and vigorously advance the goals of the United States of America.

I would be happy to answer any questions you may have. Thank you.

Senator RUBIO. Mr. Mulrean, in the 2004 trafficking in persons report, Haiti was listed as a Tier 2 Watchlist for Trafficking. The majority of Haiti's cases were identified as children in domestic servitude.

We discussed that a moment ago in a previous hearing. I think you had a chance to watch some of that.

Haiti has been granted a waiver from being placed on a Tier 3 because it had a written plan, which would make significant steps toward combating trafficking. How would you assess the implementation of their plan to combat trafficking, at this point?

STATEMENT OF PETER F. MULREAN, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF HAITI

Mr. MULREAN. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

As you stated, 2014 was a good year on paper for Haiti regarding trafficking in persons. There was passage of the antitrafficking legislation, and they created a plan for the next 2 years, 2015 to 2017, for implementing it.

At the moment, they have begun to take positive steps, and they have set up what looks like a whole-of-government approach, but the proof of it will be in their execution. At this point, the execution is nascent.

I think the government has an understanding of the seriousness of the situation. But at this point, we are waiting to see them take the serious steps. As with so many other issues in Haiti, it is a question both of capacity, having the institutional capacity whether it is with the police, even the NGOs, and the institutional capacity to deal with these, the judicial capacity to prosecute. But it also, sir, a question of political will. And we are hoping, as with many other things, that after the upcoming elections, we will have a President and a Parliament in place that will be willing to put political will into some of these difficult issues.

Senator RUBIO. Trafficking for domestic servitude is one of the issues that receives a tremendous amount of attention, but there has also been extensive media reporting over the last few years of children being sold into sex slavery, including in makeshift brothels that exist on the border region with the Dominican Republic.

How familiar are you with that? What is the status of that over the last 5 years? And would that be a priority for our Embassy in Port-au-Prince, if confirmed?

Mr. MULREAN. Well, let me start off by saying that, if confirmed, it would absolutely be a priority, as I believe it already is for the Embassy in Port-au-Prince.

I am not familiar with the current details of the trafficking on the border area. We have, however, taken significant steps in terms of our assistance programs, both on supporting civil society to do awareness-raising and advocacy as well as to deal with the victims of trafficking. We are also working with the Government of Haiti to increase capacity in identifying awareness.

There are a number of issues that have been stalled by the current political impasse of the last 2 years, but we will give it our utmost to move this issue forward.

Senator RUBIO. As you know, cholera has already taken the lives of over 8,900 Haitians and infected about 744,000 of them. Given the disturbing new spike in cases of cholera in Haiti, what initiatives is the United States undertaking or will the United States undertake to help address ongoing epidemic?

Mr. MULREAN. Thank you, Senator.

The incidence of cholera has seen a recent spike, but this is after a 92 percent reduction in cases in the last couple years. The United States has put $95 million into a program of activities that has both been to deal with the immediate response to the cholera cases, but in some ways even more importantly to build into the national health system the ability to deal with cholera and, in the future, other communicable diseases.

We coordinate closely with other donors, and we do believe that the situation, while troubling given the recent increase, is not out of control.

Senator RUBIO. Well, let me ask you, what will the United States do to ensure that the United Nations is held accountable for those already harmed by the disease?

Mr. MULREAN. Sir, the United Nations, in response to the cholera outbreak, has been heavily engaged in the response through the World Health Organization and others. They are in a position, as the coordinator of a lot of assistance activities, to ensure that the follow-through reduces cholera to a point where it is as close to zero as can be.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Mulrean follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF PETER F. MULREAN

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am honored to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to serve as U.S. Ambassador to the Republic of Haiti. I am grateful for the trust and confidence President Obama and Secretary Kerry have placed in me by nominating me to this important post. If confirmed, I look forward to working with you on Haiti, a country joined with the United States by broad and deeply rooted ties, both historical and contemporary, institutional and individual.

I have had the privilege of serving in the Foreign Service for the past 27 years and the great fortune to be a witness to, and occasionally a participant in, significant developments of the past generation. My career has taken me from the former Yugoslavia as it crumbled, to India as it awoke economically. I have helped oversee innovative reform programs during transitions in Eastern Europe, the Middle East, and Afghanistan. I have worked closely with the U.N. on humanitarian response to a series of crises and on efforts to build peace and to defend the rights of all individuals. Reaching beyond governments, I have learned the power of partnership with civil society, business and the media in advancing common objectives. And as I stand before both the challenges and opportunities in Haiti, I believe all of this experience would serve me well if confirmed.

Throughout its history, Haiti has often been viewed as a symbol of powerful ideas and forces. Having defeated the most formidable military power of the time and definitively thrown off the chains of slavery, Haiti became the second independent nation in the Western Hemisphere. For this, Simon Bolivar praised Haiti for its contribution to the liberation of Latin America. Diplomatic relations between the United States and Haiti stretch back more than 150 years, and among those who have served as U.S. Minister to the Republic of Haiti was the great civil rights leader Frederick Douglass. The United States is also home to a substantial and vigorous Haitian diaspora with strong patriotic feelings. Both in their homeland and abroad, Haitians are rightly known for their energy, resilience, creativity, pride, and strong sense of history.

That history is marked by stirring achievements, but also by periods of violence and misrule, which allowed human rights abuses to go unpunished and left ground for poverty to take root. Although Haiti is a country of vivid images, this does not mean it is always perceived clearly by the international community. Misfortunes such as hurricanes, disease, and the devastating 2010 earthquake are too often what put Haiti on the front pages. But the United States recognizes that while challenges and problems are part of Haiti's reality, they are not the sum of Haiti's reality. Having helped address Haiti's immediate humanitarian needs in the wake of the earthquake, the United States is focused on supporting the country's longer term development, working in partnership through a Haitian-led process to help the country build a more promising future.

The U.S. strategy to help Haiti become a more democratic and prosperous neighbor involves both near term and longer term goals. The most pressing task facing Haiti is, of course, the holding of successful and peaceful parliamentary, local government, and Presidential elections. The United States strongly recognizes the importance of all Haitians being able to go to the polls to participate in representative governance through a credible and transparent electoral process. I know that Congress shares this goal, and your consistent underscoring of the importance of Haitians freely expressing their preferences at the ballot box has been invaluable in moving Haiti forward toward elections.

The United States commends Haitian President Michel Martelly and the members of Haiti's independent Provisional Electoral Council (CEP) for their efforts to prioritize the holding of elections this year. I would emphasize that the United States has no vote in these elections and does not support any candidate or group of candidates. Simply put, we support the democratic process. We are pleased that an electoral decree and calendar have been published, and we are committed to working with the Government of Haiti and our international partners to coordinate appropriate assistance—including the deployment of international observers—to help ensure that elections are inclusive, transparent and credible. As electoral planning continues, the United States supports the CEP, the United Nations, the OAS, and the Government of Haiti (including its national police) in their efforts to coordinate, support, and execute successful 2015 elections. We are encouraging all actors to participate fully in the electoral process, to abide by the rule of law, and to pledge to a high standard of transparency.

Successful elections are the highest priority of our near term engagement with Haiti. The citizens of Haiti choosing their leaders and representatives through fair, democratic means feeds into and reinforces our broader, longer term goal of fostering good governance, which in turn is essential for building capacity. There are no quick fixes or shortcuts; the process requires a long-term commitment on our part. And, while the commitment of the United States is steadfast, Haiti's success will, ultimately, depend on the actions of the Haitian people. We can advise and assist, but Haiti's development must reflect goals and priorities that the government and people of Haiti have identified, and for which they are exercising ownership. In coordination with other donors, the United States is working to equip key Haitian institutions with the skills necessary to manage resources, both financial and human, and to plan and execute projects. The confidence of the Haitian people in their government will in large part depend on its effectiveness in delivering basic services.

That said, sustained capacity-building and effective governance require funds. Regardless of our efforts in other areas, without a healthy economy, Haiti will remain poor and dependent. It is indisputable that no long-term development goals in Haiti can be sustainable without the growth of the private sector. Therefore, helping Haiti strengthen, expand, and diversify its economy is a key element of our strategy. Haiti has seen positive economic growth since the earthquake, but more needs to be done. Unfortunately, political gridlock has hindered progress. The impasse between Haiti's executive and legislative branches has stymied the passage of legislation in such important areas as an updated business code, an updated criminal code, clarification of property rights, and the provision of electronic signatures. Advances in these areas would strengthen investor confidence in the Government of Haiti's pledge that "Haiti is open for business."

Thanks to consistent, broad, bipartisan support in Congress, U.S. Government assistance to Haiti has been substantial. Since the earthquake, $4.1 billion has been made available in immediate humanitarian assistance following the earthquake and for long-term reconstruction. Of the $4.1 billion made available, 80 percent—$1.3 billion for humanitarian relief and $2.0 billion for reconstruction and development has been disbursed. Since 2010, U.S. post-earthquake assistance to Haiti has helped to measurably improve key economic and social indicators and build infrastructure necessary for self-sustaining growth.

In response to Haiti's desire for investments that support economic growth outside of Port-au-Prince, the United States has targeted some of its most significant assistance to one of Haiti's poorest regions in the North. The Caracol Industrial Park (CIP) is a public-private partnership that is funded by the Inter-American Development Bank and is owned by the Government of Haiti. The U.S. Government contribution consists primarily of support for building a modern power plant that is now providing reliable electricity to the CIP as well as more than 7,000 local businesses and households in the community. Caracol was conceived as a long-term public-private investment in Haiti's north and will require time and continued support to reach its full potential. As of July 2015, in just 3 years of operation, approximately 7,500 jobs have been created at the Caracol Industrial Park. More jobs are expected as facilities expand. Anchor tenant Sae-A is projected to eventually create 20,000 jobs, and the Haitian owned Coles Group has announced it will create 2,500 jobs at Caracol once further phases of construction are completed. Apparel accounts for over 90 percent of U.S. imports from Haiti. Thanks to the preferences accorded under the HELP and HOPE Acts, apparel imports from Haiti are up, increasing by over 6 percent in 2014 to a total of $854 million. Also promising is the growth of value-added apparel exports which increased by 43 percent in 2014, signaling a movement toward more complex products that could yield higher wages for Haitian employees. This growth would not have been possible without congressional action on the HELP and HOPE Acts.

The United States has also helped Haiti increase agricultural productivity by introducing improved seeds, fertilizer, and technologies to more than 70,000 farmers, which have helped increase yields for rice, corn, bean, and plantain crops as well as increase mango exports by 175 percent. Our funding has placed over 33,000 hectares of hillside farmland under improved watershed management. We have supported an innovative business-plan competition that provides matching grants of up to $200,000 to small- and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) investing their own capital to expand their businesses. So far, 60 businesses have received technical assistance, of which 31 were awarded grants, leveraging over $10 million in private capital for a total investment of over $15 million. Through our assistance programs we have extended Development Credit Authority guarantees of up to $57 million in loans by local commercial banks, microfinance institutions, and credit unions. Working through the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID), the U.S. Government has also partnered with the Overseas Private Investment Corporation to bring $26 million of long-term financing and technical assistance to Haiti for housing finance, as well as working capital loans to SMEs. Additionally, the U.S. Treasury Department is providing technical assistance to the Ministry of Finance to improve budgeting, tax collection, and cash and debt management.

The United States has also increased agricultural productivity in Haiti by supporting more than 300 farmer associations comprising more than 70,000 farmers. This has led to increased crop yields and gross profit margins for maize, beans, rice and plantains by a minimum of five times, and has increased mango exports by 250 percent. Our funding has placed over 33,000 hectares of hillside farmland under improved watershed management. We have supported an innovative business plan competition that provides matching grants of up to $200,000 to small- and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) investing their own capital to expand their businesses. So far, 60 businesses have received technical assistance, of which 32 were selected to receive over $5 million in matching funds to expand operations; those firms have invested an additional $10 million of their own funds. Through our assistance programs we have extended Development Credit Authority guarantees of up to $57 million in loans by local commercial banks, microfinance institutions, and credit unions. Working through the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID), the U.S. Government has also partnered with the Overseas Private Investment Corporation to bring $26 million of long-term financing and technical assistance to Haiti for housing finance, as well as working capital loans to SMEs. Additionally, the U.S. Treasury Department is providing technical assistance to the Ministry of Finance to improve budgeting, tax collection, and cash and debt management.

The United States is also working to help improve justice and security for Haitians. Since the earthquake our assistance has made possible the training and commissioning of 3,300 new officers in the Haitian National Police (HNP). The capacity and professionalism of the HNP is increasingly important as the U.N. Stabilization Mission in Haiti (MINUSTAH) draws down. The HNP's performance has indeed vastly improved, most notably in antiskidnapping investigations and crowd control capacities. We have helped create a new HNP community policing unit, which has grown to over 80 officers, in partnership with the New York City Police Department and MINUSTAH. Using approximately $54M in FY10 Supplemental funds, the USG completed construction of six commissariats, barracks at the Presidential palace, and a pier; construction of three prisons, a range of facilities for the counternarcotics police (BLTS), and improvements at the HNP School are all underway. Our programs have trained and equipped the BLTS, increasing its size from about 40 to almost 200 officers and adding a 19-dog K-9 unit. The Miami-Dade Police Department trained 74 counternarcotics officers to help ensure sustainability of our counternarcotics efforts. Funding from the U.S. Government has supported the training of 2,392 judicial actors and helped reconstruct more than 32,000 judicial case files following earthquake loss or damage. Much work remains, especially in the judicial and corrections sectors, but with U.S. assistance the Government of Haiti is increasingly providing improved security for its people.

A positive sign is that the number of Haitians attempting to leave Haiti for the United States is down. To help deter dangerous and illegal sea migration and address a localized surge in human smuggling in the waters off of Puerto Rico, the United States resumed in October 2014 the expedited removal of newly arrived Haitian migrants illegally present on U.S. islands in the Mona Passage or on Puerto Rico. At the same time, the United States established a safe, lawful alternative to migrant voyages through the Haitian Family Reunification Parole (HFRP) program, which allows eligible Haitian beneficiaries of family-based immigrant visa petitions to come to the United States and join their families before their immigrant visa priority dates become current. The resumption of expedited removal operations in the Mona Passage and the opportunities provided through the HFRP program have led to a marked decrease in illegal sea migrant activity, with U.S. Coast Guard migrant interdiction statistics showing a decrease in the number of Haitians attempting to enter the United States illegally by boat in the first quarter of FY 2015 compared to the same period in FY 2014.

One aspect of Haitian security involves the situation along its border with the Dominican Republic. We are deeply concerned by the reports from the Dominican Republic that tens of thousands of people, mostly Haitians and people of Haitian descent, have crossed the border from the Dominican Republic into Haiti since June 17. We are monitoring the situation closely and actively engaging with the Government of the Dominican Republic, the Government of Haiti, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the International Organization for Migration, civil society organizations, and the international community to confirm that the appropriate authorities work to ensure the security and welfare of all who cross the border and the protection of their human rights. The United States is also funding civil society organizations and international organizations, including the International Organization for Migration (IOM), to assist with these efforts. We continue to encourage the Governments of the Dominican Republic and Haiti to consult and collaborate with each other and with civil society groups and international organizations to develop and duly implement processes that uphold the rule of law, provide procedural safeguards, and are consistent with each country's international obligations and commitments. If confirmed by the Senate, I will do my utmost on this priority issue.

Development work in Haiti has never been easy and we are committed to active monitoring and evaluation of all our assistance activities to maximize their impact in support of our strategy. There are projects on which we have not attained the results initially expected and we have made adjustments accordingly. The three main areas where we have made mid-course corrections have involved new housing construction, a new port facility, and providing more assistance directly to Haitian organizations. Building permanent new homes proved more costly and time consuming than projected. This led to a shift in the permanent housing strategy, to emphasize private-sector housing finance opportunities for low-income Haitians, neighborhood upgrades, and support to help Haitians transition temporary facilities into safe permanent communities. Regarding a new port in the Fort Liberté area in Haiti's north, there is not sufficient interest at this time from the private sector to support construction. Therefore, the Government of Haiti agreed that a more effective strategy would be to modernize and upgrade existing port facilities at nearby Cap-Haïtien. We agreed, and this project is currently underway. Finally, in the immediate aftermath of the earthquake, which crippled many local Haitian NGOs, the U.S. Government used international NGOs to initiate emergency relief efforts. They had the advantage of being immediately operational and they had vast experience expediting the provision of food, shelter, and security in an unstable environment. Now that Haiti has transitioned to long-term reconstruction and development, U.S. investments support a more sustainable development approach that includes building the capacity of local organizations. Today, the U.S. Government is helping local organizations develop their administrative and financial capacities—in particular accounting, reporting, and audit preparation functions—so that they can better compete to be direct recipients of U.S. funding. I attach great importance to our new approach to increase direct support to Haitian organizations.

We have tried to learn from our course corrections. Despite having fallen short of our original objectives in some cases, we can credit U.S. assistance for genuine positive developments in Haiti. Our funding helped house more than 328,000 earthquake-displaced Haitians by providing transitional shelters, repairs to damaged homes, support to host families, and rental vouchers. Almost 95 percent of displaced persons have left the tent camps, which are all but gone. We have funded the removal of 2.7 million cubic meters of earthquake rubble—36 percent of the estimated 7.4 million cubic meters of total rubble removed. Our support for Haiti's infrastructure includes the reconstruction of Haiti's University Hospital and other damaged health facilities, and the construction of seven police stations and the Presidential security unit barracks. Nearly half of all Haitians have access to basic health services at U.S.-supported health facilities, and we have provided $95 million for cholera treatment and prevention, including clean water and sanitation activities. This has led to improved basic health indicators and a dramatic decrease in the incidence of cholera. Primary school enrollment is up, with the United States funding the construction of more than 600 semipermanent furnished classrooms, enabling over 60,000 children to return to school. We have helped more than 100,000 businesses and households convert cook stoves from charcoal to clean liquefied natural gas, and supported the planting of 5 million tree seedlings.

Welcome as these improvements are, more needs to be done—particularly in the area of effective governance. Haiti's leaders must foster a political, societal, and economic environment conducive to economic development and prosperity. Sustained development will not be possible without responsive, accountable, and transparent governance; without just application of the rule of law and respect for human rights; without new laws and changes in existing ones to attract investment; and without a fully staffed and functioning government in every branch.

In analyzing Haiti's prospects for building a better future, and how the United States can help, we must look realistically at the challenges that country faces, but also not lose sight of factors working in its favor. One of the most important of these is the widespread support Haiti enjoys among the American public in general and here on Capitol Hill in particular. Support from Congress was swift, tangible, and significant, totaling $4 billion in post-earthquake assistance appropriated. No less important has been your sustained attention to that country, particularly at times when steps in democratic progress have needed encouragement. If confirmed as Ambassador to Haiti, I look forward to working with you in addressing our shared goal of helping Haiti move forward, and I would encourage you to visit.

As valuable as American support is, the greatest of Haiti's assets, its ace in the hole, is its people. Although by some economic indices Haiti ranks as the poorest nation in the Western Hemisphere, in human capital it is rich. Haitians have demonstrated dynamism, resilience, creativity, and courage on a scale far beyond the country's modest size. We seek to help Haitians create the conditions—political, economic, and social—in which these talents can be put to best use.

Much remains to be done in Haiti, and I would not wish to understate the scope of the task or the need for a long-term commitment in order to achieve lasting progress. But the past 5 years have also been marked by measurable improvements in the lives of Haitians and genuine accomplishments in Haiti's recovery and development. Americans can take satisfaction in helping Haitians help themselves. If confirmed by the Senate, I will do my utmost to focus on a realistic and achievable agenda to help make the U.S.-Haitian partnership stronger than ever.

Senator RUBIO. I await the arrival of my colleagues, so I will just keep going for a little while.

I wanted to return to Mexico for a moment, Ms. Jacobson. For a lot of Americans, there has been a lot of discussion the past few weeks and months about the state of affairs in Mexico. I think Mexico has a lot to be optimistic about.

One of the things that people are concerned about, I, certainly, have been, watching both from this committee and from the Intelligence Committee, is the notion that there are regions in the northern part of Mexico that are not fully in the control of their government. In essence that criminal groups have de facto control these areas and, in particular, one of the groups that is controlled by this horrific individual who was able to escape in the last few days and poses a threat to the United States and to his own people.

I would just take an aside to say I have seen some chatter over the last few days that I think clearly understates who it is that we are dealing with here in this individual, El Chapo. He is a murderer, a person who is involved in virtually every nefarious activity one can imagine, including kidnapping, murders, and crimes committed within the United States facilitated by his organization.

How would you describe the challenges the Mexican Government faces in terms of providing security and stability, particularly in those areas where perhaps they do not have effective control over their territory as they would desire to have?

Ms. JACOBSON. I think, Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I think I would want to associate myself entirely with your characterization of El Chapo Guzman. To minimize his role or the horror of what he has wrought with the Sinaloa cartel I think would do a disservice to his victims and to people who have been touched by the trafficking and the violence that the group has wrought.

Clearly, the Government and the people of Mexico face a very complicated and a very difficult security situation. It is much more difficult in about a half-dozen states in the country than elsewhere. It is not nationwide. That is where the majority of the homicides take place, the majority of the drug violence, the majority of the territorial control between and among cartels.

It is important to remember, I think, that during the congressional and gubernatorial elections that took place a little over a month ago, I guess, just about a month ago, 99 percent of polling stations opened and operated normally around the country, even in some of those places that have had high levels of violence. So they were able to undertake the elections and people were able to vote freely even in places where you had rumors that they would not be able to exercise their vote.

So I think that the notion that they have lost control of their territory, while clearly they are under siege in some places and there are places where people are fearful of local authorities, and local authorities themselves are part of the problem, not part of the solution, I think that there are a number of places where it has been turned around, where the Mexican Government at the local, state, and federal level have been able to gain back the control.

That is what the Mexican Government continues to work on and we in support of them, places like Ciudad Juarez in Chihuahua, which for a time was really a no-go area and really has been coming back with levels of violence that have dropped.

My colleague here served in Juarez during a very difficult time as a great leader in our consulate.

So I do think that to continue to work on the institutions of government to make sure that they are transparent, on anticorruption mechanisms as the Mexican congress has just passed, is critical to getting a handle on the full gamut of security problems they face.

Senator RUBIO. Another issue that, of course, is well documented in the United States is the migratory issues that we face across the border. Perhaps what many people are not as aware of over the last few years is the trend now of a growing number of people who are crossing the U.S. southern border, the Mexican northern border, are not from Mexico. In particular, we have seen a large upsurge of people migrating from the Northern Triangle countries, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras.

First of all, what is the approach of the Mexican Government, at this stage, to the reality that you know people pushing up through the country from their southern border? And where are the opportunities to work cooperatively with them on both sides of the border to seal off the opportunities to transit illegally, which, in fact, is a magnet for more people to attempt to do it?

Ms. JACOBSON. Absolutely. I think it is a very important question, Senator.

You know, I think last year's surge in migrants from Central America was an important kind of bellwether not just for the United States in how we are focused on Central America and the root causes of such migration, but also for Mexico, which has seen migrants move through its territory for a long time, but not in those kinds of numbers.

In the last year, the numbers coming into the United States have dropped dramatically, but a big part of that has been the Mexican effort to reduce the number of people coming into Mexico at their southern border and to also reduce some of the most dangerous practices that are being affected on migrants, such as riding on the infamous train north, La Bestia, and shutting that down so that migrants cannot be exploited violently on that trip north, including unaccompanied minors.

So we have worked very closely with Mexico on this, including on their southern border strategy, devoting resources, training so that they can help both gain control over their southern border with Guatemala with new task forces working with the Northern Triangle countries, and then obviously working with Mexico but also with the Northern Triangle countries on the root causes that are causing the migrants to flee in the first place.

Senator RUBIO. Okay, thank you.

Senator Flake.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you. I wanted to be here earlier, but votes intervened.

Senator RUBIO. I am going to go now.

Senator FLAKE [presiding]. Okay, now let us get back to Cuba policy. [Laughter.]

Senator FLAKE. Just joking.

Ms. Jacobson, we are very excited, at least I am, certainly, in Arizona to have you headed to Mexico, hopefully, if you are successful in your nomination.

I am sure you talked about some of the border issues. You were talking about some of them when we came in. But what is often overlooked is the tremendous amount of trade that goes on. Mexico is a huge trading partner with the United States and obviously of huge importance to the State of Arizona.

We obviously need border security, better border security than we have. We also need to make sure that we have the infrastructure, not just green uniforms at the border, but blue uniforms as well to facilitate trade.

Can you talk about the importance of that?

Ms. JACOBSON. Absolutely, Senator. Thank you.

I think that what we call the 21st century border strategy that we are working on is so critical to the United States' competitiveness, to North American competitiveness. We know already that many, many goods that we manufacture cross the border many times in that process. We know that $1.5 billion a day in trade crosses the border between the U.S. and Mexico.

But we know that right now our infrastructure is not 21st-century, and we need to get that better. But there are huge improvements being made, whether it is at Nogales, where so much of the winter fruits and vegetables come through to the United States, new crossings that are being opened, the first rail crossing in 100 years.

With our Mexican partners, this is a critical part of our economic strategy for competitiveness of both countries.

We also know that of imports of finished products from Mexico, 40 percent of the inputs to those products are from the United States. The comparable figure from China is 4 percent. So it is good for American jobs to continue working with Mexico in that partnership.

And frankly, security and legitimate trade are not zero-sum. They have to be pursued in tandem along the border. It is the seam that knits us together. And it is critical for the communities, as you know, all along that border.

Senator FLAKE. Right. You mentioned the improvement in infrastructure. On the Arizona side, certainly the Mariposa port, the international border there at Nogales is important, and we have invested quite heavily. There are also commitments on the part of the Mexican Government to undertake certain infrastructure improvements.

How can you help in terms of advocacy to help them comply with their obligations there?

Ms. JACOBSON. I think that is really important. As you know, the Mexican model is a little bit different from ours. There are often concessions. And we have worked very closely with the Mexican Government to try and make sure that to a much greater extent their own planning and our planning match up, so that you do not have cases where either our side is finished before theirs or vice versa. And I would continue, if confirmed, to advocate very strongly to ensure that our planning is done so that we can make sure that their side finishes up as quickly as ours or vice versa, in some cases.

There are now master plans along the border, in most cases, Texas, Arizona, California. Making sure that we coordinate those things across the border is just critical.

You know that the Arizona-Sonora coordination is critical at the State level, and I would do everything I could from the Federal side and the Embassy leadership side, to push the Mexican Government and through them the concessionaire to make sure that we get things moving in sync at all times.

Senator FLAKE. Great. That will, certainly, be helpful. There is a lot of cooperation that goes on in terms of safety inspections and whatnot. If there is good cooperation on the Mexican side of the border, we can smooth and make this a lot easier.

Ms. JACOBSON. And, as you know, preinspection is coming to cargo, and that is very exciting to reduce wait times at the border for products.

Senator FLAKE. We are very excited about that.

Anyway, thank you, all. Because we have votes going on, and I know that Senator Menendez needs to get back as well, I will turn it over to him. But like I said, we are very excited.

For the rest of you all, I will let the other answers stand.

But, Ms. Jacobson, I have been thrilled to work with you in the past and look forward to working with you in the future.

Thank you.

Senator Menendez.

Senator MENENDEZ. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Congratulations to you all for your nominations and your willingness to serve our country.

Ms. Jacobson, let me ask you, we are all incredibly, deeply troubled by Joaquin Guzman's escape over the weekend, and I am particularly disturbed by the fact that Guzman was arrested in Febbruary 2014, and from all indications available, the U.S. did not request his extradition until February of this year.

Can you explain why the State Department did not request Guzman's extradition for a year, especially when he is facing charges in at least seven U.S. Federal district courts? He has long served as the overlord of what is considered the most powerful drug cartel on the planet. What happened here?

Ms. JACOBSON. Senator, what I can say, because we do not get into the details, and I cannot since I am not a Department of Justice employee, which basically prepares all of the extradition packages with lawyers at the State Department, what I can tell you is that we always want to extradite or seek extradition of all of those who are detained overseas against whom there are charges in the United States.

We have been discussing extraditions and the pace of extraditions and our desire for greater extraditions with Mexico for a number of years now. But what I cannot tell you is the exact reasons or timing for the particular possible or actual extradition requests.

Senator MENENDEZ. So are you telling me that the State Department's only role in extraditions, whether it be this or any other one, is to act upon the Justice Department's instigation?

Ms. JACOBSON. No. There are, certainly, lawyers within the State Department who work with the Justice Department, but it is the Justice Department that puts together, with the State Department, the extradition requests of other governments.

Senator MENENDEZ. So it is the Justice Department that delayed it?

Ms. JACOBSON. I cannot tell exactly what the delay was. I have to refer—

Senator MENENDEZ. Someone is going to have to tell the United States Senate why it took a year before we even asked for his extradition, when this man is sought in seven Federal districts, has a whole host of charges, one of the most dangerous people in the Western Hemisphere, and we know the risk of him breaking out of a Mexican jail is high.

Ms. JACOBSON. I cannot confirm the exact time when the request was made, Senator, except to refer you to the Justice Department.

Senator MENENDEZ. Okay, let me ask you this. Continuing on the line of extraditions, here is something hopefully you can help me with, Joanne Chesimard. You have been negotiating on the Cuba reengagement. I see nothing on Joanne Chesimard. I see nothing on others, such as the killer of the New Mexico state trooper. She is on the FBI's 10 most wanted terrorists list.

So as our top diplomat right now for Latin America and the Caribbean, can you explain the lack of progress for efforts at extraditions, whether it be El Chapo or whether it be Joanne Chesimard or the killer of the New Mexico state trooper?

Is this not a national security imperative for the State Department?

Ms. JACOBSON. Extraditions are an incredibly important tool to fighting crime and getting back people who are high priorities for the United States. We have had significant numbers of extraditions from Mexico in the past and, as you know, from many other countries in the hemisphere, including Colombian and others. We have also had expulsions from Cuba since 2010 of those that we wanted back in the United States for crimes.

As I said before, Joanne Chesimard's case, in particular, and I am from New Jersey and I know the case well, is raised every time we talk to the Cubans. It has been raised at extremely high levels with the Cuban Government. There has not been a satisfactory response yet, and we will continue to raise it in the law enforcement talks that we will now be having.

Senator MENENDEZ. Well, I understand the Cubans are going to talk to you about it. They will talk to you about it ad infinitum because they say she has political refugee status in their country, and, therefore, that is not really a bargaining chip.

I just do not understand how we turn over three convicted spies and cannot get one convicted cop killer back from Cuba.

Let me ask you, continuing on the national security threat issues, I have seen that Diosdado Cabello, the head of Venezuela's national assembly, is the target of a series of investigations by U.S. Federal prosecutors and the Drug Enforcement Agency. Putting aside recent meetings by the State Department and pictures with Cabello, I am concerned that the investigations are bringing into greater focus how the drug trade is penetrating the highest levels of the Venezuelan state.

So is the current situation in Venezuela a national security threat to the United States?

Ms. JACOBSON. I think that the current situation in Venezuela is of great concern to the United States. Whether it is a national security threat to the United States, I would not say. We have made clear, as we did in the sanctions—

Senator MENENDEZ. You would say it is not a national security threat?

Ms. JACOBSON. I would say it is a national security threat in the sense that drug trafficking is overall a national security threat to the United States. As we have said in our reports annually, the Government of Venezuela is not cooperating with us on that issue.

Senator MENENDEZ. Okay, so what has changed from your testimony on May 8 of last year when I asked you a very similar question and your answer to me was, "I think the answer to that question is that it is a very serious concern to us, a national security threat."

Ms. JACOBSON. Well, as I just said, I think drug trafficking overall is a national security threat to the United States.

Senator MENENDEZ. I was not asking about drug trafficking overall in that question, nor in this question. I was asking you about Venezuela.

You told me on May 8 of 2014 that it was a national security threat. Why is it less so today?

Ms. JACOBSON. Whether the words are exactly the same this day or then, I think the concerns that we have about Venezuela and about drug trafficking are the same. We have concerns about how much drugs may be coming through or out of Venezuela into the United States, and we are going to continue to act to keep them from coming in.

Senator MENENDEZ. I think even the President in his determination cites a national security threat.

One last question, when I have individuals who are brought before the committee for the advice and consent of the Senate, I take it very seriously. And one of the elements that I take very seriously is that I am going to get fair, honest, transparent answers to my questions so that I can make judgments on the issues that I am called upon as a United States Senator and as a senior member of this committee to make judgments on.

When in a hearing on Venezuela, the same hearing where you told me it was national security threat, I asked you whether or not the opposition in Venezuela, as you had stated, was actually opposed to us pursuing sanctions, and your answer to me at that time was that the opposition elements engaged in the current dialogue have suggested we refrain from sanctions against individuals guilty of human rights violations.

Now that was not the case, and you ultimately made it very difficult for me at a moment that I was trying to understand what would be the consequences of sanctions. I thought that the sanctions that the President ultimately signed were the right ones, but you created a doubt in me, a doubt that should not have been there because then I heard a chorus from the opposition in Venezuela who said, no, we never said that.

So if I am going to look to advise and consent and vote affirmatively for someone, I need honest and open and transparent answers. And I do not feel that I got that from you at that time.

So can you explain to me why I should feel that if I were to vote for you to be the U.S. Ambassador to Mexico, a country with which we have a critical relationship on a whole host of issues, that I would feel that I was getting open and transparent answers?

Ms. JACOBSON. Senator, I guess one of the things I would say is I would look to the response of the opposition after these sanctions were passed when they publicly rejected those sanctions. And I would suggest that there were different answers from different members of the opposition, and they were in an extremely difficult situation. And what I told you was what I had heard from some of them.

But after it was said publicly, it put them in an extremely difficult position, which I had not intended to put them in. But it was never a misstatement to you of what I had heard.

Senator MENENDEZ. Well, you asked to clarify the record, and even your clarification then is not what you are telling me now. When you asked to clarify the record, which I allowed you to do when I was then the chairman, you said I would like to clarify one point I made during the hearing, the opposition elements engaged in the current dialogue have not specifically suggested we refrain from sanctions against individuals guilty of human rights violations.

Ms. JACOBSON. Because those in the dialogue had not. It was others who were outside the dialogue. And that was why I did not want to cause problems for those who were within the dialogue.

Senator MENENDEZ. But you did not even, in your clarification, give me that statement that you gave me now.

So I have a real problem in one of the most important assignments in the Western Hemisphere, other than the one that you presently possess, about whether I am going to get open, honest, and transparent answers. That is a problem for me.

Mr. Chairman, thank you.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you, Senator Menendez.

I think Senator Rubio is on his way back and we have to go vote as well. We will go for a minute.

Mr. Mulrean, Haiti, how are we doing in terms of recovery efforts? And how is the country, the government responding? What do you see as your main challenge there?

Mr. MULREAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I think what we see in the last year or two in Haiti is a series of improvements in the general situation, particularly if you look at the post-earthquake situation.

The health and economic indicators are up. The security situation has improved. Private investment has outpaced donor assistance for the last 3 years. And even some polling indicates that Haitians feel that they are better off now than they were preearthquake.

I think what this indicates, Senator, is that Haiti is moving past the post-earthquake crisis relief and into a better place, but a place that will still require long-term development and support by the international community.

There are a lot of things that still need to be done. There has been basically a political impasse between the executive and the legislative branch, which has resulted in the need for elections now coming up this fall.

The problem with this impasse is that it has prevented some very important legislation from moving forward.

So the immediate concern, were I to be confirmed, Senator, is the impending elections that will begin in August. In October, you will have legislative, Presidential, and local elections going on. I think for Haiti to move forward truly into its development phase, you need to have an executive and legislative branch that are willing to work together and take some of the difficult decisions.

Senator FLAKE. What areas is USAID working in, in terms of economic development?

Mr. MULREAN. Senator, Congress has been very generous post-earthquake with Haiti. You have allocated $4.1 billion to Haiti, 80 percent of which has been dispersed. All of the humanitarian assistance is now completed. Where we are is the focus is on the development and recovery assistance that is focused on the economic, social, rule of law, and governance areas.

I think it goes without saying that while things are better in Haiti, economic growth has been in the 3 percent, 4 percent, 5 percent range, the last few years, to make a dent in Haiti in the poverty and unemployment, it needs to be 7 percent or 8 percent. So what needs to really move forward well is economic growth. There needs to be better investment.

Again, this goes back to a certain extent to the need for political will to move forward. They need a new business code. There are critical pieces of legislation on property rights that need to move forward.

Senator FLAKE. Ms. Dogu, with Nicaragua, what are the main areas of focus there for our development assistance?

Ms. DOGU. The main area of focus, Senator, will be strengthening democratic institutions and rule of law in the country. We are also going to be focusing on economic integration with Central America as part of the Central American strategy. We feel that it is very important that Nicaragua integrates itself economically with its neighbors and that all of Central America has a chance to compete together on the global front.

In addition to that, of course, if I am confirmed, one of my top priorities immediately upon arriving in the country would be the safety and security of the people who work with me there in the country, both the official Americans and their families and the private citizens that are in the country. And I would be focused on that immediately upon arrival, just to make sure that we are prepared in case of any emergency.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

I have to run to vote, but let me just say, all four of you are foreign career Foreign Service officers, and one of the great parts of this job is to be able to meet with many. I chair the Africa Subcommittee so I meet with almost all of the career Foreign Service officers going to those countries. But I am so impressed with the professionalism that I see and the commitment to service that all of you exhibit. And I have not had an occasion to work with three of you, but Ms. Jacobson I have, and I have seen that professionalism. I have seen that commitment.

And I just appreciate all that you do and for your service and for your families as well. I know they sacrifice a lot to have you in this position.

So thank you for your service, and I look forward to continuing the process here.

Senator RUBIO [presiding]. Thank you.

Unless more members come, we are going to reach a conclusion here fairly soon, which I am sure none of you will be offended if you are not the subject of a lengthy hearing. But I did have some questions I wanted to touch base. Some are a little bit broader.

I did want to revisit for a moment, Venezuela, Ms. Jacobson. I cut short my questioning because I wanted to get to all of the nominees.

I am not saying that this is something that I have been told. I am just curious, and I think it is important for the record. Are you aware of any assurances that Counselor Shannon or any U.S. official made, including persons in the White House or the NSC, to representatives of the Venezuelan Government that the United States is going to refrain from applying additional sanctions on human rights violators or corrupt persons? Have any such assurances been made by anybody that you are aware of in the U.S. Government?

Ms. JACOBSON. Not to my knowledge, no.

Senator RUBIO. Okay.

I want to get broader, and that may involve a number of the countries involved, but particularly Nicaragua and Mexico. As we look at the Western Hemisphere, there are two competing camps that seem to have emerged, at least in my view, and I would like to have your comment on it.

One is kind of the pro-American, I would say, but friendlier to our interests, camp of nations, and you see prosperity in these countries. Of course, Peru and Chile, Colombia, Panama, and I would include Mexico in that group of countries that are a key part of a kind of prosperous future for the Western Hemisphere, all of which have made substantial gains. They still have challenges. Colombia has significant challenges. Mexico, we have talked about some of their challenges as well.

And then there is the second group that has emerged and they, on the other hand, are heading in the opposite direction, in many respects. Obviously, Cuba for a long time but Venezuela, Bolivia, Ecuador, and oftentimes Nicaragua is in that camp as well.

And so let me begin, and I do not want to make your job any harder than it is going to be, if confirmed, but I do have serious questions and I think many of us do about the legitimacy of the elections that they have conducted there in the past and the general attitude of the Nicaraguan Government towards the United States of America. On the one hand, they do allow U.S. investment of U.S. firms and companies. There is travel there. There is engagement, in that sense. On the other, their government is less than cooperative on a host of issues and, in fact, they have now expressed a willingness, for example, to allow the Russians to increase military cooperation with them and even pay an increased number of port visits, et cetera.

Ms. Dogu, how would you describe our relationship with Nicaragua today? Obviously, they are not an ally in the traditional sense of the word. But how would you describe our current situation when it comes to their government versus the United States, and the relationship between us at this moment?

Ms. DOGU. Mr. Chairman, I think you actually described it quite well.

It is a very complex relationship. We do have some stresses in the relationship, but we also do have areas where we are able to cooperate quite well together.

On the stress side, obviously, we are concerned about some of the things that you mentioned in terms of the lack of free elections and the lack of space for people in the country to have a dialogue about the choice that they would have for leaders of the country.

On the economic side, however, we cooperate well. We are their number one trading partner. They are part of the Central American Free Trade Agreement. Since they joined the Central American Free Trade Agreement and that went into effect, their trade with the United States has increased by about 165 percent. Trade from the United States to Nicaragua has also increased fairly significantly.

Interestingly, even on the law enforcement side and on the counternarcotics side, we have been able to find an opportunity to work together. On the counternarcotics side, we do have cooperation with the Government of Nicaragua, small funding that goes to them through the Department of Defense and through DEA.

So we do have some areas of cooperation on the law enforcement side. They have actually removed from their country two fugitives that were on the FBI top 10 list last year in 2014.

So I think the challenge for me, if I am confirmed, sir, will be to continue to find those areas where we can cooperate together and to go ahead and work very carefully and closely to address the areas of concern where we do not get along so well. And I can commit to you that I will do that and it will be a high priority for me, if confirmed.

Senator RUBIO. And then, Ms. Jacobson, let me just first ask you about the broader region. I described these sorts of competing camps that have emerged.

Mexico I think is a key linchpin to that. In my recollection, they are if not the largest among the largest economies in the region, certainly in comparison to some of the smaller countries. They have always also had a significant influence in the multinational organizations that characterize the region.

As Mexico continues to grow and prosper, do you view them as a nation, as a government, willing to play more in the regional leadership category? Are they prepared, for example, to play a greater role in what is happening with human rights violations and elections that are upcoming in Venezuela? Are they prepared to address some of the challenges that are being faced to their south, which they are impacted by, in the Northern Triangle countries? How would you characterize their willingness to become a more active participant as a regional leader, which is really their role in that region, rightfully?

Ms. JACOBSON. I think that is an incredibly important point for Mexico. Mexico for many, many years had a very, very strong role, especially on the economic side with Central America. I think to some extent during Venezuela's heyday of high oil prices in Petrocaribe, Mexico was pushed out of that sphere a little bit.

They have reasserted their engagement on Central America. They have reasserted it on economic issues in greater engagement with the Central American countries.

They have reasserted it on energy, which is extremely positive. There are gas pipelines being built between Mexico and Guatemala. We know that energy prices in Central America are as much as 10 times higher than they are in the United States. This affects their productivity and all of the other ills that we see reflected in migration.

So Mexico's greater engagement with Central America and its leadership there is critical. But beyond that, I think they can play more of a role. Mexico, as it opened up and began to be more confident as a democracy opening up to U.N. human rights organizations and the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights organization system, needs also to play that role regionally. There are Mexican members of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights now, and it would be great if Mexico felt more confident in playing that role regionally with South American countries or elsewhere.

But I also think it is significant beyond regionally that President Pena Nieto talked about Mexicans being involved in peacekeeping for the first time when he was at the U.N. General Assembly last fall. That is another place where I think Mexico can begin to make a contribution in leadership, including in the region.

Senator RUBIO. The general state of affairs in Mexico, obviously for years some have viewed Mexico as a source of cheaper labor, as a place where businesses move operations because it might be less costly to do business there, as a source of migration to the United States in massive numbers. But over the last few years, all those factors have begun to change. In fact, there is an emerging middle class in Mexico now with significant consumer power and there are significant pockets of prosperity emerging within parts of Mexico as they help continue to try to make this transition to a more prosperous future.

How would you describe the state of affairs in Mexico today? Is it a country headed in the right direction, obviously, with significant challenges? Is it a country that remains the way I just characterized it, that some view as a place that—because, for example, as we have seen in some reports, net migration from Mexico significantly declined. Partially, I would imagine, due to the economic downturn in the United States, but also partially if not primarily due to the fact that now there are income and employment opportunities in Mexico today that did not exist.

So what are the drivers of this growth? And what do they need to do next to continue those trends?

Ms. JACOBSON. I think there are a number of things. One, to be honest, is out of their control. And that is demographics. The Mexican population is aging to some extent, as the U.S. population has. And we know that people do not migrate beyond a certain age, in terms of illegal migration or undocumented migration.

But the other is that the Mexican Government has been extremely focused, as was the Calderon administration, on education. And that is crucial to them sustaining the movement of large numbers of people into that middle class.

And they know that as we work on education jointly—and we have expanded our educational cooperation dramatically. Last year, there were hundreds of Mexican teachers who came to the United States for advanced English studies to go home and teach English in Mexico. This is part of the President's 100,000 Strong in the Americas and a joint bilateral program with Mexico that we have launched.

And I think we are looking at ways to improve the educational exchanges but not just at the very high, top 4-year level. Mexico has developed a series of "politecnicos," which are more akin to vocational training or community colleges, to really educate and train the gap between those who go through K-12 but are not necessarily going to go to a 4-year university, but get involved in manufacturing jobs that now require more than just a high school education in Mexico as well.

And I think that is really the focus of Mexico, on education moving forward, because I would agree with the first characterization you gave of Mexico as an increasingly, I guess it was the second one, an increasingly middle-class country with really important pockets of progress that need to be expanded to the rest of the country.

The economic and structural reforms that this administration passed in Mexico in its first year in office are really critical, but now they have to implement those reforms and keep moving forward with education and with fiscal reforms and telecommunications and energy openings to provide the kinds of jobs that will continue the growth for both our economies.

Senator RUBIO. You signaled demographic trends in Mexico, and it is an interesting point. Their immigration policies are much more stringent than ours. That is correct. In essence, it is a lot easier to immigrate legally to the United States than it is to immigrate legally to Mexico.

So the question then is, on the issue of migration, as they continue to develop in this direction, is it your sense that this is a country more willing, a government more willing, to cooperate with the United States to stem the flow of illegal migration across their northern border than they were 5 or 10 years ago?

There is a sense among some that I partially share that because of the high level of remittances from the United States back to Mexico that there has been interest in the past in not discouraging migration as a source of remittances back to the United States. But is there now a sense that for the first time in a while, the Mexican Government is starting to realize increasingly that the instability on their northern border is attracting migration on their southern border and on their coasts, and present security challenges to Mexico not just to the United States? And if so, do you think now there is an opportunity to work even closer with them to establish the sorts of improvements we need on both sides of the border to solidify that situation further?

Ms. JACOBSON. What I can say, Mr. Chairman, is I think that the Mexican Government does realize the threat to both the economic situation and to the border, both northern and southern, that undocumented or uncontrolled migration creates, both from other people using Mexican territory to traverse to come to the United States as well as Mexicans entering the United States undocumented.

I think the cooperation has been really quite good in recent years. But I will say that it has been amped up recently, and there is a real sense in Mexico, I think, that as others use their territory to try to get to the United States, and their own economic situation improves, they could decide to stay in Mexico. And so it is in their interest to work on orderly and safe and legal migration with protections for people, of course, the same way it is for us.

Senator RUBIO. My final question, because we are nearing 5 o'clock, again, for you, Ms. Jacobson, because we may not see you again in your current capacity before the committee, I know you have been involved in the negotiations that ultimately have led to the announcement of mutual embassies in Washington and in Havana. Ironically, just a few days after that announcement was made, I think the Sunday after the 5th of July, there were once again mass detentions in Nevada. The Ladies in White, there was one peaceful demonstrator who had his nose fractured, and was beaten.

And it goes back to the situation about this Embassy. What kind of Embassy are we going to have in Havana? I know that the argument has been that we are going to have an Embassy in Havana the way we do in other countries that have unfriendly governments and that approach. But I do think we have now taken this massive step, the President has, of diplomatically recognizing that government as a legitimate form of government. Although we, certainly, have qualms about how they operate, the President has given them diplomatic recognition and opened this Embassy.

What kind of Embassy is this going to be? It appears to me from what has been announced that the employees of that Embassy, other than the American diplomatic employees, the people who clean, the people who do the service work, will always continue to be hired from an agency controlled by the Cuban Government. It is my understanding that there will continue to be a significant security perimeter that could discourage people from coming to the Embassy to appeal for assistance from the United States. It appears that all but two members, and maybe I am wrong about the number, but there will be significant limitations on the ability of U.S. diplomats to use the Embassy to travel throughout the country and engage with people. And there apparently will be significant limitations on the ability to deliver enhancements to the technological capabilities of that facility.

So, in essence, other than the name on the door, what will be different about this facility than the interests section that we have there now?

Ms. JACOBSON. Thank you, Senator.

It was very important, as we discussed this opening of embassies and reestablishment of diplomatic relations, that we be absolutely certain that we can do our jobs under the Vienna Convention as we see them, which include being able to get out into the country and talk to people, certainly more than just two people but others within the Embassy, and that we ensure that the Embassy is a place that people can come to, Cubans can come to, because Americans have never really had great difficulty if they are in Cuba.

And I can assure you that what we will be doing and the way we will be operating is significantly different than we have been operating as an interests section. The security presence outside the interests section has already been reduced and the agreement on that is a significant reduction in security presence outside the future Embassy, such that we hope people will not feel nearly the same kind of presence or threat, and there will no longer be Cuban Government screening or names taken for people to enter the U.S. Embassy. That will be something, as we do all over the world, that we do, not the host government.

The ability to travel is similar to our restrictions in many other places around the world. There are a number of people at the Embassy who will be—it is more than two, as a matter of fact—who will be able to travel without any pre-notification. But others will be able to travel on a certain number of days' notification, but they will no longer have to ask permission. That is quite significant, because we previously had to ask for approval. Now it is only a notification, and then we go.

So that is really quite significant in enabling us to get out and travel.

We also have had almost no ability to get sensitive shipments into our interests section. They had all but stopped. We have made a very good start on reprovisioning the interests section, and we will continue to have talks thereafter about future shipments.

So in many of the ways, all of the ways that we laid out that were important to us to begin to operate more like everyplace else that is a restrictive environment, we made enormous progress from where we are now.

Senator RUBIO. Well, I want to thank all the nominees for being here with us today. I appreciate it very much, and your patience in the back-and-forth of people coming in and out. Again, we look forward to continuing to review your nominations.

You may receive written questions and follow-up from members of the committee, and I encourage you to promptly respond to those as quickly as possible, since a delay in that response could delay a final vote in consideration by the Senate.

So again, I want to thank all of you for your service to our country and for your willingness to continue to serve. And with that the committee stands adjourned.

I apologize, a reminder that the record will be open until Friday at the end of the business day.

Thank you. The committee is adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 4:54 p.m., the hearing was adjourned.]

ADDITIONAL MATERIAL SUBMITTED FOR THE RECORD

RESPONSES OF ROBERTA S. JACOBSON, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE UNITED MEXICAN STATES, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE JACOBSON'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CORKER

Question. Mexico has made significant progress integrating with North American and global supply chains, generating economic opportunities. Deepening and sustaining the benefit of these policies and recent significant policy reforms will require the rule of law.

♦ Where does Mexico stand in implementing its ambitious judicial reform and how can you, as Ambassador, properly support this key step forward for Mexico?

Answer. Mexico's 2008 constitutional mandate requires all levels of government to transition from an inquisitorial to an accusatorial justice system by June 2016. The new system will include open trials, leading to greater transparency and efficiency, and decreasing the reliance on confessions, which has been tied to human rights abuses. It will also aim to prevent and punish impunity and abuses more transparently and effectively.

Under the Merida Initiative, the U.S. Government is providing tens of millions of dollars in assistance to support the transition of Mexico's judicial system at the federal and state level. Moreover, as the U.S. and Mexican economic relationship continues to mature the protection of property rights, including intellectual property rights (IPR), is critical for investment, growth and prosperity. We are pursuing these objectives through our initiatives under the High Level Economic Dialogue.

If confirmed, I will do all I can to promote U.S. cooperation and assistance to support the Government of Mexico's justice sector reform efforts and the rule of law.

Question. Mexico has recently been helpful in deterring undocumented migration from Central America, including unaccompanied minors. Will this effort by Mexico to interdict and repatriate undocumented migrants be sustainable over time?

Answer. Cooperation with Mexico on migration issues has been excellent. In June 2014 and in January 2015, President Peña Nieto expressed his commitment to President Obama to return children safely to their families in Central America, build Central American capacity to receive returned children, and address the underlying factors driving migration. We believe Mexico's increased enforcement, including against human smuggling, as well as its efforts to share best practices on migration management with Central American governments have been significant factors in reducing the number of migrants apprehended by U.S. immigration officials at our southern border.

To help sustain Mexico's efforts, the United States is working with the Mexican Government to disrupt the organized criminal networks facilitating human smuggling, including through the provision of training, technical assistance, equipment, and coordination in support of Mexico's efforts to strengthen enforcement in its southern border region.

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE JACOBSON'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR MENENDEZ

Question. The TPP negotiations are in their final stages and many have high expectations that weaknesses in Mexico's labor laws will be addressed. Can the TPP really address the challenges to labor rights in Mexico without amendments to Mexican laws? Should these changes take place prior to the agreements' entry into force?

Answer. In order to meet the labor standards in TPP, each TPP country will need to have laws and practices consistent with the International Labor Organization's Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work, which includes freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining, the elimination of all forms of forced or compulsory labor, the effective abolition of child labor, and the elimination of employment discrimination. TPP also includes requirements for countries to adopt and maintain laws and practices on minimum wages, hours of work, and occupational safety and health. On questions related to the negotiations and TPP's entry into force, I would refer you to the Office of the United States Trade Representative.

Question. Although the administration has indicated support for strengthening the labor rights provisions of the NAFTA, U.S. support for labor capacity-building programs in Mexico historically has been inadequate relative to the situation. For example, USAID has only one labor capacity-building program in Mexico, the Global Labor Program, which is scheduled to end in January 2016. Both USAID and the Department of State have so far been unwilling to use their trade capacity building funds to increase support for labor capacity programs with trade unions in Mexico.

- ♦ If confirmed, how will you ensure that the United States provides sufficient attention and funding for labor capacity-building programs in Mexico, so that Mexico can fulfill the labor rights commitments it has made in trade agreements with the United States?

Answer. The administration is working to identify needs and ensure that there will be appropriate labor capacity-building plans in place for TPP partners to support their efforts to improve protection of labor rights, particularly those related to the International Labor Organization's Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work.

As you note, some related work is already underway in Mexico. USAID/Mexico is supporting a pilot project to reform Mexico's labor arbitration courts through the Mexican Competitiveness Institute (IMCO). USAID also provides capacity-building funding to the Solidarity Center. The Solidarity Center programs in Mexico seek to strengthen the independence and democratic structure of labor unions in key sectors of the Mexican economy in strategic locations, with the overall goal of improving their ability to democratically represent workers, address issues of corruption and increase economic transparency and citizen participation. If confirmed, I will continue to support such programs.

Question. Over the past year, the United States has struggled in its response to the refugee crisis of unaccompanied children arriving on the Southwestern border. In 2015, the number of unaccompanied children arriving to the U.S. is down, but emerging evidence suggests this has less to do with the response by the U.S. and Central American governments, and more to do with Mexico's actions. While Mexico's participation in addressing this refugee crisis is vital, increasingly it appears that vulnerable children migrants detained in Mexico may not be receiving screening for international protections that they deserve.

- ♦ If confirmed as Ambassador, how would you work with the Mexican Government to ensure that the flow of migrants through the country is handled in a manner in which ensures the rights, protections, screening and appropriate care of all individuals?

Answer. The U.S. Government engages regularly with Mexican authorities on immigration issues, including border security, repatriation, enforcement, and migration of unaccompanied children. Recognizing the significant increase of Central American migrants, particularly unaccompanied children, transiting Mexico en route to the United States in 2014, the U.S. Government engaged with the Mexican Government to develop better ways to cooperate on this important issue.

I am aware of reports expressing concern over the inadequate protection of the human rights of migrants apprehended and repatriated by Mexican authorities. We discuss these issues with our Mexican counterparts on a regular basis. On February 25, 2015, the Department convened the third meeting of the U.S.-Mexico Repatriation Strategy and Policy Executive Coordination Team (RESPECT) to continue efforts to align U.S. and Mexican resources and to ensure the safe and humane treatment of migrants. If confirmed, I will continue to raise these issues and concerns at the highest levels of the Mexican Government, and work to identify ways the U.S. Government can best assist Mexican authorities.

Question. How can the State Department and U.S. Embassy Mexico City support advances in the Government of Mexico's search for the more than 20,000 people who have disappeared or gone missing over the past decade, including the case of the 43 disappeared students in Iguala?

Answer. The issue of the missing and disappeared is a significant human rights problem in Mexico, as we noted in our 2014 Human Rights Report. A database of names is an essential tool in addressing this challenge and, while Mexico's National Registry for Missing and Disappeared Persons exists, it is incomplete and imperfect. President Peña Nieto has pledged to support both a national missing persons database and a national genetic information database.

I led the U.S. delegation to the Bilateral Human Rights Dialogue (BHRD) last year, where my Mexican counterparts shared the challenges they faced in collecting, verifying, and managing the registry.

We have provided significant expertise that can be brought to bear here. Forensics and crime-scene investigation trainings, for example, share many of the fundamentals that are required to collect the evidence necessary to resolve cases.

Regarding Iguala, I have been following the tragic events involving the disappearance, and presumed killing, of up to 46 students in the state of Guerrero in September 2014. We have met with Mexican officials to express our concerns and offer assistance to resolve this case. My thoughts and sympathies remain with the families and friends affected by the loss of loved ones. This horrific crime requires a full, transparent investigation and the prosecution of all responsible.

Mexican authorities have undertaken such an investigation and detained nearly 100 suspects. The Mexican Government has sought the assistance of a group of independent experts under the auspices of the Inter American Commission on Human Rights. We strongly support the experts group, whose mandate includes making recommendations to the Mexican Government about reforms that will help prevent disappearances.

The problem of disappearances underscores the importance of our partnership under the Merida Initiative: supporting Mexican efforts to enhance the professional capacity of the Mexico's justice sector institutions, thus ensuring accountability and increasing public trust.

We value our collaborative law enforcement relationship with Mexico and, if confirmed, I will make our cooperation on advancing the rule of law in Mexico among my highest priorities.

Question. The Government of Mexico has informed media outlets that it did not receive a formal, completed extradition request for Joaquin Guzman until June 2015. Please describe why this request was not submitted to the Mexican Government until nearly 16 months after Guzman's arrest. What role did you play in the interagency process to advocate for submitting a request for Guzman's extradition? What role did you play in advocating that the Mexican Government respond affirmatively to the U.S. request for extradition?

Answer. While the United States does not usually comment on pending extradition requests before they become public judicial proceedings for law enforcement and security reasons, it is the practice of the United States to seek extradition whenever defendants subject to U.S. charges are apprehended in another country.

Pursuant to the U.S.-Mexico Extradition Treaty, in advance of submitting a full extradition request either country may seek from the other a provisional arrest warrant for a fugitive. The treaty further contemplates that, after the fugitive has been arrested, a full extradition package will be submitted. We can confirm that, at the request of the United States, Mexico issued such a provisional arrest warrant for Joaquin “Chapo” Guzman Loera more than a decade ago and, that subsequent to the arrest of Guzman Loera, the United States submitted a full extradition request to Mexico. The Department of State is part of the interagency review process for all extradition requests.

The U.S. Government has been clear since Guzman Loera’s initial arrest about its desire to hold him accountable for his crimes in the United States. Even had the Mexican Government immediately agreed to extradite Guzman to the United States following his February 2014 capture, in all likelihood, he still would have been in a Mexican prison on July 11. He would have undoubtedly fought the extradition request in the Mexican legal system, as is his right under Mexican law. And the Mexican justice system would still have been preparing its prosecution and trial, based on its stated intent to ensure he faced justice in Mexico before the United States. Mexico’s former attorney general made very clear from the beginning of the Peña Nieto government that Mexico wanted to prosecute Guzman in Mexico for crimes committed against the Mexican people before considering any extradition request. That is Mexico’s sovereign right and permitted under our bilateral extradition treaty.

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE JACOBSON’S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR RUBIO

Question #1. Assistant Secretary Jacobson, during your testimony to the House Committee on Foreign Affairs in May of 2010, you spoke about the administration’s vision for a “21st century border.” You stated that the objective of this new border would be to intercept threats before they even reach the border.

- ♦ Would you be able to describe further how that vision has been achieved today?
- ♦ If confirmed, what will be your comprehensive antidrug strategy with Mexico?

Answer. We have made significant steps to modernize and strengthen our shared border through both the Merida Initiative and our 21st Century Border Management Initiative. Under the 21st Century Border Management Initiative, the United States continues to work to reduce border wait times by expanding infrastructure capacity, including through public-private partnerships, and by improving the efficiency of the inspection process. We saw the completion of the first phase of our expansion at the busiest land port of entry between our two countries in November 2014, the San Ysidro-El Chaparral border crossing between San Diego and Tijuana, which more than doubled the number of inspection booths and significantly reduced vehicle wait times from 3 hours to as little as 30 minutes. Likewise, in October 2014 we inaugurated an improved port of entry at Nogales, AZ, through which 40 percent of Mexican produce bound for U.S. supermarkets passes. We are finalizing a pilot program this year for cargo preinspection at three different sites on our border, which will allow U.S. and Mexican customs agents to work side by side to inspect and clear cargo simultaneously. This will notably increase cargo inspection efficiency at the border.

The United States has expended more than $1.4 billion in equipment, training, and capacity-building, including that dedicated to modernizing and securing our shared border since the Merida Initiative began in 2008. With support from Merida, Mexico has built a stronger legal framework, augmented specialized security forces, improved the detection of movement of narcotics, arms, and money, instilled a growing culture of lawfulness, and is more effectively using law enforcement information through the broader application of technology. To improve border security, the United States has provided the Government of Mexico with over $115 million in fixed and mobile nonintrusive inspection equipment (NIIE), maintenance, and related detection devices for use at Mexico’s points of entry, border crossings, and internal checkpoints. With Merida-funded equipment, the Mexican Government has seized over $4 billion in narcotics and illegal currency. Building upon the Government of Mexico’s own investment in NIIE and border security infrastructure, Merida assistance has significantly bolstered the ability of Mexican officials to increase border security and facilitate the flows of legitimate commerce and travel, while reducing the movement of illicit narcotics, currency, weapons, explosives, black market goods, and undocumented migrants.

During his visit to Mexico in May 2013, President Obama stood with President Peña Nieto and reaffirmed our commitment “to meet our responsibilities—to reduce the demand for illegal drugs, and combat the southbound flow of illegal guns and cash that help fuel violence.” This is a fundamental component of our bilateral security cooperation: our two countries have a shared responsibility to work together to address this problem that affects both of our countries. The United States is actively working to prevent the illicit flow of drug profits and weapons that strengthen the drug cartels in Mexico and fuel the violence. If confirmed, I will continue our efforts under the Merida Initiative and in close coordination with law enforcement agencies to combat criminal groups involved in the drug trade and the flow of illegal drugs through Mexico.

Question #2. The United States, Mexico and Canada are all involved in the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) negotiations along with other Pacific region countries.

- ◆ To what extent might a failure to conclude a TPP impact North American trade relations and industrial competitiveness?

Answer. The TPP will be the economic centerpiece of a growing, dynamic Asia-Pacific region, which includes North America. This agreement has the potential to boost economic growth, development, and jobs in the United States, Mexico, and Canada and to enhance the competitiveness of the North American economy. Conversely, without the ratification of TPP, North America will not be as well positioned to compete effectively within the Asia Pacific and with the other major regions of the world.

We anticipate success in this endeavor as we are very close to completing the negotiations. And with the passage of TPA, Congress has given the administration marching orders to conclude a high-standard agreement. We are working hard to achieve an agreement that will not only support our economic and strategic interests, but also reflect our values. As President Obama has said, we must ensure that as the economic rules of the road are drawn up for this important region of the world, the United States is playing a leading role in shaping them.

Question #3. In December 2008, Mexico and the United States began the Merida Initiative to disrupt the capabilities of organized crime, improve the capacity of the Mexican judicial system to administer the rule of law, improve border security, and strengthen local communities across Mexico.

- ◆ What is the current status of implementation of Merida Initiative programs in Mexico?
- ◆ Following the implementation of Merida Initiative programs, has Mexico increased its security cooperation with the U.S., remained the same, or decreased?
- ◆ Has the U.S. successfully helped Mexico develop independent judiciary/courts systems that is free from political interference? (Why Not?)

Answer. The Merida Initiative has transformed our bilateral relationship with Mexico. We have achieved unprecedented levels of bilateral collaboration on a range of issues, including security, economic competitiveness, trade, energy, environment, climate, human rights, cultural and educational ties, and regional and global issues.

Since the Merida partnership was formalized in 2008, $2.3 billion has been appropriated for the Merida Initiative (FY08–14). More than $1.4 billion in equipment, training, and capacity-building has been delivered since the Merida Initiative began. Between 2008 and 2014 Mexico invested about $68.3 billion in security and public safety. That means that our assistance has leveraged approximately $28.5 dollars in Mexican investment for every $1 dollar of our own appropriations.

The Merida Initiative is a broad strategy to support the Mexican Government's efforts to strengthen rule of law, democratic institutions, and community efforts against crime and violence, while protecting human rights. The Merida Initiative enables greater cooperation between U.S. and Mexican law enforcement agencies, prosecutors, and judges as they share best practices and expand bilateral cooperation in tracking criminals, drugs, arms, and money. The Merida Initiative has contributed greatly to strengthening our overall bilateral law enforcement cooperation.

Mexico's security challenges do not lend themselves to easy or short-term solutions. Building institutional capacity for the rule of law is crucial to long-term success. Our support for Mexico's ongoing judicial reform will help create a more effective, transparent, and independent justice system. Continuing our strong security cooperation under the Merida Initiative remains a major component of our bilateral relationship. If confirmed, I will continue our joint efforts to support more capable institutions—especially police, justice systems, and civil society organizations—as rule of law is essential to Mexico's economic growth.

Question #4. There have been media reports suggesting that the current Mexican administration does not prioritize information-sharing as highly as previous Mexican administrations, including a prohibition on direct intelligence-sharing between law enforcement groups. Under President Nieto, all information must go through a centralized office under Mexico's Secretary of the Interior.

- ◆ Does Mexico regularly accept U.S. security and intelligence assistance when offered?

- ♦ Has a slowdown in criminal intelligence sharing hindered law enforcement operations in both Mexico and the United States?
- ♦ Do you support a more robust role for the U.S. military in Mexico to assist the Government of Mexico with training, equipping, and targeting efforts in the fight against the cartels and transnational criminal organizations?
- ♦ What role can the U.S. military and law enforcement play in helping Mexico secure their southern border with Guatemala and Belize?

Answer. The United States and Mexico have an extremely close and cooperative security, law enforcement, and intelligence relationship, one that has expanded over the last 15 years and especially since the inception of the Merida Initiative. We have a range of assistance we can and have made available to the Government of Mexico, and Mexico works closely with us to define the assistance that best responds to the government's priorities and the situation on the ground.

While I would defer to our law enforcement agencies to comment on changes in the pace of criminal intelligence-sharing with the Mexican Government, I believe we have the mechanisms in place and the close institutional and personal relationships for strong law enforcement cooperation to more effectively address the transnational criminal organizations (TCOs) that threaten both our countries.

I believe we have the right balance with respect to the role of the U.S. military in assisting Mexico in confronting TCOs. The military-to-military relationship has strengthened in the last few years.

Our military and law enforcement agencies will continue to play a key role in support of Mexico's effort to implement its Southern Border Strategy and better secure its borders with Belize and Guatemala. We are already working with Mexican agencies to increase their capabilities along their southern border as well as to encourage greater cooperation and communication between Mexico and its southern neighbors.

If confirmed as Ambassador, I will work to ensure the security, law enforcement, and intelligence sectors of the United States work together effectively with their Mexican counterparts to advance our mutual security interests.

Question #5. Mexico's most notorious drug lord, Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman, broke out of a high-security prison on July 11 for the second time, escaping in a tunnel built right under his cell. Recent media reports suggest that the DEA had developed intelligence suggesting that Guzman and his associates were plotting his escape as early as 2014. Mexico's Secretary of the Interior, Osorio Chong, has denied that authorities in Mexico were ever informed of potential escapes while U.S. authorities contend that they alerted Mexican authorities 16 months ago.

- ♦ Was intelligence about a potential escape by Guzman ever conveyed to the Mexican Government?
- ♦ Why would Secretary of the Interior, Osorio Chong, claim his office had no warning from the U.S. when his office is the clearinghouse for law enforcement information-sharing?
- ♦ Did the prohibition of direct intelligence-sharing between law enforcement agencies in Mexico and the U.S. help lead to Guzman's escape?
- ♦ As Assistant Secretary of State for the Western Hemisphere, were you aware of any intelligence or any other information suggesting Guzman was plotting his escape?
- ♦ Did you ever personally discuss the Guzman case with any Mexican official? If not, why not?

Answer. While I cannot comment on the sharing of specific law enforcement information in the context of an ongoing sensitive investigation, I can assure you I have stayed actively engaged on the Guzman case. I and others in the Department and in Embassy Mexico City have discussed the Guzman case with Mexican officials and underscored the strong interest of the United States in seeking his extradition. Mexico wanted to prosecute Guzman in Mexico for crimes committed against the Mexican people before taking up consideration of any extradition request, which is permitted under our bilateral extradition treaty.

We have a robust law enforcement information-sharing relationship with the Government of Mexico. We have engaged them for many months on Guzman's case. However, for specific questions related to law enforcement information, I must refer you to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and the Department of Justice.

Question #6. Migrants from the Northern Triangle Countries of El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras have increasingly made their way to the United States through Mexico. Since mid-2014, Mexico has stepped up immigration enforcement along the major routes traversed by many Central American migrants.

- ♦ How effective have those actions been?
- ♦ To what extent have those efforts been in response to U.S. pressure?

- ◆ How is Mexico balancing the need to combat illegal transmigration through its territory with the need to protect migrants' rights and well-being?
- ◆ What steps has the United States taken to ensure that illegal migrants are treated humanely when being repatriated to their home countries by Mexico?
- ◆ If confirmed as Ambassador to Mexico, what message will you convey to the Government of Mexico and the people of Mexico to discourage illegal immigration to the United States?

Answer. Cooperation with Mexico on migration issues has been excellent. In June 2014, President Peña Nieto expressed his commitment to President Obama to return children safely to their families in Central America, build Central American capacity to receive returned children, and address the underlying factors driving migration. We believe Mexico's increased enforcement, including against human smuggling, as well as its efforts to share best practices on migration management with Central American governments have been significant factors in reducing the number of migrants apprehended by U.S. immigration officials at our southern border.

As I noted during the confirmation hearing, bilateral cooperation on migration issues has increased. As the U.S. Government continues to secure our border and the Mexican economy improves, the Mexican Government realizes that many migrants may choose to stay in Mexico instead of trying to enter the United States. Therefore, Mexico has an added incentive to continue working with the United States to ensure orderly, safe, and legal migration.

We have seen reports expressing concerns of inadequate protection of the rights of migrants apprehended and repatriated by Mexican authorities. We discuss these issues with our Mexican counterparts on a regular basis. For example, during the third meeting of the U.S.-Mexico Repatriation Strategy and Policy Executive Coordination Team on February 25, 2015, we discussed ways to align U.S. and Mexican resources and to ensure safe and humane treatment of migrants through the coordination of repatriation policies.

If confirmed, I will continue to press the importance of orderly, safe, and legal immigration and support the Department's public education efforts in the region to discourage illegal migration.

Question #7. In a previous hearing before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee you provided testimony regarding U.S. sanctions toward individual human rights violators in Venezuela. During the question and answers portion of the hearing, you specifically stated that recognized opposition leaders from the MUD (Mesa Unidad Democrática) had requested that no sanctions be levied. In fact, you repeated the same answer when the question was raised on two separate occasions. However, after the hearing, the MUD put out a statement that was completely opposite of what you testified to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

- ◆ How do you explain this contradiction?

Answer. Twenty-seven political parties comprise Venezuela's opposition; each with different philosophies and strategies. At the time of the SFRC hearing in 2014, the government and some members of the political opposition were engaged in dialogue facilitated by the Union of South American Nations (UNASUR) with the involvement of the Vatican. However, other important elements of the opposition, students, and other protesters were skeptical of that dialogue and remained outside it. We respect all these legitimate, yet distinct, views.

The opposition elements engaged in that dialogue asked that the U.S. Government not act in a way that would undermine it. As I testified, we believed that both the timing and any action on sanctions should be calibrated in such a way as not to undermine that dialogue—so long as it offered a realistic chance of progress. It was that view that informed our belief that timing was not right for sanctions at that time. Regrettably, the Venezuelan Government failed to make any concessions in the context of that dialogue, and it ended, prompting us to impose targeted sanctions.

On July 30, 2014 and February 2, 2015, we took steps to impose visa restrictions against 56 individuals believed to be responsible for, or complicit in, human rights abuses and public corruption pursuant to Section 212(a)(3)(C) of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

On March 8, 2015, President Obama signed Executive Order 13692 targeting not only persons (i.e., individuals and entities) involved in or responsible for actions that limit or prohibit the exercise of freedom of expression or peaceful assembly and significant acts of violence that constitute a serious abuse or violation of human rights, including in response to antigovernment protests, but also those involved in public corruption and actions or policies that undermine democratic processes or institutions within the Government of Venezuela. Seven individuals were placed on the Office of Foreign Assets Control's List of Specially Designated Individuals and Blocked Persons (SDN List). Consequently, their property and interests in property subject to U.S. jurisdiction were blocked, and U.S. persons wherever located are generally prohibited from doing business with them. The E.O. also suspends the entry into the United States of any individual designated pursuant to the E.O.

Question #8. There have been recent media reports that former legislator Maria Corina Machado has been prohibited from running for office in Venezuela's upcoming December's congressional elections.

♦ What is the USG's position on this undemocratic measure taken by the Government of Venezuela designed to influence the outcome of the upcoming elections?

Answer. The United States is deeply concerned about the Venezuelan Government's continuing effort to prohibit opponents from participating in the political process. Prohibiting select opposition members from taking office is an abuse of power intended to silence and punish critics. Restricting opposition candidates weakens the electoral process and undermines the principle of democratic pluralism. This is why I publicly expressed my concern via Twitter upon learning of the action against Ms. Machado.

We join the U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights (UNHCHR), the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR), the European Union (EU), and the Canadian, Italian, Norwegian, and Spanish Governments in calling on the Venezuelan Government to cease efforts to silence the political opposition, further weaken democratic institutions, and for it to release political prisoners and respect human rights and fundamental freedoms, including freedoms of peaceful assembly and association.

We will continue to call on the Venezuelan Government to ensure free and fair elections by ceasing harassment of the opposition and allowing credible, independent international electoral observation. Free and fair elections, an essential element of a healthy democracy, require a society that encourages full citizen participation, opportunities for all individuals to become candidates, free operation of political parties and candidates, and flourishing independent media. All these conditions are consistent with the principles and values set forth in the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man and the Inter-American Democratic Charter.

Question #9. The Venezuela Defense of Human Rights and Civil Society Act of 2014 imposes targeted sanctions on persons responsible for violations of human rights of antigovernment protesters in Venezuela. In May of last year, you told this committee that the time was "not right" for sanctions on human rights violators in Venezuela. As you know, President Obama eventually signed this bill into law in December.

♦ Why has Miguel Rodriguez Torres, the Minister of Interior, Justice, and Peace not been sanctioned under this law?

♦ What about Diosdado Cabello, President of the National Assembly of Venezuela, reportedly the most corrupt man in Venezuela?

Answer. The action taken in March was a significant list that holds key individuals accountable, including based on involvement in human rights abuses and undermining democratic processes or institutions, including through public corruption.

We will continue to monitor developments on the ground and stand prepared to take action against others as additional information becomes available and is assessed to meet the criteria for sanctions.

Question #10. Mrs. Jacobson, you were the lead U.S. negotiator for the recently announced agreement to reestablish diplomatic relations between the United States and Cuba.

As such, do you fully stand by the results of the deal announced by President Obama, which you negotiated, to reestablish diplomatic relations between the United States and Cuba?

Do you believe the Obama administration's efforts to reestablish diplomatic relations will help preserve the Castro regime and Communist one party rule in Cuba or lead to democratic reforms?

Answer. Yes, I stand by our agreement with the Government of Cuba. Our new approach to Cuba will make it easier for the United States to advance our interests and result in greater prosperity for the Cuban people. For almost 55 years, we tried using isolation to bring about change in Cuba. However, as the President stated on December 17, that approach was not working. Instead of bringing about change, we ended up focusing the international community's attention on U.S. policy rather than on the negative effects of the Cuban Government's policies on the Cuban people.

Reopening the U.S. Embassy in Havana and reestablishing diplomatic relations are the first steps in a long process of normalization. By engaging the Cubans through U.S. Embassy Havana, we will improve our access to the Cuban Government and our ability to advance our interests on a variety of issues, which include human rights, law enforcement, extraditions, counternarcotics, property claims, and the environment. Our new approach also allows us greater contact with the Cuban people, who ultimately will have the power to choose their own future. In recognition of that reality, our diplomats will be able to travel more freely around island and engage with the Cuban people more effectively.

We understand that change will not come to Cuba overnight. There may well be setbacks on the path to normalization of U.S.-Cuba relations. However, by engaging the Cuban Government in an atmosphere of mutual respect, we hope to promote our interests more effectively and increase the prospects of the Cuban Government respecting the human rights and fundamental freedoms of its own people, thereby becoming prosperous and democratic.

Question #11. Please provide a copy of the agreement you negotiated with the Cuban Government to reestablish diplomatic relations outlining the key commitments made by each side.

Answer. From January 21 to July 1, I led a Department team in negotiating the conditions under which the proposed new embassies of the United States and Cuba in our respective countries would operate. That process culminated in the exchange of letters between President Obama and President Castro on July 1, 2015, in which they jointly agreed to reestablish diplomatic relations and reopen Embassies effective July 20. The only legally binding agreement concluded between the two countries in the course of these negotiations was an agreement to terminate the Interests Section Agreement of 1977, which was effected through an exchange of diplomatic notes on July 20.

Several members of my staff briefed Congress on the key outcomes of the negotiations. One example of these outcomes is that United States diplomats will be able to meet and exchange opinions with Cubans with a variety of voices and views, both within the government and outside. We will reciprocally loosen the travel restrictions on both missions. We have a good start on diplomatic shipments that will allow us to upgrade several physical aspects of the Embassy. Finally, we have agreed with the Cubans to review these conditions in the coming year to see what adjustments need to be made.

Question #12. According to Section 201 of the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity Act, it is the policy of the United States that diplomatic recognition should be considered “when the President determines that there exists a democratically elected government in Cuba.”

♦ Did the President determine that “there exists a democratically elected government in Cuba?”

Answer. No, he did not. The President’s new direction in policy toward Cuba maintains the long-standing objective of empowering the Cuban people and promoting a democratic, stable, and prosperous Cuba. The reestablishment of diplomatic relations is a key step in implementing this updated approach. Having the U.S. Embassy in Havana allows the United States to more effectively promote U.S. interests and values and increase engagement with the Cuban people.

Question #13. In a tweet from April 1 you said “engagement is the best way to bring freedom and opportunity to people of #Cuba and to promote America’s national interests.”

♦ We are all familiar with the numerous unilateral concessions the U.S. has given to the Castro regime. However, what freedoms have the Obama administration’s policy of engagement secured for the Cuban people?

Answer. Through increased travel and communication between Cubans on the island and people in the United States, which is a key part of the administration’s new approach, the Cuban people will be empowered through greater access to information and resources. People-to-people ties will be strengthened, and result in the building of bridges to bolster and broaden the normalization process.

This approach is already working. For example, we have seen an increase of about 35 percent in U.S. travel to Cuba this year, a deal by IDT Corporation, a New Jersey based telecommunications company, to handle direct long-distance phone traffic from Cuba, and the Cuban Government’s release of a broadband strategy that acknowledged its low household penetration rate of less than 5 percent and set the ambitious goal of achieving more than 50 percent by 2020. Moreover, in June the Cuban Government announced plans to open 35 public wi-fi hotspots for half the current price. We believe increased access to the Internet is fundamental to the free flow of information, and to the ability of the Cuban people to freely express themselves. We see this having enormous potential to connect the Cuban people with the rest of the world.

We believe our policy of empowering the Cuban people with greater access to information and resources will help foster prosperity for Cuban citizens. To this end, changes that went into effect on January 16 increase the amount of remittances permitted under general licenses and authorize expanded commercial sales from the United States of certain goods and services for use by private sector entrepreneurs and agricultural workers.

Question #14. Secretary Jacobson, in your testimony to this Senate Foreign Relations Committee on February 3, you stated: "We are already seeing indications that our updated approach gives us a greater ability to engage other nations in the hemisphere and around the world in promoting respect for fundamental freedoms in Cuba."

Since the President's December 17 announcement, there has been a slew of foreign dignitaries, business leaders, and Members of this Congress traveling to Cuba. They have all followed the same script, focusing on meetings with regime officials and ignoring Cuba's courageous dissidents. For example, one would be hard-pressed to find any foreign dignitary, business leader, or Member of this Congress, who has met with Berta Soler, the head of The Ladies in White, while in Havana. And that is the most-world renowned democracy group in Cuba.

As Yoani Sanchez recently wrote, "a true shower of Presidents, Foreign Ministers and deputies has intensified over Cuba without daily life feeling any kind of relief from such illustrious presences."

Meanwhile, political arrests in Cuba continue to rise. Since December 17, there have already been over 2,500 documented arrests. We have seen an increase in violent tactics, like this week against democracy leader Antonio Rodiles, who literally had his nose shattered by secret police officials, requiring emergency surgery.

- ♦ Why are all of these foreign dignitaries and businessmen shunning Cuba's democracy activists during their trips to Havana? Is it because the Cuban regime has made it clear that visits with dissidents would result in having meeting with regime officials canceled? As such, has this not further empowered the regime?
- ♦ What are some specific, recent examples of nations in this hemisphere promoting fundamental freedoms in Cuba, as you testified to this committee would take place?

Answer. We regularly urge foreign governments and other international organizations to raise human rights issues with the Cuban Government and meet with a broad range of Cuban society including independent civil society, both inside and outside of Cuba. The U.S. mission in Havana has maintained long-standing contacts with diverse and respected Cuban dissidents. Several Members of Congress, including Representative Pelosi and Senator Flake, met with Cuban civil society representatives during previous visits to Havana. Moreover, the President has expressed his confidence in the American people as being the best ambassadors of our principles and values. That would include U.S. businesses.

The United States remains committed to supporting vibrant civil society and forward progress on human rights issues in Cuba. To that end, we continue to encourage other governments and international organizations to raise human rights concerns in their meetings with the Cuban Government. We believe our previous policy of isolation was counterproductive in that it made it more difficult for the United States to advance this goal. Under our new policy approach to Cuba, U.S. diplomats will have greater access to engage directly with the Cuban Government on a range of issues and in particular, on human rights.

We believe U.S. engagement with Cuba will also result in greater visibility and greater support internationally for Cuban civil society. For the first time, independent Cuban civil society groups attended the Summit of the Americas in Panama City this year. Cuban dissidents participated in President Obama's meeting with civil society at the summit, along with the Presidents of Uruguay and Costa Rica. Moreover, we have been able to bring together third country ambassadors on the island with dissidents for the first time. These opportunities give dissidents not permitted to travel, access to such diplomats for the first time. Cuban Government-organized groups tried to block and publicly clashed with independent Cuban groups, who demonstrated their maturity and professionalism with substantive participation in the summit process. We believe these public incidents served to place a spotlight for the rest of the region on the restrictive environment in which Cuban civil society operates and raise awareness of this issue for the benefit of many government rep-representatives and civil society groups from around the hemisphere. Finally, increasing the free flow of information to and from Cuba, a key component of the President's policy, will help amplify new voices from Cuba and increase information to activists on the island.

Question #15. During the President's December 17 announcement, he "welcomed" the Cuban regime's decision to provide more access to international institutions, specifically the International Committee of the Red Cross, which promotes universal values.

- ♦ Has the Cuban regime allowed the ICRC to visit prison conditions in Cuba, as they have repeatedly requested and been denied, but President Obama announced? Have you discussed this issue, which is one of the very few things the Cuban regime apparently promised President Obama for the litany of concessions given?
- ♦ How many Cubans have been jailed since December 17?

Answer. In the March session of the Human Rights Council, Cuban Foreign Minister Rodriguez extended an invitation to the president of the ICRC to visit Cuba. We are not aware of visits by the ICRC to monitor prison conditions, and ultimately, the scheduling and specific details of visits by international human rights organizations to Cuba are determined by the Cuban Government and those international actors, respectively. We have and continue to use the opportunities presented by our new approach to Cuba to urge the Cuban Government to schedule these and other visits by international human rights bodies in order to provide for greater transparency and allow for objective assessments of the state of Cuba's prisons. We will encourage other countries to urge the same.

During my January 22 visit to Cuba, I urged the Cuban Government to provide prison access to the U.N. and other international organizations. We will continue to press for greater access—and for the Cuban Government to live up to Raul Castro's statement that "Cuba reiterates its willingness to cooperate in multilateral bodies, such as the United Nations."

Independent civil society groups track the number of short-term arbitrary detentions of activists who are freely exercising their human rights and fundamental freedoms. From January through June 2015, the independent group Comisión Cubana de Derechos Humanos y Reconciliación Nacional (Cuban Commission of Human Rights and National Reconciliation) documented 2,822 short-term detentions.

Question #16. Cuba is considered a hard target by the Intelligence Community and has an aggressive intelligence collection posture against the United States. The United States is considered the principal target from the Cuban intelligence apparatus. The U.S. employs hundreds of Cuban nationals at the U.S. Interests Section in Havana. This is clearly a significant counterintelligence threat.

- ♦ While I recognize that it is not possible to have every person working at the Interests Section a U.S. person, do you support efforts to have supervisory positions headed up by U.S. persons who have undergone a background investigation to ensure we are taking reasonable steps to counter the CI threat at our diplomatic facilities in Cuba?

Answer. No. Given the unique nature of working in Cuba, we have a dynamic program in place to ensure the safety and security of personnel and sensitive information.

Our operations in Havana and around the world dictate we use local staff for supervisory positions in some Embassy functions (motorpool, administrative, and consular, for example). Utilizing locally hired staff results in significant costs savings as compared to U.S. direct-hire employees. As is standard practice at our embassies throughout the world, an American employee with a security clearance in the direct chain of the employee must review all Cuban staff and sign off on their employee evaluations. As a result, each Cuban employee of the U.S. Embassy in Havana is supervised by a cleared American employee. Furthermore, Cuban employees at the Embassy do not have the authority to make hiring or dismissal decisions, nor can they implement disciplinary actions.

Question #17. According to the State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report, Cuba has been a Tier 3 country since they were first evaluated in 2003.

- ♦ Is the State Department planning on moving Cuba to Tier Watch List 2?
- ♦ What specific actions have the Cuban Government taken to justify its improvement in ranking?

Answer. The Department will be releasing this year's Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report soon. It would be premature to comment on any particular outcome; whatever conclusions are reached with respect to individual countries will both be based on a pragmatic analysis of the best information possible and reinforce our strong interest in human rights around the world.

The TIP Report covers 188 countries and territories in detail. Consistently over the past 14 years, it has provided detailed analyses and meaningful recommendations for advancing global efforts to fight trafficking. As with any nation, the United States seeks to cooperate with Cuba in eliminating trafficking in persons.

Question #18. During a special briefing on May 19, 2015, regarding the Ongoing Discussions with Cuba to Re-Establish Diplomatic Relations and Reopen Embassies, an anonymous senior State Department official stated the following via teleconference:

SENIOR STATE DEPARTMENT OFFICIAL: "I can certainly reiterate that the status of Guantanamo is not a part of these talks." As I had said months ago, it is not on the table. The question of why, or why not, I think is a question—the President has made clear he's not interested in having that conversation. But we've made clear that the issue of Guantanamo is not on the table at this point, and I don't—I can't say what the future may bring on this, but it's not on the table right now, and I don't know that there's a reason to justify having it or not having it. And you certainly heard the Cubans' view on this, but it's not under discussion at this point.

That official went on to say of U.S. democracy programs:

SENIOR STATE DEPARTMENT OFFICIAL: "On the question of democracy programs, I think the thing that you have to remember is the democracy programs, in their history since I think about 1996 when they began, have changed over time. And they will continue to change over time to reflect a reality, whether that reality is on the ground in Cuba or in the United States. When the democracy programs began, for example, Cubans could not travel nearly as freely as they now can. Ever since the change in policy by the Cuban Government in 2013, many more people can travel, which means people can do things and participate in things outside of Cuba as opposed to inside of it.

"I think we always have to be cognizant of making sure that when we are supporting the Cuban people, we're doing it in a way that is the most effective. We've moved forward with requests for funding in the past couple of years, and we've done that most recently in FY16. But I think we have to be careful not to ever have thought that those programs were static and separate from changes in the environment in which they're working."

- ◆ Were you that anonymous official?
- ◆ Was that official expressing a change in U.S. policy on the strategic importance of Naval Station Guantanamo?
- ◆ How do you anticipate democracy programs in Cuba to "change over time?"

Answer. The Department does not normally provide the names of officials who are asked to do background briefings for the press. However, I can affirm to you that there has been no change in U.S. policy regarding the strategic importance of Naval Station Guantanamo. We have not discussed the status of Naval Station Guantanamo with the Cuban Government during these discussions. I reiterate Secretary Kerry's statement on July 20 that "at this time, there is no discussion and no intention on our part at this moment to alter the existing lease treaty or other arrangements with respect to the naval station."

U.S. assistance supports civil society initiatives that promote democracy, human rights and fundamental freedoms, particularly freedom of expression. The promotion of democratic principles and human rights remains the core goal of U.S. assistance. Through regular interagency meetings, the Department and USAID work together to review programs, identifying the most successful programming areas to date and making note of new or as-yet unreached audiences, so that future programs among the agencies will be complementary and highly effective. Following Cuba's lifting of travel restrictions in early 2013, more civil society members have been able to participate in training opportunities outside of Cuba, increasing their professional networks. In addition, as the staff members at the U.S. Embassy in Havana are able to engage a wider range of Cuban society, new areas of focus for our programming may develop, consistent with applicable U.S. legislation.

Question #19. On January 18, 2015, Argentinian prosecutor Alberto Nisman was found dead of a gunshot wound in his apartment located in Buenos Aires, Argentina. Nisman was the principal investigative prosecutor in the Argentine Israelite Mutual Association (AMIA) bombing investigation, killed 85 people and wounded more than 300. Nisman's investigation revealed the involvement of Iran and Hezbollah in the attack and led to the issuance of Interpol “Red Notices” (detainment notices) for the identified conspirators.

- ◆ Have you seen any analysis of the Nisman death that would lead you to conclude that he was murdered?

Answer. There has been a great deal of analysis and speculation concerning the causes of and responsibility for Prosecutor Nisman’s death; however, to date the investigation has been inconclusive. Since the death of Prosecutor Nisman, both the Department and our Embassy in Buenos Aires have pushed for a complete, transparent, and impartial investigation into Mr. Nisman’s death. Through our Embassy in Buenos Aires, we have been in contact with Argentine law enforcement officials to offer U.S. assistance to the investigation.

Question #20. The Millennium Challenge Corporation’s Compact-Eligibility Country Selection Criteria and Methodology includes a competitive selection process that judges each country’s performance in three areas, ruling justly; investing in people and economic freedom.

- ◆ Do you believe that El Salvador’s Government is worthy of MCC funds that are intended for countries that are “governing justly” and upholding the rule of law?
- ◆ Are you aware of any discussion among officers of your bureau or with MCC staff that the standards were being lowered to accommodate El Salvador’s second MCC grant of $277 million?
- ◆ Can you describe such deliberations in detail?

Answer. To determine countries’ eligibility to receive compacts MCC utilizes a scorecard that measures the extent to which a country rules justly, respects economic freedom, and invests in its people. MCC has determined that El Salvador meets these requirements. Additionally, El Salvador was a strong partner in implementing their first MCC compact.

MCC monitors its partner countries before and during compact implementation. MCC has shown that it will take action—up to and including suspension or termination—if an MCC partner is engaged in a pattern of actions inconsistent with the agency’s principles and selection criteria. The Salvadoran Government committed to contribute $88.2 million on top of MCC’s investment, constituting a combined total of $365.2 million.

When MCC’s Board of Directors approved the compact in September 2013, MCC stated its expectation that the Salvadoran Government needed to make tangible and sustained progress on improving the investment climate and strengthening the rule of law. Progress in these areas will help ensure that MCC’s investment achieves long-term and sustainable results.

Once the Salvadoran Government presented a solid plan to address these issues and made tangible and sustained progress on addressing them, MCC moved forward with signing the compact in September 2014.

Among other reforms and commitments obtained from the Salvadoran Government as a condition for compact signing, the Legislative Assembly passed reforms to the antimoney laundering regime prior to the signing and the Salvadoran Government committed to further reforms criminalizing bulk cash smuggling and regulating money remitters. Now that the compact is signed, the focus is on successful implementation of the projects, which include further reforms to improve the investment climate.

Question #21. On January 30, 2015, I wrote a letter to Secretary Kerry expressing concern about the Government of Uruguay’s handling of six Guantanamo Bay detainees transferred to Uruguay in December 2014. In that letter, I requested “the written agreement between the U.S. Department of State and the Government of Uruguay” related to the transfer of these detainees. Following several briefings, the State Department informed my staff and Senator Corker’s staff that there was no written agreement. On May 20, 2015, Chairman Corker formally requested “All diplomatic notes, cables, and other documents describing any commitments, understandings, or other agreements or arrangements between the United States Government and the Government of Uruguay related to the transfer and subsequent disposition of the Guantanamo Bay detainees transferred late last year.”

- ◆ Please provide these documents.

Answer. The Department appreciates Congress’ important oversight responsibilities on these transfers and is committed to providing information to enable your committee to perform that function. That said, the Department, across two administrations, has consistently informed Congress, and represented to U.S. courts, that disclosing these diplomatic assurances would have a chilling effect on foreign governments’ willingness to cooperate on detainee transfers.

Accordingly, these sensitive diplomatic communications containing foreign government information are kept to a limited executive branch dissemination. Indeed, foreign governments have noted that disclosure outside of this limited dissemination could endanger future cooperation related to detainee transfers, which would harm cooperative efforts to mitigate any threat posed by transferred detainees.

The Department is happy to brief you or your staff further on these issues.

Question #22. If confirmed, what will be your approach regarding raising U.S. concerns related to corruption, religious freedom, and human rights in Mexico? How will you, as Ambassador, broach what are often sensitive issues with a close democratic partner?

Answer. We have a strong, positive relationship with Mexico that allows us to raise issues of concern in a respectful, productive manner. If confirmed as Ambassador, I will work to maintain a constructive partnership such that we can forthrightly share viewpoints and work together to resolve areas of concern in a proactive and direct manner.

Cooperation on anticorruption and good governance are a core part of the bilateral agenda. President Peña Nieto signed Mexico's anticorruption bill into law in May. The legislation will strengthen oversight of public officials and designates a special prosecutor to tackle corruption issues. Mexico is also a founding member of the Open Government Partnership and its willingness to chair the initiative for the next year is a signal of President Peña Nieto's desire to improve governance in Mexico.

We are actively engaged with Mexico on human rights issues, and we have established a formal mechanism, the Bilateral Human Rights Dialogue that brings together officials from the Departments of State, Defense, Homeland Security, Justice, and other U.S. Government agencies to meet with Mexican counterparts, to review and discuss a wide range of human rights issues.

In addition to the formal Bilateral Dialogue, we regularly meet with government officials at all levels, as well as with civil society and human rights groups, to discuss both general issues and specific cases—including issues related to religious freedom. If confirmed, I will work to strengthen these efforts and ensure human rights concerns remain a central element of our bilateral relationship.

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE JACOBSON'S RESPONSES TO ADDITIONAL FOLLOW-UP QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR RUBIO

Question. Mrs. Jacobson, the Obama administration stated that its January 2015 changes to U.S. regulations regarding commerce and travel to Cuba were tailored to "support the Cuban people." Yet, in a recent newspaper article about the limited commerce resulting from this new policy because of the Cuban Government's insistence on funneling U.S. transactions through its monopolies, rather than allowing the Cuban people to benefit directly, you were quoted as stating that the new rules were "a work in progress. Cubans are getting used to it; our business people are getting used to it. We are going to tweak. We may not have written them right."

- ♦ What portion of the administration's new Cuba regulations was "not written right?"
- ♦ Do you agree that accommodating increased U.S. commerce through the Cuban Government's monopolies does not "support the Cuban people" and that such benefiting of the Cuban Government's oligarchs contravenes the previously stated purpose of the Obama administration's Cuba policy and legislative limitations on U.S. Policy toward Cuba as codified in law?

Answer. The regulatory amendments introduced January 16 by the Departments of Commerce and the Treasury, consistent with the President's December 17, 2014, announcement, were developed through a comprehensive interagency process in order to increase the flow of information and resources in support and for the benefit of the Cuban people. These changes, among other things, ease travel restrictions, facilitate certain exports, and increase the amount of remittances that may be sent to individual Cubans. This administration is strongly committed to ensuring that the spirit of the President's new direction on Cuba policy is implemented in practice, and that U.S. persons are able to engage with and support the Cuban people. The regulations were published 1 month after the President's announcement, and in the following months many individuals, NGOs, and businesses have begun to use these authorizations. There is no question that these measures have already had a substantial positive impact on the Cuban people. However, across sanctions programs, the U.S. Government makes every effort to ensure that authorizations have the intended impact—something that cannot be ensured until they are used.

To this end, the State Department supports amendments and changes to regulations to help ensure that our foreign policy goals continue to be fully met.

The January 16 regulatory amendments are consistent with U.S. law and with our foreign policy goals. Increased travel and interaction between the United States and Cuba, and limited commerce in certain areas (e.g., exports of agricultural commodities, medicines and medical devices, items for use by the Cuban private sector, consumer communications devices, and telecommunications equipment) serve to build people-to-people ties and increase the flow of information and resources to the Cuban people.

Question. Related to the case of notorious Mexican drug lord “El Chapo” Guzman:

- ◆ What was the first date on which you discussed the Guzman case with Mexican officials?
- ◆ What was the last date on which you discussed the Guzman case with Mexican officials?
- ◆ As Assistant Secretary, were you personally aware of any information suggesting that Guzman was plotting an escape?
 - If so, did you convey this information to Mexican officials?

Answer. Extradition of Joaquin “El Chapo” Guzman has been the subject of discussions between the United States and Mexico for a number of years. Pursuant to the U.S./Mexico Extradition Treaty, in advance of submitting a full extradition request, either country may seek from the other a provisional arrest warrant for a fugitive; the treaty further contemplates that, after the fugitive has been arrested, a full extradition package will be submitted. We can confirm that, at the request of the United States, Mexico issued such a provisional arrest warrant more than a decade ago.

After the Mexican Government recaptured Guzman on February 22, 2014, I and others in the U.S. Government and in Embassy Mexico City discussed the Guzman case with Mexican officials and underscored the strong interest of the United States in seeking his extradition. We remained in close contact with the Mexican Government and subsequent to the arrest of Guzman last year, the United States submitted a full extradition request to Mexico.

U.S. Attorney General Lynch spoke with Mexican Attorney General Gomez on July 12—within 24 hours after Guzman’s escape—to offer full support to the Mexican Government in its efforts to recapture him. The United States and Mexico are working closely together through law enforcement and diplomatic channels at all levels to coordinate efforts and resources to recapture Guzman.

Both Mexican and U.S. authorities were well aware of Guzman’s history and previous escape. During Guzman’s recent incarceration, the U.S. Government discussed with Mexican authorities information concerning his criminal associates’ desire to break him out of prison; however, this information was general, nonspecific, and spoke to intent, not the actual planning, means, or timing of an escape attempt.

Question. Regarding your 2014 testimony on the human rights situation in Venezuela: Did the recognized leaders of Mesa Unidad Democratica ask you directly to ensure that the U.S. Government not act in a way that would undermine the ongoing dialogue?

- ◆ Which members of the political opposition whom were engaged in the dialogue did you speak with?
- ◆ Please explain how the answer to my question for the record is consistent with your clarification for the record last year indicating that you had not been in touch with members of the opposition involved in the dialogue?

Answer. Both my clarification for the record last year and my response to your question for the record are consistent with my testimony.

Over the last several years, in Washington and elsewhere, I have had the opportunity to speak with many members of the diverse Venezuelan political opposition, private sector, civil society, and government.

The political opposition is in an extremely difficult position in Venezuela, and not all members of the opposition agree on how to further their political objectives. I respect the varying opinions and perspectives among leaders of the MUD. When developing U.S. policy, we remain mindful of the on-the-ground situation and the possible consequences of our actions. There was no direct request that we refrain from sanctions, but we were at that time extremely aware of the context of the dialogue and its fragility.

Question. On Question 9 related to the Venezuela Defense of Human Rights and Civil Society Act of 2014, please provide a written response or a briefing in the appropriate setting explaining why these individuals have not been sanctioned.

- ♦ Miguel Rodriguez Torres, the Minister of Interior, Justice; and Peace Hugo Carvajal, the head of the Directorate of military intelligence Diosdado Cabello, President of the National Assembly of Venezuela.

Answer. Each determination on whether and when to impose targeted measures, including visa restrictions or asset blocking, takes into account U.S. law and whether the measures are likely to advance U.S. foreign policy interests in addition to the specific information we have on individuals. These interests include respect for the human rights of the Venezuelan people, democratic governance and pluralism, and regional security and stability.

On September 12, 2008, the U.S. Department of the Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC) designated Hugo Armando Carvajal Barrios under the Kingpin Act. That action froze any assets Carvajal may have under U.S. jurisdiction and prohibited any U.S. persons from conducting financial or commercial transactions involving those assets.

The steps the Department took in July 2014 and February 2015 to restrict visa eligibility for individuals believed to be responsible for, or complicit in, human rights abuses and public corruption were carried out pursuant to Section 212 (a)(3)(C) of the Immigration and Nationality Act. Visa confidentiality laws restrict us from naming those individuals.

We continue to monitor developments on the ground and stand prepared to take action against others as additional information becomes available and is assessed in terms of U.S. law and foreign policy interests.

Question. On Question 11, please provide any documents that outline the agreement you negotiated, legally binding or otherwise, between the United States and Cuba regarding the number of personnel allowed at each Embassy and the conditions under which the Embassies will operate. If this is not provided in the exchange of notes or letters, please provide the relevant reporting cables.

Answer. We appreciate and welcome the strong interest that you and other Members of Congress have in ensuring that our U.S. Embassy in Cuba will be able to fully perform its duties and functions. We also appreciate that Congress has important oversight responsibilities in this regard and we are committed to providing as much information as possible to ensure that Congress can perform this function.

As you know, on July 7 senior officials from the U.S. State Department's Bureau of Western Hemisphere Affairs and Bureau of Diplomatic Security provided a classified briefing to Foreign Relations Committee staff, including members of your staff, which covered all substantive aspects of the agreement, including the numbers of personnel at each Embassy and the conditions under which the Embassies will operate. We would be happy to continue briefing your staff to answer any additional questions you may have and to update you as the bilateral relationship progresses.

Question. On Question 12, are you arguing that the administration's Cuba policy complies with Section 201 of the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity Act and if so, how? If not, has the administration concluded it is not bound by this law and if so, why?

Answer. The administration's Cuba policy is consistent with all applicable law. Article II, Section 3 of the Constitution grants the President the authority to "receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers." This grant of authority has long been understood to provide the President with the exclusive authority to establish diplomatic relations with foreign nations. Presidents throughout our history have used their constitutional authority to establish or reestablish diplomatic relations with foreign nations, and there are numerous recent examples of Presidents from both parties doing so.

Section 201 of the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity ("LIBERTAD") Act of 1996 provides that it is the policy of the United States "[t]o consider the restoration of diplomatic recognition and support the reintegration of the Cuban Government into Inter-American organizations when the President determines that there exists a democratically elected government in Cuba." While the provision thus indicates that the United States should consider restoration of diplomatic recognition if the specified condition is met, it does not by its terms purport to prohibit the President from exercising his exclusive constitutional authority with respect to recognition in other circumstances. Consistent with long-standing constitutional practice and President Clinton's statement on signing the LIBERTAD Act, we construe this provision to be precatory to avoid interfering with the President's constitutional authority to reestablish diplomatic relations with Cuba.

Question. On Question 13, what is the percentage increase in Internet access in Cuba since December 17, 2014?

Answer. Data are not available to estimate the increase in Internet access in Cuba since December 17 with sufficient accuracy. However, public pressure for Internet access has swelled in recent months, evidenced in part by a substantial increase in demand for Cubans' use of the Internet Center at Embassy Havana. The January 16 regulatory changes enable U.S. telecommunications firms to export the equipment and services needed to rapidly expand Internet connectivity.

The Cuban National Assembly posted updates regarding its July 14 session on official Twitter and Facebook accounts, suggesting the Cuban Government's acknowledgment of the need to adapt to greater international interconnectivity. In June, the Cuban Government announced the addition of 35 Wi-Fi hotspots and a reduction in Internet access rates from $4.50 to $2.00. While this rate is still too expensive for the average Cuban, we assess the Cuban Government finally realizes its Internet penetration rate of less than 5 percent is too low for the country to thrive in a global economy. For the moment, however, reliable, legal, and affordable Internet access remains out of reach for the average Cuban citizen.

Question. With regards to Question 16, please answer the following questions:

- ◆ How many non-U.S. persons currently work in U.S. diplomatic facilities in Cuba?
- ◆ How many are projected to work there next year? Are there plans to hire additional non-U.S. persons?
- ◆ How many non-U.S. persons currently hold supervisory positions in U.S. diplomatic facilities in Cuba?
- ◆ Do any of these individuals have access to sensitive areas within the U.S. Embassy compound such as access to the Ambassador, DCM or other senior leader's office space, access to the same floor as a sensitive compartmented information facility or the motor pool vehicles used by senior U.S. diplomats and visiting delegations?
- ◆ How does the State Department define "supervisory" in this instance?
- ◆ Please list the positions defined as supervisory that are currently held by non-U.S. persons.
- ◆ Have any of these individuals undergone a background check or polygraph test?
 - If so, who conducted the background checks or polygraph tests?
- ◆ What would it cost to replace each non-U.S. person supervisor currently working in a U.S. diplomatic facility in Cuba with a cleared U.S. person?

Answer. There are currently 294 non-U.S. persons working in U.S. diplomatic facilities in Cuba. We have several authorized positions that are currently vacant and hope to fill 10–15 of these in the next year.

We employ local staff in Havana in positions that entail some oversight of local staff, as we do at all embassies throughout the world. In Havana, approximately 40 Cubans have some oversight of other Cuban employees. No Cuban employees supervise American staff. Each Cuban employee has an American supervisor. Cuban employees do not have the authority to make hiring or dismissal decisions, nor can they implement disciplinary actions.

Access to our facilities in Havana is strictly controlled. As with other embassies around the world, there are certain areas within the Embassy that only cleared Americans can access.

The following positions have some oversight or administrative responsibility for less experienced Cuban staff and are currently held by non-U.S. persons:

- ◆ Senior HR Assistant
- ◆ Senior Storekeeper
- ◆ Shipment Supervisor
- ◆ Mechanic Supervisor
- ◆ Maintenance Supervisor (2)
- ◆ Computer Management Supervisor
- ◆ Procurement Team Leader
- ◆ Housing/Property Assistant
- ◆ Senior Guard Supervisor
- ◆ Guard Shift Supervisor (5)
- ◆ Senior Guard (5)
- ◆ Administrative Assistant
- ◆ Senior Visa Assistant
- ◆ Refugee Unit Supervisor
- ◆ IV/NIV Team Leader (6)
- ◆ IV Subject Matter Expert (2)
- ◆ Admissions Team Leader
- ◆ Document Checker Team Leader

- ◆ Principal Cashier
- ◆ PSU Team Leader
- ◆ Physician
- ◆ Pol/Econ Assistant
- ◆ Senior Media Assistant
- ◆ Financial Specialist

All Cuban employees are required to pass a background check investigation that is performed by a cleared American staff member of the Regional Security Office.

For FY 2017, the estimated startup costs for a new U.S. Direct Hire (USDH) position overseas is $222,500. The yearly costs for that position are estimated at $441,100. The average cost of a Cuban employee at the Embassy in Havana is $12,000. To replace a Cuban employee with a USDH would cost an additional $651,600 the first year and $429,100 in subsequent years.

Question. With regards to Question 17, given that the report has now been released:

- ◆ What was your role in the decision to move Cuba from Tier 3 to Tier 2 Watch List in the TIP report?
- ◆ Did you discuss the TIP ranking upgrade during your recently concluded negotiations with the Cuban Government?
- ◆ What specific actions did the Cuban Government take during 2014 to justify this upgrade?

Answer. The Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (J/TIP), which gathers data for and drafts the annual TIP report, does not fall under my oversight. However, the Bureau of Western Hemisphere Affairs collaborates with J/TIP in developing the report narrative and ranking for WHA countries. Information used to generate the report comes from a wide variety of credible sources, including foreign government officials, NGO representatives, international organizations, journalists, academics, and survivors of trafficking. Also included is input from U.S. diplomats on the ground and State Department country desk officers.

State Department officials do not discuss TIP rankings with foreign governments prior to the annual report's public release. And we did not do so with the Cubans during the negotiations on reestablishing diplomatic relations or at any other time in our discussions with the Cubans. As a courtesy, we do disclose our final decisions to foreign governments shortly before publicly releasing the annual rankings. Tier rankings in the 2015 TIP report reflect a country's efforts to comply with the minimum standards to eliminate trafficking in persons set forth by Congress in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), including law enforcement efforts, victim assistance, and prevention efforts.

In 2014, the Cuban Government reported several law enforcement and victims assistance efforts to combat sex trafficking. For example, the government released official data on prosecutions and convictions of sex traffickers during the previous calendar year, showing additional law enforcement efforts that led to 13 prosecutions and convictions, versus 10 in 2012. This demonstrated clear progress over the prior year.

The government also provided assistance to sex trafficking victims identified in the 13 cases. In addition, employees of the Ministries of Tourism and Education received training to spot indicators of sex trafficking, particularly among children engaged in commercial sex.

Our robust engagement with the Cuban Government on combating trafficking in persons has included the exchange of delegations of experts in 2014 and 2015.

Question.

- ◆ Is it your assessment that the Government of Argentina has conducted a complete, transparent, and impartial investigation into the death of Alberto Nisman?
- ◆ Have the offers of U.S. assistance you mentioned been accepted by the Government of Argentina?
- ◆ What is your assessment of the accusations made as a result of Mr. Nisman's investigation into the AMIA bombing?

Question. The Argentine investigation into Alberto Nisman's death has not yet concluded. We are following the investigation closely, including the analyses of outside investigators hired by Mr. Nisman's former wife, Judge Sandra Arroyo Salgado. The United States has urged the Argentine Government to conduct an objective, transparent, thorough, and prompt inquiry into Mr. Nisman's death, and we await the outcomes of the ongoing inquiry. Argentine authorities have not accepted U.S. offers of investigative assistance, although we remain ready to provide aid—if and when requested.

It is for the Argentine people and judicial system to assess the results of Mr. Nisman's investigation and its relevance to the bombing of the AMIA Jewish community center. For more than two decades, the United States has supported Argentina's efforts to hold accountable the perpetrators of the heinous attack on the AMIA Jewish community center. I personally did some of my first work in the region researching the Argentine Jewish community during the military government, have known leaders of the community for decades, and care deeply about the outcome of this case. We have clearly and consistently urged the international community to support the investigation, consistent with the rule of law. The United States looks forward to, and will continue to work toward, the day when justice is done for the victims of this attack.

Question. With regards to Question 21, multiple Senators have been requesting this information for more than 6 months. Despite repeated briefings, the administration has yet to provide the requested information, even in summary form, including the specific commitments made by the Government of Uruguay.

♦ Please provide the requested information so that this committee can fulfill its oversight responsibilities.

Answer. The Department appreciates Congress' important oversight responsibilities on these transfers and is committed to providing information to enable your committee to perform that function. As you know, the Department, across two administrations, has consistently informed Congress and represented to U.S. courts that disclosing these diplomatic assurances would have a chilling effect on foreign governments' willingness to cooperate on detainee transfers.

Accordingly, these sensitive diplomatic communications containing foreign government information are kept to a limited executive branch dissemination. Indeed, foreign governments have noted that disclosure outside of this limited dissemination could endanger future cooperation related to detainee transfers, which would harm cooperative efforts to mitigate any threat posed by transferred detainees.

The Department is committed to continuing and deepening our dialogue with you on this important topic and the Office for Guantanamo Closure would be happy to brief you or your staff further on these issues.

Question. What portion of the administration's new Cuba regulations was "not written right?"

Answer. Following the President's December 17, 2014, announcement, the Treasury and Commerce Departments took steps within the scope of executive authority to implement certain aspects of the administration's new approach toward Cuba. The regulatory amendments published January 16 were developed through a comprehensive interagency process with the goal of further engaging and supporting the Cuban people. To that end, it is clear that these regulations have already made a substantial impact. For example, travel to Cuba increased over 35 percent during the first quarter of 2015, and U.S. entities have made use of the new license exception for exports. In addition, the debate over access to the internet in Cuba has shifted from criticism of U.S. restrictions to what steps the Cuban Government must take to increase connectivity and allow its people to communicate amongst themselves and with the outside world.

My comment was not intended to signal that the January regulatory amendments were somehow written incorrectly or in error, but rather that we continue to assess how the intent of the policy direction can be achieved in practice. As we do across sanctions programs, the U.S. Government will continue to make every effort to ensure that the Cuba regulations have the intended impact and meet our foreign policy goals, within the limits of executive authority. The State Department regularly supports amendments and changes to regulations to help ensure that our foreign policy goals continue to be fully met.

Question. What was the last date prior to his escape from prison on which you discussed the Guzman case with Mexican officials?

Answer. Upon his arrest last year, I and other U.S. Government officials discussed with Mexican officials numerous times the importance of extraditing Guzman to the United States. I repeatedly made clear that Guzman's eventual extradition to the United States was a top priority for the U.S. Government and for our bilateral law enforcement cooperation. Our Mexican counterparts made clear they wanted to prosecute Guzman in Mexico for crimes committed against the Mexican people before taking up consideration of any extradition request. That is Mexico's sovereign right and is permitted under our bilateral extradition treaty, at Mexico's discretion. The Mexicans believed they would be able to hold Guzman in prison; however, I and other U.S. Government officials continued to raise the U.S. interest in extraditions, including in Guzman's case, in high-level meetings in the months prior to his escape.

Question. Which members of the political opposition engaged in the dialogue did you speak with prior to your testimony in May 2014?

Answer. I spoke with various members of the diverse Venezuelan political opposition, including representatives from the opposition coalition (Democratic Unity Roundtable—Mesa de la Unidad Democrática, MUD) and several individual political parties, including but not limited to Justice First (Primero Justicia), A New Era (Un Nuevo Tiempo), and Popular Will (Voluntad Popular).

Our Embassy in Caracas remains in close contact with the MUD and individual political parties, including but not limited to Democratic Action (Acción Democrática), Advanced Progressive (Avanzada Progresista), Christian Democratic (COPEI), Primero Justicia, Voluntad Popular, Vente Venezuela, and Un Nuevo Tiempo. The Embassy's reporting on these meetings provides key on-the-ground insights to inform my—and other policy makers'—understanding and decisionmaking.

We strive—here in Washington and in Caracas—to speak with a broad spectrum of the population including the opposition, private sector, civil society, and government.

Question. What was your role in the planning the August 14, 2015, flag-raising at the U.S. Embassy in Havana?

Who was responsible for determining the guest list of those invited to the flag raising ceremony?

Since the reestablishment of diplomatic relations with Cuba, the U.S. Embassy's Twitter account has covered a wide range of issues such as climate change, sports and even promoted Cuban Government officials (in the case of Eusebio Leal). Yet, there has not been a single tweet promoting human rights and democracy. Why?

During your tenure as Assistant Secretary of State, have you met with representatives of, or attended any events hosted by, Engage Cuba, the Trimpa Group, and Cuba Now? If so, please provide a list of the dates, individuals involved, and the subject matter of the meetings or events attended.

Answer. The Department of State worked closely with other U.S. Government agencies and the U.S. Embassy to plan the August 14 flag-raising at the U.S. Embassy in Havana.

In developing the guest list for the events in Havana on August 14, the Department of State sought to include as many individuals as possible from a broad array of sectors including the U.S. Congress, business leaders, civil society, and the general public. Guests also included Cuban Government officials.

The State Department and U.S. Embassy Havana employ a range of tools to engage the Government of Cuba on democracy and human rights. We have used social media in the past to decry human rights abuses such as the early July 2015 beating of Antonio Rodiles. Since reestablishing diplomatic relations, we are advocating for human rights directly with the Cuban Government. As our bilateral relationship evolves, we will continue to advocate on behalf of the Cuban people for fundamental freedoms, including the right to peaceful assembly, association, and freedom of expression. In his August 14 speech at the flag-raising in Havana, which was tweeted by the U.S. Embassy, Secretary Kerry delivered a strong message of support for democracy on the island.

In my capacity as Assistant Secretary of State, I meet regularly with a broad array of individuals and organizations to discuss U.S. policy toward the Western Hemisphere. During my tenure, I have attended events also attended by representatives from a wide and diverse range of organizations involved with Cuba, among them the Trimpa Group, Engage Cuba, and Cuba Now. At those events where I have engaged in conversation with these individuals, we have discussed U.S. policy toward Cuba.

Question. Media reports indicate that human rights experts at the State Department concluded that trafficking conditions had not improved in Cuba, and thus did not deserve to be upgraded from Tier 3 to Tier 2 Watch List.

Did you personally review any drafts of the Cuba section of the annual TIP report?

Did WHA propose any changes to the draft report produced by J/TIP?

If so, what changes were proposed?

Did any office or individual at the State Department oppose the upgrade of Cuba?

Please provide:

- ◆ All prior drafts of the Cuba portion of the TIP report.
- ◆ The specific changes proposed by WHA.

- ♦ Names of all State Department and White House officials who signed off on Cuba Section.
- ♦ Copy of the Cuban Government's national action plan.

Answer. The State Department has staff working on human trafficking issues in Washington and at U.S. embassies around the world. The State Department has a dedicated office, the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, which works year-round to gather information and produce the annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report.

Final decisions are reached only after rigorous analysis and discussion among officials in the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons; staff at the relevant regional bureaus and U.S. missions overseas; and senior State Department leadership—including myself. The final rankings are then approved by the Secretary of State.

The process is deliberative and fact-based. It is critical that Department officials are able to speak freely and frankly during the deliberative process, which ultimately contributes to the integrity of the report and the strength of tier-ranking decisions. Moreover, discussion of the internal deliberations that informed the Secretary's decision would undermine his authority as provided in the TVPA. We disclose our methodology in the report; however, we do not release earlier drafts of the final product or documents related to deliberations during the process.

The Cuban Government informed the Department in March of 2015 that they were developing a national action plan, which would include trafficking in persons, but we refer you to the Cuban Embassy in the United States for further information on this plan.

However, in November 2014, the Government of Cuba released a report detailing efforts to combat trafficking in persons, which is publicly available. (See <http://www.cubaminrex.cu/es/informe-de-cuba-sobre-el-enfrentamiento-juridico-penal-la-trata-de-personas-y-otras-formas-de-abuso>.)

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE JACOBSON'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR ISAKSON

Question. Ms. Jacobson, we have heard concerns from U.S. companies operating in Mexico that the tactics Mexico's tax authorities have employed are overly aggressive and seem to target U.S. global companies doing business in Mexico. Specifically, in the context of the OECD Base Erosion and Profit Shifting (BEPS) project Mexico has acted unilaterally at times which is contrary to its commitments as an OECD Member country. Recently, there was an article in the Mexican press that has been brought to my attention, where the Mexico SAT has made disparaging remarks about the OECD BEPS process and has said they will not wait for its conclusion to take unilateral action. This is obviously hurting U.S. companies and their ability to do business in Mexico and goes against Mexico's treaty commitments, trade agreements and their commitment as an OECD member.

- ♦ Will you continue the work of Ambassador Wayne to ensure that Mexico upholds its commitments to the OECD process and continue to ensure that U.S. businesses aren't unfairly or aggressively targeted?

Answer. We have heard the same concern from some U.S. companies in Mexico regarding this issue. As you note, Ambassador Wayne has raised this concern at the highest levels of the Mexican Government, and, if confirmed, I will do the same.

Like any nation, Mexico levies taxes on foreign companies operating in its territory. Such taxes should be levied transparently and according to clear rules and procedures. Moreover, Mexico's membership in the OECD is a reflection and recognition of the size and maturity of the Mexican economy. All OECD members share a commitment to respect OECD processes and practices.

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE JACOBSON'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR PAUL

Question. What does the Mexican Government need to do to improve the situation at the U.S.-Mexican border? And if confirmed as U.S. Ambassador to Mexico, what specific steps would you take to help them in that regard?

Answer. Mexico is our second-largest export market and third-largest trading partner. More than $1.5 billion in daily trade with Mexico supports millions of jobs in states throughout both countries. President Obama and President Calderon launched the 21st Century Border Management Initiative in 2010 to promote eco-conomic competitiveness and enhance security through the secure, efficient, rapid, and lawful movement of goods and people. As one result of that continued close cooperation, we saw the completion in November 2014 of the first phase of expansion at the busiest land port of entry between the United States and Mexico, the San Ysidro-El Chaparral border crossing between San Diego and Tijuana, which more than doubled the number of inspection booths and significantly reduced vehicle wait times from 3 hours to as little as 30 minutes. Likewise, in October 2014 we inaugurated an improved port of entry at Nogales, AZ, through which 40 percent of Mexican produce bound for U.S. supermarkets passes.

On the security front, President Peña Nieto's strategy to counter transnational crime and improve the situation on our shared border is to combine all elements of the Mexican Government to constrain, disrupt, and dismantle criminal groups. Law enforcement operations are one tool, but the strategy recognizes the need to counter criminal networks through disrupting their access to finance, their corrosive influence on governments and societies, and through building new partnerships. That approach is what you see in Mexico's national strategy as well as in the four pillars of our bilateral Merida Initiative: to disrupt organized criminal groups, institutionalize reforms to sustain the rule of law and support human rights, create a 21st century border structure, and build strong and resilient communities.

The United States and Mexico are dedicated to addressing shared security challenges and modernizing our shared border infrastructure. We work closely with our Mexican counterparts to communicate about threats along the border and to assess and respond to security issues as they develop. If confirmed, I pledge that the safety of U.S. Government personnel and U.S. citizens will remain my priority. We will continue our support through the Merida Initiative, which enables greater cooperation between U.S. and Mexican law enforcement agencies, prosecutors, and judges as they share best practices and expand bilateral cooperation in tracking criminals, drugs, arms, and money as well as our efforts to support economic growth and the secure flow of people and goods through the 21st Century Border Initiative.

RESPONSES OF LAURA FARNWORTH DOGU, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF NICARAGUA, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE DOGU'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CORKER

Question. Nicaragua presents a conundrum. On the one hand, it is stable and relatively secure and the government pursues comparatively sound macroeconomic and investment policies. Nicaragua continues to seek partnership with the U.S. through the Central America Free Trade agreement. On the other hand, Nicaragua maintains friendly relations with governments that are hostile to the U.S. Most institutional power is concentrated in the hands of the governing Sandinista Party, dissent is muted, and violence is still part of the Sandinistas' political toolkit.

♦ What is your assessment and what will your priorities be as Ambassador?

Answer. I concur with this assessment, both in terms of Nicaragua's challenges and opportunities. A vibrant democracy includes participation from all sectors, and all sectors have a responsibility to contribute. As I mentioned at my hearing, in addition to supporting improvements to governance, rule of law, and human rights, we want to assist Nicaragua in efforts to integrate more fully into the Central American regional economy. Working with youth, universities, and the private sector to improve workforce development is a key component of this effort. If confirmed, I will ensure the Embassy works with partners in the private sector addressing issues such as labor rights, trafficking in persons, education, and the environment through corporate social responsibility efforts.

Continued engagement, in partnership with the people of Nicaragua, civil society, and the international community, is key to ensuring elections reflect the popular will. If confirmed, I will work to support the strengthening of democratic institutions and values in Nicaragua to reflect the region's collective commitment to the promotion and protection of human rights. I also will work to support a Nicaragua that is more economically integrated with other Central American countries, and that collaborates effectively with us—and other stakeholders and donors—on a growing range of issues of interest to the people of the United States and Nicaragua. To do so, we will build on existing areas of cooperation and seek improved engagement and dialogue in those areas where we don't necessarily always agree.

The Strategy for U.S. Engagement in Central America serves as a common guide for ongoing shared efforts promoting prosperity, governance, and security with—and throughout—Central America. Key to Central America's success is regional eco-conomic integration. Central America must integrate economically in order to compete globally. With this in mind, our engagement with Nicaragua under this strategy will advance governance, regional integration, prosperity, and security—and thus help us meet the needs and interests of the Nicaraguan people, as well as the many other citizens of Central America.

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE DOGO'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR MENENDEZ

Question. According to the State Department's latest human rights report, the Nicaraguan executive branch is becoming increasingly authoritarian, exercising significant control over the legislative, judicial, and electoral branches. Furthermore, the police generally deny permission for demonstrations by opposition groups and the government uses judicial, financial, and administrative tactics to limit freedom of speech and the press.

- ◆ In a country where political power has become concentrated in a single and increasingly authoritarian party, what is your assessment of U.S.-Nicaragua cooperation? If confirmed, what steps will you take to advance U.S. interests as well as the efficacy of U.S. democracy and governance programs?

Answer. The U.S.-Nicaragua relationship is complex. We work closely with the Nicaraguan Government, but there are areas where cooperation can be improved, including on issues relating to democratic governance and human rights. U.S. support for democracy and governance in Nicaragua is, and will remain if I am confirmed, a top priority for the United States. Continued engagement in partnership with the people of Nicaragua and the international community is key to ensuring independent voices are heard, elections are credible and reflect the popular will, irregularities are substantiated and reported on, and democratic governance is supported with a long-term perspective. If confirmed, I will encourage the development of democratic institutions and values, and will continue to support local governance efforts, with a focus on civic participation and transparency. I will also continue to support the role of civil society and independent media, and will expand these efforts as needed.

The Nicaraguan Government has cooperated with us in resolving a significant number of U.S. citizen property compensation claims. Additionally, we cooperate on trade issues, counternarcotics, search and rescue in cases involving U.S. citizens, disaster preparedness and response, the protection of cultural patrimony, consular matters, and the return of fugitive U.S. citizens. If confirmed, I will encourage mutually beneficial objectives such as Nicaragua's economic integration with Central America.

Question. Nicaragua will be holding Presidential elections in 2016. The process, as with all democratic elections, should be held to fair and transparent standards. Yet international organizations, such as the Carter Center, have found that recent elections in Nicaragua showed deeply troubling signs of fraud. There are also widespread concerns about the impartiality of the Nicaraguan Electoral Commission and the political agenda of the commission's president, Roberto Rivas.

- ◆ If confirmed, what steps will you take to advocate for the presence of credible international observation? In your view, how can the United States utilize diplomacy to ensure that the 2016 elections are carried in a free, fair, and transparent manner?

Answer. Continued engagement with the people of Nicaragua, civil society, and the international community is key to ensuring elections reflect the popular will and to ensure that irregularities are substantiated and reported when they occur. The U.S. Government will work to ensure the 2016 elections are conducted in a free, fair, and transparent manner, in addition to continuous work on broader democratic governance issues. If confirmed, supporting a Nicaragua with transparent democratic institutions and values will be among my highest priorities.

Further, I would plan to continue our outreach to, and support of, civil society groups to improve their ability to articulate their views to policymakers, monitor and document the election-day process, and support citizens to advocate for identification cards which are required for voting. The United States also supports civil society, democratic youth leadership, and independent media, each of which is important to ensuring the 2016 elections are transparent and credible.

Question. Nicaragua is a recipient of Venezuela's petroleum subsidies through Petrocaribe. Venezuela's dire economic situation, however, indicates that it is only a matter of time before it begins to reduce the amount of subsidized oil it provides.

- ♦ In your view, how would a reduction of subsidies affect Nicaragua? And, what are the implications such reduction may have for the United States?

Answer. We have seen press reports indicating there has been a reduction in oil shipments under the Petrocaribe program. If Petrocaribe were to cease or to significantly decline, a number of countries in Central America, including Nicaragua, and the Caribbean could face financial challenges. Several countries have expressed a desire to transition their energy production from petroleum to other more sustainable sources. Of note, Nicaragua has already transitioned to obtaining more than half of its electric power from a variety of renewable energy sources. The Nicaraguan Government is also already preparing its public for smaller subsidized assistance programs or is finding other ways to finance the programs in the lead up to 2016 elections.

Current U.S. activities, including Connecting the Americas 2022 and efforts under the U.S. Strategy for Central America, emphasize fostering conditions for investment, including through regulatory reform, increasing access to affordable and cleaner energy generation and transmission, and promoting competitive, independent, and environmentally sustainable energy markets.

If I am confirmed, I will engage with Nicaragua to further these activities, promote its economic integration within Central America, and support the adoption of transparent and democratic institutions as a more stable and reliable path to economic growth and to reduce economic volatility.

RESPONSES OF PERRY L. HOLLOWAY, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE COOPERATIVE REPUBLIC OF GUYANA, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE HOLLOWAY'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR MENENDEZ

Question. For the past several days, Venezuelan President Maduro has chosen to focus his efforts on a long-standing border dispute with its neighbor Guyana—an action that has caused increased tensions between the two countries and negatively affects Guyana in a disproportionate way. President Maduro has issued a decree claiming Venezuelan control over the waters off the coast of the land being disputed, leaving Guyana with barely any offshore area and threatening the drilling agreement it has with ExxonMobil.

- ♦ What is your assessment of the dispute between Guyana and Venezuela? And, to your knowledge, are there any other U.S. interests that could be affected by Maduro's aggressive tactics?

Answer. Guyana's relationship with Venezuela is complicated by the ongoing disputes over territorial boundaries. It is imperative that any efforts to resolve this situation be through peaceful means consistent with international law, whether that be through the Caribbean Community, the Community of Latin American and Caribbean States, the Organization of American States, the United Nations, or another mechanism agreeable to both parties. We are examining Venezuela's recent claims. To assert maritime rights or jurisdiction, Venezuela's claims must be consistent with the international law of the sea, including respect for the rights and freedoms of other states. The uncertainty caused by this dispute has affected Guyana's ability to attract investment and otherwise develop its natural resources, and it is in the interest of all countries of the region that it be allowed to do so.

Question. The recent elections in Guyana resulted in a change of the ruling party—the People's Progressive Party (PPP)—for the first time in 23 years. In a country with severe ethnic and sectarian divisions, the new administration of David Granger, from the Partnership of National Unity (APNU), promises to address these issues and create spaces for better ethnic relations. Yet, this important milestone occurred as U.S. assistance in Guyana has largely dried up.

- ♦ How do you view current U.S. cooperation with the Guyanese Government? What specific opportunities do you see for engagement and cooperation with the new ruling party to ensure these democratic processes are strengthened and solidified? What do you think the U.S. can do to promote better ethnic relations in Guyana?

Answer. The United States values its bilateral relationship with Guyana. President Granger has expressed a desire to deepen Guyana's relationship with the United States, and we are seeing renewed levels of engagement with both Embassy Georgetown and the Department by Government of Guyana departments and agencies. We will continue to engage with President Granger and the Government of Guyana on the full range of issues that define our shared interests and that strengthen democratic institutions and processes: countering transnational organized crime; increasing Guyana's ability to compete within the broader global economy; providing economic, social, and political opportunities for all citizens; reducing the prevalence of HIV/AIDS; and supporting the nation's ability to adapt to climate change and manage its natural resources, including in the extractives sectors.

The United States has always worked to bridge the differences between Guyana's ethnic populations and political parties through public diplomacy programs and daily engagement by Embassy officials with key government and civil society groups. We continue to urge President Granger and all elected officials to focus their efforts on issues that unite the nation and to move away from the ethnic based politics of the past that resulted in unequal economic development and social exclusion for large parts of the population.

RESPONSES OF PETER F. MULREAN, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF HAITI, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE MULREAN'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CORKER

Question. After years of deadlock, Haiti's Government appears to be committed to organizing elections. Are they really? Is it true that, as of June 9, 2015, funding was still about 40 percent short of the estimated $66 million needed for the Haitian elections? What is the government of Haiti doing to fill that gap?

Answer. The Government of Haiti is moving forward with three rounds of elections, on August 9, October 25, and December 27 of this calendar year. The first vote will be for the first round of parliamentary elections; the second vote will include a second round of parliamentary elections, the first round of Presidential elections, and local government positions; the third vote will be the second round of Presidential elections. Due to political gridlock which delayed elections for almost 4 years, Haiti's independent Provisional Electoral Commission (CEP) only began work on the elections in January of this year. As a result, there are concerns that the relevant Haitian institutions will not be fully ready for the first round on August 9, due to delays in hiring and the training of staff. However, the CEP has met major deadlines for printing of the ballots and voter registration lists and its President, Pierre-Louis Opont, has said there will be no delay in holding the first round of voting for Parliament.

With regard to the shortage of electoral-related funding in the basket fund administered by the UNDP, a July 16, 2015, donor conference in New York at the United Nations resulted in an additional $14.2 million in elections funding pledged by the United States, Canada, Brazil, Norway, and Mexico. In addition, several other countries that did not pledge indicated they were considering additional donations. The U.S. pledge was for $9 million, which raises the total amount of funding the United States has dedicated to these elections to $27.8 million, of which $11.5 went to the basket fund and $4 million to UNOPS for logistical support, which MINUSTAH provided in the last election. The Government of Haiti has said it will cover any funding shortfalls for the election.

Question. Approximately half of all Haitians have access to basic health services at U.S.-supported health facilities. This is remarkable. But, is it sustainable? What will you do you engage the Government of Haiti to take on its own responsibilities to the Haitian people?

Answer. The sustainability of our programs in Haiti depends ultimately on the capacity of the Government of Haiti to maintain them, reflective in turn of the support of the Haitian people.

Our development efforts in Haiti are designed to foster economic growth, enhance government capacity, strengthen democracy, and improve security and respect for rule of law. Progress in these areas will, in turn, improve the Government of Haiti's ability to deliver quality services and meet the needs of the Haitian people. If confirmed, I will continue to advance the efforts of the United States to support the long-term goals of the people and Government of Haiti to build and realize a more prosperous and secure nation.

In the health sector, the U.S. Government is supporting the Ministry of Health to advance its ownership and oversight of the public health system on several fronts. Specifically, our programming is helping the Ministry of Health to improve data collection and usage, upgrade internal management systems, manage diverse funding sources, and improve its ability to attract, train, and retain professional health workers. These capacity-building initiatives are laying the groundwork for long-term sustainability while continuing efforts to improve health outcomes. As we progress in these efforts with the Ministry of Health, both directly and in partnership with other donors, we will continue to work to ensure that access to health services is widely available.

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE MULREAN'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR MENENDEZ

Question. Haiti is scheduled to hold its well-overdue legislative elections as early as next month, followed by local and Presidential elections later in the year. If confirmed, what specific steps will you take to advance United States support for the Haitian electoral process? More importantly, how will you ensure collaboration and commitment with the Haitian authorities to prioritize the security of all Haitians both during the time leading up to the election and as they go to the polls?

Answer. If confirmed by the Senate, I will continue the strong support of the United States for the holding of credible and long-overdue elections; this would be one of my highest priorities. Political gridlock in Haiti has stalled needed reforms and elections are key to ensuring that solutions are identified and implemented. The engagement of the United States and our international partners has been instrumental in getting the elections scheduled and on track to take place this year. These efforts, which include close collaboration with President Michel Martelly, Prime Minister Evans Paul, the Provisional Electoral Commission (CEP) and major political parties, need to continue through the electoral period and beyond in order to help the Haitian people address the systemic problems that continue to challenge the effectiveness of that country's electoral process and institutions.

We have also been heavily engaged with MINUSTAH, the Haitian National Police (HNP), and the CEP as Haiti finalizes its electoral security plan. The recent reduction in the U.N.'s military footprint requires the HNP to increasingly take responsibility for nationwide security. The scale of the elections and the HNP's limited resources, including personnel and vehicle shortfalls, will challenge the force to maintain order if widespread disturbances occur. The HNP has sought and will require significant assistance to undertake the roles MINUSTAH performed in previous elections. To this end, the U.S. has committed over $30 million dollars in support of these elections, including some $2.8 million in vehicles, spare parts to repair inoperable vehicles, and communications equipment to improve the HNP's security and logistics posture.

Question. The United Nations Stabilization Mission in Haiti (MINUSTAH) has supported Haiti with police and military personnel. However, these efforts are only temporary until the Haitian National Police is strengthened and capable of sustaining the security of the country. In your view, how is the Haitian Government working to improve the Haitian National Police capabilities. How is the United States supporting these efforts?

Answer. The United States has had an excellent working relationship with the Haitian National Police (HNP). The Haitian Government established a 5-year police development plan in 2012 aiming to grow the force to 15,000 officers by the end of 2016 and improve its professionalism; U.S. efforts are aligned to help the Haitian Government achieve these goals. Thanks to generous funding provided by the U.S. Congress for the HNP—over $200 million since the earthquake—we have assisted the HNP's growth by about 1,000 officers a year, to a current level of 12,200 officers. We recently funded improvements to the Police School that will enable basic training classes of 1,500 cadets a year to help the HNP toward its growth target. Our support for police training, as well as that of the Government of Canada and MINUSTAH, has made the HNP the most respected Haitian Government institution with a majority of Haitians trusting their police according to Department of State polling. Haiti's successful pilot community policing unit in Port-au-Prince, supported by a U.S.-funded partnership with the New York Police Department and by MINUSTAH, is growing and expanding to additional provinces. We provide embedded mentors in key HNP offices to improve strategic planning, budget, career development, and logistics capabilities, all aimed at improving the force's ability to sustain itself. Since the 2010 earthquake, we have improved police infrastructure by building six police stations and installing facilities for Haiti's counternarcotics police to enable their deployment around the country. The HNP's performance has improved, most notably in antiskidnapping investigations and crowd control capacities. The HNP now rarely calls on MINUSTAH quick reaction support and has been largely effective in managing recent politically motivated protests. Early 2015 saw a relative lull in protest activity, and although violence against MINUSTAH and HNP personnel has increased, Haiti remains secure overall.

Question. During the past month, more than 17,000 Haitian migrants in the Dominican Republic have voluntarily chosen to return to Haiti. This number is expected to increase given the current policies in the Dominican Republic to regularize unauthorized migration in the country. There is concern that the large quantities of individuals returning to Haiti may overwhelm Haitian authorities, who may not have the capacity of the Haitian Government to adequately receive all returnees.

- ♦ Can you describe our current cooperation with the Government of Haiti to ensure an appropriate screening process? If confirmed, what steps will you take to ensure that Haitian returnees are afforded a fair process of reintegration to Haitian society?

Answer. The United States has been in close contact with the Government of Haiti to understand its contingency planning on how to process Haitian nationals being returned to Haiti or Dominicans of Haitian descent who arrive in Haiti. Embassy staff and implementing partners have also monitored the actual situation of arrivals from the Dominican Republic to better understand the situation and any humanitarian needs.

The United States is funding civil society organizations and international organizations, including the International Organization for Migration (IOM). IOM, in coordination with local civil society, is monitoring population movements at the border and referring people in need of protection, especially unaccompanied children.

We are encouraging the governments of both Haiti and the Dominican Republic to consult and collaborate with each other and with civil society groups and international organizations to develop processes that uphold the rule of law, provide procedural safeguards, and are consistent with each country's international obligations and commitments. Our Ambassador to Haiti has also led international engagement efforts to assist the Haitian Government in proactively managing increases in movements across the border. If confirmed by the Senate, I will continue robust engagement with the Haitian authorities on their efforts to manage this immediate issue and build capacity more generally in managing movement at their borders.

Question. Haitian workers continue to suffer restrictions on freedom of association, minimum wage violations, and other labor rights abuses, despite the promises of the HOPE II to bring attention to labor conditions. The United States last trade union program, funded by the Department of Labor, was shuttered in May.

- ♦ As Ambassador, how will you ensure that Haiti's workers and unions get the support and capacity-building they need to advocate for better labor rights enforcement and working conditions?

Answer. Since the implementation of the HOPE II legislation, producer compliance with the international core labor standards—which include freedom of association, the elimination of all forms of compulsory or forced labor, the abolition of child labor, and the elimination of discrimination—has improved, and there has been significant progress in relations between factoryowners and labor advocates. For example, during the last official identification cycle by the U.S. Government for non-compliance, only one producer out of 23 eligible producers was identified as non-compliant with one or more core labor standards, and that producer has reinstated all of the union members seeking reinstatement who were the subject of the non-compliance finding. In addition, through the Social Dialogue Table established in March 2014 to create a space for dialogue, textile workers and factoryowners were able to hold successful minimum wage negotiations and submit consolidated recommendations to Haiti's Superior Wage Council (CSS) for consideration. The CSS adopted a number of recommendations made by the Social Dialogue Table, becoming the first successful union-management minimum wage negotiation in the history of Haiti's textile industry.

The Government of Haiti has also actively engaged with both the International Labor Organization (ILO) and the U.S. Government in all aspects of the HOPE II implementation program and is building its capacity to monitor and inspect textile factories and mediate disputes. The ILO's Better Work Haiti program, funded by the U.S. Government, has continued to perform factory assessments, provide compliance advisory services, and issue the biannual reports required under the HOPE II legislation. While the reports show that there have been improvements in regards to the core labor standards and some aspects of working conditions, lasting solutions need to be developed in categories such as occupational safety and health. To meet this need, Better Work Haiti is placing a greater emphasis on in-depth advisory and training services with the aim of promoting more sustainable solutions to the compliance problems that have persisted in the sector.

The U.S. Government's program to build the capacity of worker organizations closed in May 2015. If confirmed by the Senate, I will give labor issues priority attention and the Embassy, in partnership with other partners, most notably the ILO and the Government of Haiti's Office of the Ombudsperson, will continue to engage directly with worker organizations in Haiti to ensure ongoing support for unions in their efforts to represent the interests of apparel sector workers in Haiti.

Question. More than 17,000 Haitians have voluntarily chosen to return from the Dominican Republic. This number is expected to increase in the following months as the Dominican Republic moves forward with the implementation of its migration policies.

♦ In your view, what is the effect that the large quantity of returnees will have in the elections?

Answer. We are carefully monitoring these returns and are heavily engaged on migration concerns with the Governments of Haiti and the Dominican Republic, as well as international organizations and NGOs. To date the spontaneous returns have not resulted in a significant humanitarian crisis, although we stand ready to assist the Government of Haiti should numbers increase substantially. The Government of the Dominican Republic has indicated that there will be no large-scale deportations. So far we have not seen any significant effect on Haiti's election planning.

NOMINATIONS

WEDNESDAY, JULY 22, 2015

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, DC.

Hon. Paul Wayne Jones, of Maryland, to be Ambassador to the Republic of Poland
Hon. Hans G. Klemm, of Michigan, to be Ambassador to Romania
Kathleen Ann Doherty, of New York, to be Ambassador to the Republic of Cyprus
James Desmond Melville, Jr., of New Jersey, to be Ambassador to the Republic of Estonia
Samuel D. Heins, of Minnesota, to be Ambassador to the Kingdom of Norway
Thomas O. Melia, of Maryland, to be an Assistant Administrator of the U.S. Agency for International Development

The committee met, pursuant to notice, at 2:09 p.m., in room SD-419, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Hon. Ron Johnson presiding.

Present: Senators Johnson, Shaheen, and Menendez
Also present: Senators Amy Klobuchar and Al Franken.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. RON JOHNSON, U.S. SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN

Senator JOHNSON. Good afternoon. This hearing of the European subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is called to order.

Welcome, Senator Klobuchar and Senator Franken from Minnesota, to introduce our first nominee, Mr. Samuel D. Heins. If the good Senators would offer their introductions, we would appreciate it.

Senator Klobuchar.

STATEMENT OF HON. AMY KLOBUCHAR, U.S. SENATOR FROM MINNESOTA

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. And thank you very much for holding this hearing. I know your State, like ours, has a lot of Norwegians, so we appreciate it.

Senator JOHNSON. I am one of them.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Well, I could not have guessed, with your last name.

I am proud to be here today to introduce Sam Heins, the nominee to serve as U.S. Ambassador to Norway.

Before I begin, I would like to take a moment to note that today marks exactly 4 years since the terrorist attacks that claimed 77 lives in Oslo and Utøya. A number of remembrance ceremonies are taking place across Norway, and the victims and their loved ones are in our thoughts and prayers.

I think it is a somber day, but it is also a very important day to show our solidarity with Norway and rededicate ourselves to the friendships between our countries. And getting an ambassador confirmed would be a major step forward.

As a Senator from the State, as I noted, that is home to 800,000 people of Norwegian heritage, really more than anywhere except Norway itself, I think it is only fitting that the nominee to be the United States Ambassador to Norway be from Minnesota.

As the Norwegian Ambassador to the United States Kare Aas noted, the ties between the Midwest and Norway are strong, and nowhere are they more deeply felt than in Minnesota.

Of course, there is much more to our nominee Sam Heins than the fact that he has Minnesota heritage. In addition to being an accomplished lawyer, Mr. Heins has demonstrated his devotion to, and leadership in, the cause of advancing human rights. In 1982, he founded, organized, and served as the first board chair for the Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights, which monitors and responds to human rights abuses throughout the world.

In 1985, he cofounded the Center for Victims of Torture, which provides services, research, and advocacy for victims of torture from across the world, where he continues to serve as a board member. It started as a humble rehabilitation center in St. Paul. Today, the center that our nominee founded is an internationally recognized organization that operates around the globe, providing desperately needed help to those who have been victimized by repression and violence.

This record of accomplishment is particularly appropriate for an Ambassador to Norway. Norway has long been an international leader on human rights issues. Just last month, for example, the United States and Norway issued a joint statement of support for international programs initiated by Freedom House and other like-minded groups to help civil society organizations around the world that have been threatened with violence as the result of their human rights advocacy.

Mr. Heins' extensive work on human rights and with NGOs that support human rights will be extremely helpful in sustaining and building on the strong United States-Norwegian partnership in this area. Norway is one of our strongest and most dependable international allies. We know of their important NATO involvement, especially on this committee you know that. And its military has participated in operations with the United States in the Balkans and in Afghanistan.

Norwegians work alongside Americans in standing up to Russian provocations in Ukraine, in countering ISIS and the spread of violent extremism.

As such, Norway deserves an ambassador who understands the country and is deeply committed to the relationship. We all know, for a variety of reasons, as of today, it has been 663 days that Norway has not had an ambassador. The Foreign Minister was in to see me and he actually knew the exact number of days.

So I am very pleased, Mr. Chairman, that you and Chairman Corker were willing to hold this hearing so quickly after Mr. Heins has been nominated, so we can remedy the situation, which you did not cause. And I thank you so much for holding this hearing.

Senator JOHNSON. I appreciate you acknowledging that, and I also appreciate your persistence.

You have a tireless advocate there, Mr. Heins.

Senator Franken.

STATEMENT OF HON. AL FRANKEN,
U.S. SENATOR FROM MINNESOTA

Senator FRANKEN. Thank you, Chairman Johnson, for holding this very important confirmation hearing. The chairman is not just a Norwegian-American. He actually grew up in Minnesota.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Yes, I know that. I heard that.

Senator FRANKEN. He does not like to admit it.

Senator JOHNSON. That could be used against me, so be careful.

[Laughter.]

Senator FRANKEN. And he is a tremendous Vikings fan because of that.

Senator JOHNSON. That will be used against me. [Laughter.]

It is also not true.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. That record will reflect that is not true.

Senator FRANKEN. The record will reflect that is not true.

Senator JOHNSON. We do have some Super Bowls under our belt.

Senator FRANKEN. You do. We have some Super Bowls under our belt. We lost them all, but they are under our belt.

But, as you know, and as I think Senator Klobuchar mentioned, about 20 percent of Minnesotans trace their ancestry to Norway, and we have more Norwegian Americans living in Minnesota than in any other State and, as you just said, anywhere else but in Norway.

Norway and Minnesota enjoy a very productive bilateral relationship. Our universities collaborate on research projects. We collaborate in areas of renewable energy, health care, and other areas. And, of course, as you know, Mr. Chairman, our nations cooperate on very important security issues.

So it is very fitting that Sam Heins, a distinguished Minnesotan, has been nominated to serve as our next Ambassador to Norway. Mr. Heins is a graduate of the University of Minnesota, and he is a brilliant lawyer. He has been a great voice on behalf of women's rights, on human rights, refugees, just to name a few, and he has worked tirelessly to make sure that victims of torture receive the services that they need.

I am pleased that he was nominated to serve as Ambassador to Norway after this long vacancy, and I look forward to his speedy confirmation.

I thank you and Senator Corker.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Senator Franken. Remind me not to invite you to another hearing. [Laughter.]

Senator FRANKEN. Okay. I will do that.

Senator JOHNSON. No, really, I thank both of the good Senators from Minnesota for coming in and offering those kind words of introduction.

And I would ask the other nominees now to be seated at the table, and we will continue on with the hearing.

It looks like we could have used just a slightly bigger table, but it looks like we squeezed you all in there.

Again, I want to welcome all of the nominees. I want to thank you for your previous service to the Nation and your willingness to serve as Ambassador of our Nation to the countries we are going to be handling nominations for: Ambassador to the Kingdom of Norway, Ambassador to Poland, Ambassador to Romania, Ambassador to Cyprus, Ambassador to Estonia, and nominee for the Assistant Administrator for Europe and Eurasia at USAID.

I am very happy to help move these nominations along. These are critical posts. It is extremely important that America is well-represented, and I assume, being patriots, you will do a good job of conveying, from my standpoint, American values to those countries, but at the same time recognize that your role is to make sure that we as elected officials of America understand the viewpoints of those countries to which you are going to be Ambassadors.

It is a critically important role, and, again, I am just very pleased that we are moving these nominations along in an expedited fashion so that our Nation will be well-represented in these countries.

With that, I will turn it over to our ranking member, Senator Shaheen.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. JEANNE SHAHEEN,
U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I would just like to echo the chairman's comments about appreciation for your willingness to continue to serve this country and to serve in very important roles in Europe.

For a number of years, I think we viewed Europe as our most important ally, and we were well on the way to a Europe that was whole and free and at peace. Sadly, we are not in that position today.

So your willingness to serve at a time when there is continued financial upheaval in Europe, as well as the threat from Russia and from ISIS, is absolutely critical.

So thank you very much, and I look forward to hearing your testimony.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Senator Shaheen.

We will just go from left to right. I will just introduce the nominees before you testify. Our first nominee is Ambassador Paul Wayne Jones, a nominee for the Ambassador to Poland. Ambassador Jones is a career member of the Foreign Service and currently serves as Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of State in the Bureau of European and Eurasian Affairs, a position he has held since 2013.

Ambassador Jones.

STATEMENT OF PAUL WAYNE JONES, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF POLAND

Ambassador JONES. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and committee members. It is a privilege to appear before you as President Obama's nominee to serve as United States Ambassador to the Republic of Poland. I am honored by the trust and confidence that President Obama and Secretary Kerry have placed in me.

With your permission, I would like to take this opportunity to briefly introduce some family members here today. My wife Catherine and I have been representing the United States together for the past 20 years of our marriage. Catherine, an award-winning author and mobile app developer, has lived in more countries than I have as the daughter of a retired U.S. Foreign Service officer and Ambassador Brandon Grove, whom I would also like to introduce.

We are so proud of our two children, Allie and Hale, who have been on the Foreign Service road with us since birth.

My brother-in-law, Paul Grove, is well-known for a distinguished career here in the Senate, as well as his wife, Martha, similarly at the National Archives, and their children Ella and Sam.

I regret that my father, a World War II veteran, did not live to see this day.

Mr. Chairman, I bring broad experience to this position, having served overseas on four continents, as well as in Washington over the past 28 years, including as Ambassador and three times as deputy chief of mission. I also bring intensive current experience from the past 2 years as Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Europe and Eurasia, where I have been responsible for U.S. relations with Europe, particularly Russia and Ukraine, as principal deputy to Assistant Secretary Toria Nuland.

I am honored to be nominated to succeed Ambassador Steve Mull, a longtime friend who has served with distinction for the past 3 years, together with an extraordinary team of Americans and Poles at our Embassy in Warsaw and our consulate in Krakow.

Today, Poland has become one of our closest and most capable NATO allies, a relationship that at its core is founded on democratic values and a shared commitment to policies that provide peace and prosperity for our peoples.

Poland will host the 2016 NATO summit, an example of its growing transatlantic and regional security role. The alliance will review implementation of its readiness action plan, which includes strengthening the headquarters of Multinational Corps Northeast in Poland and standing up NATO's new spearhead force, which conducted its first live training exercise last month in Poland.

For its part, Poland is strengthening the alliance through its 10-year, $45 billion defense modernization program; its commitment now enshrined in law to invest at least 2 percent of its gross domestic product in annual defense spending; and its future hosting of a U.S. site for NATO ballistic missile defense.

Poland has shared our sacrifice in Iraq and Afghanistan, is contributing to NATO's mission in Afghanistan today, and is a member of the counter-ISIL coalition.

Mr. Chairman, as President Obama said in his June 2014 visit to Warsaw, the United States has an unwavering commitment to Poland's security through our shared Article 5 obligations. In the wake of Russia's actions in Ukraine, we have demonstrated this commitment.

The United States maintains a persistent rotational military presence in Poland, complemented by significant U.S. and NATO air, land, and sea exercises in Poland and in the region. And as Secretary Carter announced last month, we will begin prepositioning military equipment and materiel in Central and Eastern Europe, a large portion of which will be in Poland.

Our relationship with Poland takes inspiration from the strong cultural ties between our peoples, fostered by a vibrant community of some 10 million Polish Americans. Since the fall of communism in 1989, Poland has set a standard of democratic and economic reform based on shared transatlantic values. A staunch supporter of Ukraine, Poland has provided Ukraine financial, decentralization, anticorruption, and security assistance. Poland is also one of the top contributors of monitors to the OSCE special monitoring mission in Ukraine.

The United States and Poland enjoy very strong economic ties. U.S. exports to Poland have grown 22 percent since 2009, supporting tens of thousands of American jobs. U.S. defense companies are full partners in Poland's defense modernization. And the recent selection of Raytheon's Patriot system will strengthen those ties and sustain jobs here at home.

The United States is a leading and growing source of investment in Poland across a wide range of sectors. While security is the foundation of our relationship, particularly today, if confirmed, I will seek to deepen our ties across the board, from education exchanges and entrepreneurship to trade, investment and innovation, energy security, science and technology, law enforcement, and counterterrorism.

Mr. Chairman, if confirmed, I look forward to working with this committee and with Congress. I am happy to address your comments and questions.

Thank you very much.

Mr. Chairman, if confirmed, I look forward to working with this committee and Congress. I am happy to address your comments and questions. Thank you.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Mr. Ambassador Jones.

Our next nominee is Ambassador Hans Klemm, a nominee for Ambassador to Romania.

Ambassador Klemm is a career member of the Foreign Service and currently serves as senior adviser to the Under Secretary for Management at the Department of State, a position he has held since January 2015. He previously served in posts in Germany, Japan, and South Korea.

Ambassador Klemm.

STATEMENT OF HON. HANS G. KLEMM, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO ROMANIA

Ambassador KLEMM. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Senator Shaheen, and distinguished members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. It is an honor for me to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to be the next United States Ambassador to Romania. I am humbled and grateful for the confidence that the President and Secretary Kerry have placed in me.

If confirmed, I pledge to promote our interests, protect American citizens, and encourage even stronger ties with our excellent ally and strategic partner, Romania.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to note with regret that my wife, Mari, is not here today due to professional obligations that kept her overseas. If confirmed, however, Mari will eagerly join me in support of our mission in Bucharest.

Romania is a staunch NATO ally and a significant contributor to international peace and security. For years, it has been among the top 10 countries providing troops in Afghanistan, first to the International Security Assistance Force and now to the Resolute Support mission. As a demonstration of its commitment to European defense, Romania is hosting a European-phased adaptive approach missile defense site.

Romania is also home to a forward operating site, which hosts hundreds of U.S. Marines and U.S. Army personnel and serves as an important regional logistics hub. And Romania has stood firmly aside the United States in responding to Russian aggression in the region.

If confirmed, I will work resolutely to further strengthen both Romania's role within NATO and our bilateral military partnership.

Romania also has a key role to play in ensuring the prosperity of southeastern Europe. With its long history of domestic oil and gas production, it is well-placed to help Europe diversify sources and transit routes for energy. To do so, however, Romania must support regional energy cooperation and diversification, and the efficiency of its domestic gas transmission network.

If confirmed, I will seek to deepen our engagement with Romania in the area of energy security.

The information technology sector is another that has tremendous potential in Romania, as suggested by the growing presence of American firms in that country. We urge Romania to make further reforms to boost its economic development and the prosperity of its people, including creating more opportunity for American exports and investment.

If confirmed, I look forward to working with the Romanian Government and both of our private sectors to promote bilateral trade and investment, including the negotiations toward a transatlantic trade and investment partnership.

Last but perhaps most importantly, as you know, Mr. Chairman, Romania has been engaged in an extended, serious effort to root out high-level corruption and improve adherence to the rule of law. As Vice President Biden said during a visit to Bucharest last year, corruption represents a clear and present danger to a country's national security.

To tackle corruption, a scourge that affects the lives of all its citizens, Romania has stood up powerful, independent law enforcement and judicial entities. Scores of local, regional, and national officials have been investigated, indicted, and convicted.

If confirmed, I pledge to redouble our support to Romania's anticorruption institutions and civil society to bolster the country's adherence to the rule of law.

Senators, Romania is a friend and strategic partner and a stalwart ally. If confirmed, I pledge to work with you on the many areas of U.S. interest in Romania. I will also look forward to welcoming you to Bucharest, where you will see firsthand the outstanding work our Embassy is doing on behalf of the American people. Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Ambassador Klemm follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF AMBASSADOR HANS G. KLEMM

Thank you Mr. Chairman, Senator Shaheen, and distinguished members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

It is an honor for me to appear before you as President Obama's nominee to be the United States Ambassador to Romania.

I am humbled and grateful for the confidence that President Obama and Secretary Kerry have placed in me. If confirmed, I pledge to promote our interests, protect American citizens, and encourage even stronger ties with our excellent ally and strategic partner, Romania.

Mister Chairman, before beginning my remarks, I would like to note with regret that my wife, Mari, could not be here today due to professional obligations. If I am confirmed, Mari greatly looks forward to supporting our mission in Bucharest.

Romania is a staunch NATO ally and a significant contributor to international peace and security. For years, it has been among the top 10 countries providing troops in Afghanistan both to the International Security Assistance Force and now, Resolute Support Mission—saving U.S. taxpayers tens of millions of dollars by deploying and returning its own troops using Romania's own capabilities. I am proud to say that the United States helped Romania to develop these capabilities through an Excess Defense Articles grant of several C-130s. If confirmed, I will build on this cooperation to further increase Romanian defense capabilities and strengthen the alliance.

I also wanted to take a moment to publicly acknowledge Romania's commitment to European defense. Romania is hosting the U.S. site at Deveselu for NATO ballistic missile defense—the first new U.S. Navy facility in the European theater since Souda Bay in Crete. Romania is also home to our Forward Operating Site at Mihail Kogalniceanu, which hosts hundreds of U.S. Marines and U.S. Army personnel and serves as an important logistics hub for TRANSCOM. These examples of Romania's commitment are also the result of our excellent bilateral defense cooperation. Our military leaders at EUCOM, the European combatant command, and here in Washington, working together with the Department of State and across the interagency, have done a superb job in laying the foundation of this relationship. And if confirmed, I will rely on their expertise and advice to build on these successes.

Romania has stood with us in responding to Russian aggression in the region. Its leaders condemned Russian violations of Ukrainian sovereignty and have urged European Union solidarity on sanctions against Russia—including increasing them, if necessary, until Russia reverses course. Romania has provided humanitarian and development assistance to Ukraine and leads the NATO Cybersecurity Trust Fund for Ukraine. If confirmed, I hope to consult often with the Romanian Government on the best united course of action to resolve the conflict.

On the economic and energy fronts, Romania has a key role to play in ensuring the prosperity of southeastern Europe. With its long history of domestic oil and gas production and openness to exploration, Romania is well placed to help Europe diversify sources and transit routes for energy. Over time, we hope that Romania's role in the production and transit of energy for the region will grow. But in order to do so, Romania should advance priority projects that enhance regional energy cooperation, efficiency, and diversification—including upgrades to its domestic gas transmission network and improved interconnections with its neighbors. We applaud Romania's efforts to build a pipeline to Moldova, which will help that country benefit from an integrated European energy market. Our engagement with Romania in the energy sector has been robust and collaborative. To foster continued growth and attract continued investment, Romania must ensure that it has the appropriate regulatory and policy framework. If confirmed, I will continue our strong engagement on these issues.

Romania has supported the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership Agreement, which will create jobs and economic growth on both sides of the Atlantic. Romania has improved its investment climate, and its economy is one of few among European Union members in recent years to achieve close to 3 percent growth. Romania enjoys several advantages, including a skilled, multilingual labor force and a strategic location bridging Europe with Central Asia, the Caucasus, and the Middle East. The information technology sector has tremendous potential in Romania, as evidenced by the growing presence of American firms and the overwhelmingly positive response to the recent cyber-security trade mission led by Department of Commerce Deputy Secretary Bruce Andrews. Now, Romania still needs to undertake further reforms. The United States has encouraged Romania to continue to professionalize the management of state-owned enterprises, strengthen its regulatory framework, and increase transparency in official decisionmaking. These reforms are crucial to increase the well-being of the Romanian people and create more opportunity for Romanian and American companies. If confirmed, I look forward to working with the Romanian Government and private sector to make more progress on these fronts.

Last but perhaps most important, Romania has been engaged in a years-long, serious effort to root out high-level corruption and improve adherence to the rule of law. As Vice President Biden said during a visit to Bucharest last year, corruption represents a clear and present danger to a country's national security, and outside forces exploit these weaknesses to exercise malign influence and undermine the independence of sovereign countries. That is exactly why we have been so engaged in helping Romania sustain empowered, independent entities to tackle an issue that affects the lives of all Romanians. We are also helping Romania to focus on asset forfeiture, transparency initiatives, and on supporting the next generation of reformers. Altogether, Romania has made significant achievements in fighting corruption. Scores of local, regional, and national officials have been investigated, indicted and convicted on corruption charges. We must remain engaged with our Romanian partners to help ensure continued progress and that Romania's anticorruption institutions have the freedom and independence to act, and to ensure the Romanian people will see no backsliding on the hard-won progress made so far. If confirmed, I will support Romania's anticorruption institutions and civil society to strengthen adherence to the rule of law.

We have many agencies represented at Embassy Bucharest. Besides the Department of State, there is the Department of Defense, FBI, U.S. Secret Service, the Drug Enforcement Administration, the Department of Justice, Department of Commerce, and Department of Agriculture, in addition to others. If confirmed, ensuring the Embassy's efficient and effective operation and its good stewardship of taxpayers dollars will be among my top priorities.

Senators, Romania is a strategically important friend and stalwart ally that has made great strides in transforming itself, even as it helps us to keep a watchful eye on Russia's destabilizing actions in the region. If confirmed, I will work with you and your colleagues on the many areas of U.S. interest and look forward to welcoming you all to Bucharest, where you can see firsthand the outstanding work our Embassy is doing on behalf of the American people and in support of our strategic partnership. Thank you.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Ambassador Klemm.

Our next nominee is Mr. Samuel Heins, a nominee for the ambassadorship to the Kingdom of Norway. Mr. Heins was a partner at Heins Mills & Olson in Minneapolis, MN, from 1994 to 2013.

In 1983, he founded Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights, where he continues to serve as a member.

Mr. Heins.

STATEMENT OF SAMUEL D. HEINS, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE KINGDOM OF NORWAY

Mr. HEINS. Thank you, Chairman Johnson, Senator Shaheen, and members of the committee, for the opportunity to appear before you today.

I would also like to thank Senator Klobuchar and Senator Franken for their generous remarks. I hope I can live up to the standards that they set as exemplary public servants.

I would also like to thank President Obama and Secretary Kerry for their trust and confidence in me. I am extraordinarily grateful to the President for nominating me to be Ambassador to Norway, and I am honored and humbled that the committee is considering my nomination.

I would like to introduce my wife and partner, both professionally and in life, Stacey Mills. I would not be here today without her love and support.

I am also joined by some wonderful members of our family, my stepson, Clark Newman, and my niece, Nicole Mills.

My mother, who is 97, is watching and is very proud that I have the honor to appear before you today.

If confirmed by the Senate, I intend to be a reliable, diligent, and energetic representative of the United States to Norway. I will undertake those duties recognizing the vital importance of our bilateral relationship and the utmost seriousness of the work of a U.S. Ambassador. As a key part of this responsibility, I will ensure the safety and security of U.S. citizens and our Embassy community in Norway.

Norway holds a unique place in the world, and its relationship with the United States is of tremendous value and significance. Norway is one of the world's great democracies, and its leadership publicly declares that the United States is its closest ally.

If the Senate confirms my nomination, I will devote every effort to enhancing this remarkable relationship.

I know from my own experience that our friendship extends beyond the formal relations between sovereign nations. There are more than 800,000 proud Norwegian-Americans, as my Senators have remarked, in my home State of Minnesota alone. They share their culture, history, and pride in their heritage with the rest of us. And we Minnesotans are happy to think of ourselves as honorary Norwegians. We are proud of the admirable Norwegian culture that is an intrinsic and historic part of our State.

In facing the challenges that confront us as a nation, we know that Norway is a dependable and responsible partner. As a founding member of NATO, Norway is a long-standing and steadfast ally. Norwegian and American military personnel have served side by side in operations in Afghanistan, Kosovo, over the skies of Libya, and beyond. Norway has repeatedly demonstrated its military readiness and commitment to interoperability through regular joint exercises with U.S. and other allied forces.

Former Norwegian Prime Minister Jan Stoltenberg is the current NATO Secretary General, as you know, a testament to the respect of the alliance for Norway's dedication to transatlantic security.

Norway has been fully committed to the U.S.-EU approach to support Ukraine, imposing all rounds of sanctions against Russia despite the economic burden.

Norway has also repeatedly called for full implementation of the Minsk agreement and is supporting Ukraine's reform efforts. Norway is a strong partner in the coalition to counter ISIL, contributing military trainers for Iraqi forces, as well as millions of dollars in humanitarian support for both Iraq and Syria.

In addition, Norway is at the forefront of our efforts to combat violent extremism, hosting a 2-day summit in June to further the agenda of the White House summit on countering violent extremism held in February.

Norway and the United States are substantial investors in each other's business enterprises. Over 300 U.S. companies have a presence in Norway, and Norway is the fifth fastest-growing source of foreign direct investment in the United States. If confirmed, I intend to expand this relationship and work to create even more opportunities for U.S. businesses and American workers.

We share with Norway vital economic and environmental interests in the Arctic. We are fortunate that our staunch friend Norway works closely with us on the Arctic Council, which we now share, sharing our goals for responsible stewardship of the region and strengthening international cooperation.

Norway has established itself as a peacemaker and peacekeeper, as well as a generous activist in the alleviation of humanitarian crises and the promotion of human rights around the world. I know from my work over the last 30 years with human rights and humanitarian NGOs that in the international arena, Norway commands principled, moral high ground. It has earned its reputation as an honest broker. If confirmed, I look forward to working with Norway in pursuit of these important undertakings.

Throughout my career, I have been a business manager and advocate and negotiator. I will bring these skills to bear, if the Senate confirms me as Ambassador to the Kingdom of Norway. Norway's partnership and alliance with the United States requires ambassadorial representation in Oslo that it is hardworking, informed, and dedicated to advancing what can only be described as an extraordinary international friendship.

Thank you.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Mr. Heins.

Our next nominee is Mr. James Melville, a nominee for the Ambassador to Estonia. Mr. Melville is a career member of the Foreign Service and currently serves as the Deputy Chief of Mission of the U.S. Embassy in Berlin.

Previously, Mr. Melville has served as Executive Director of the Bureau of European and Eurasian Affairs and in positions in London, Moscow, Paris, and Brussels.

Mr. Melville.

STATEMENT OF JAMES DESMOND MELVILLE, JR., NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF ESTONIA

Mr. MELVILLE. Chairman Johnson, Senator Shaheen, thank you for holding this hearing today. It is a privilege to appear before you as the President's nominee to be Ambassador to the Republic of Estonia. It is a tremendous honor to be asked to serve in this post, and I would like to thank President Obama and Secretary Kerry for their confidence in me.

If confirmed, I look forward to working with you and your colleagues in Congress to protect American citizens and further U.S. interests in Estonia.

Mr. Chairman, with me is my wife, Joanna. We celebrated our 31st anniversary yesterday. I would have loved to have introduced you to our sons, Desmond and Daniel, but they were unable to make the trip down here today. I am very pleased, however, to introduce my rooting section from New Jersey, led by my mom, Georgina Melville; my sister-in-law, Ruth Bayus; my sister and brother-in-law, Eileen and Frank Karpicki; my nephew, Nicolas Karpicki; and my nieces, Kathleen and Francesca Karpicki.

Danny and Desmond were born in Berlin during our first assignment, and they grew up in the Foreign Service.

My late father immigrated to America when he was young, as did my mother's parents. They raised me and my six brothers and sisters to be very proud of our Irish heritage but to be even prouder to be Americans.

It has been the greatest honor of my life to serve our Nation for nearly 30 years, and I am deeply fortunate to have had Joanna and our sons by my side. We are all very excited about the prospect of an assignment to Estonia, a country we last visited in its first year of independence from Soviet occupation while assigned to the U.S. Consulate in St. Petersburg.

Estonia is a strong and reliable ally in NATO, a member of the E.U. and the Eurozone, and a provider of development assistance focused on good governance and democracy.

This year, we marked the 75th anniversary of the Welles Declaration, under which the United States would not recognize the incorporation of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania into the Soviet Union. This declaration provided critical support and encouragement for Estonia during their 50 years of occupation and remains a powerful symbol today. Our shared values continue to underline our robust cooperation bilaterally, regionally, and globally.

If confirmed, I hope to work to reinforce our partnership with Estonia during a new period of Russian aggression in the region and continue to strengthen the already deep and productive relationship we have enjoyed these many years.

A NATO ally since 2004, Estonia has shown unwavering support for our shared objectives around the world. Estonian troops served with us in Iraq and Afghanistan, and Estonia continues to contribute to NATO's Resolute Support mission. Estonia has met the NATO standard of committing 2 percent of its GDP to defense spending, serving as a model for other allies in making the investments necessary to ensure our common security. Estonian soldiers have proven themselves accomplished and knowledgeable partners in Iraq, Afghanistan, and around the world, nonetheless, our continued support remains crucial in helping Estonia respond to growing threats.

If confirmed, I look forward to working to implement the European Reassurance Initiative and continuing efforts to facilitate joint training and exercises, and increasing interoperability under Operation Atlantic Resolve.

The birthplace of Skype, Estonia has established itself as a world leader in information technology. If confirmed, I will continue to work to expand our opportunities for trade and commercial relations with this innovative partner. This includes working with my Estonian colleagues in support of the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership.

As an expert on cyber issues, Estonia hosts the NATO Cyber Centre of Excellence in Tallinn, which the United States joined in 2011, and has shared its expertise on e-governance with other nations, including Ukraine and other eastern partnership countries. If confirmed, I look forward to continuing our strong cooperation on cyber issues. Outreach to and promoting resilience within all parts of society is an important component of an Ambassador's work. If confirmed, I will work closely with my team to continue outreach to the Estonian- and Russian-speaking public, including youth, as we welcome the strengths of a diverse and inclusive society.

Estonia has played an active role in advancing our shared security, economic, and social values. If confirmed, I look forward to representing my country in advancing a still deeper connection between the United States and Estonia.

I am grateful for the opportunity to have addressed you today and am at your disposal to answer any questions you may have.

Thank you.

Our next nominee is Ms. Kathleen Doherty, a nominee for Ambassador to Cyprus. Ms. Doherty is a senior member of the Foreign Service and currently serves as the Deputy Assistant Secretary in the Bureau of European and Eurasian Affairs.

Previously, Ms. Doherty has served at U.S. Embassies in London, Moscow, and Rome, working on economic affairs.

Ms. Doherty.

STATEMENT OF KATHLEEN ANN DOHERTY, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF CYPRUS

Ms. DOHERTY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Senator Shaheen. I am honored to appear before you today to be considered for the position of United States Ambassador to Cyprus. I am grateful to be nominated by President Obama, and I appreciate Secretary Kerry's confidence in me.

If confirmed, I pledge to work with all of you to advance in Cyprus the fundamental U.S. interests in a Europe whole, free, prosperous, and at peace.

I am pleased to be joined today by my partner, Mike Nelson; my sister, Erin; and many friends. I am thankful for the support of family and friends all these years.

Today is part of a journey that started when I traveled overseas at age 13 to visit Ireland, where my father was born and where I first became curious about the world beyond. As the daughter of an immigrant, I am proud to represent the United States and the hope of promise of this country.

This is a hopeful time for Cyprus, a country situated at the crossroads of Europe, the Middle East, and Africa. With the resumption of settlement talks in May and the strong commitment of both the Greek Cypriot and the Turkish Cypriot leaders, there is a real window of opportunity to forge a just and lasting peace.

If confirmed, I would do all that I could to support efforts by courageous and visionary leaders, ordinary people, and the United Nations, to reach the promise of a bizonal, bicommunal federation. A reunified Cyprus would provide for a more prosperous future for all Cypriots.

Such an example would resonate well beyond the island. It would strengthen Greece-Turkey relations. A reunified Cyprus would also enhance regional security and boost NATO-EU cooperation.

Senators, I also believe it would serve as an inspiration for others who wish to define a new future after a painful past.

The Republic of Cyprus is a valued friend and an important strategic partner. The United States cooperates with Cyprus on a range of priorities, including counterterrorism, maritime security, and law enforcement. Cyprus' participation in the counter-ISIL coalition and its efforts to prevent the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction demonstrate its commitment to international security.

U.S.-led investment in Cyprus, increasing nearly sevenfold over the last 2 years, is an example of our growing economic ties. Cyprus' economy is turning the corner earlier than projected after the country's acute fiscal crisis in 2012. Its economic reform programs will help ensure that this positive growth continues.

At the same time, progress on a settlement could have a positive impact on the entire island's economy. Study after study has shown a Cyprus settlement would create opportunities for greater trade and investment, bringing tangible benefits to all Cypriots.

The discovery of natural gas reserves in Cyprus' offshore waters has expanded possibilities for increasing regional energy security through diversification of resources, routes, and suppliers. We have emphasized our support of the Republic of Cyprus' right to develop hydrocarbon resources in its exclusive economic zone.

We believe that resources should be shared equitably between both communities within the context of an overall settlement. Hydrocarbons have the potential, if managed correctly, to serve as an incentive for a Cyprus settlement. If confirmed, I would seek to build upon this potential.

During his visit to Cyprus in May 2014, Vice President Biden emphasized that a reunified Cyprus would expand the possibilities for strengthening our partnership.

If confirmed, I will be accredited to one government, the Republic of Cyprus. That said, I will support both Greek-Cypriot and Turkish-Cypriot communities in their efforts to pursue reconciliation and reunification.

If confirmed, I believe my experience will prepare me well for the challenges and opportunities ahead. Throughout my 25-year career, I worked closely with Members of Congress, the U.S. military, and nearly all U.S. Government agencies and departments.

While serving in Washington and at posts overseas, I have strengthened United States-European relations, promoting trade, investment, economic opportunity, and innovation. I have been a strong advocate for the diversification of energy supplies and for the United States and the EU to work together to address energy challenges. I have championed efforts that enhance European security working through NATO and the EU. And while serving as Deputy Assistant Secretary, I worked on the peace process in Northern Ireland, which gave hope to long-divided communities.

If confirmed, I will dedicate myself to strengthening the bonds between the United States and Cyprus, and working with Members of Congress, partners in the U.S. Government and elsewhere, and with the talented staff of the Embassy in Nicosia to further our goals and support the promise of a better future for all Cypriots.

Mr. Chairman, Senator Shaheen, thank you again for the opportunity to be here with you today. I would be pleased to answer any questions you may have.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Doherty follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF KATHLEEN A. DOHERTY

Chairman Johnson, Senator Shaheen, members of the committee, I am honored to appear before you today to be considered for the position of the United States Ambassador to the Republic of Cyprus. I am grateful to be nominated by President Obama and appreciate Secretary Kerry's confidence in me. If confirmed, I pledge to work with all of you to advance in Cyprus the fundamental U.S. interest in a Europe whole, free, prosperous, and at peace.

I'm pleased to be joined today by my partner, Mike Nelson, and my brother Bob Doherty, who along with the other members of my family have supported me all these years. Today is part of a journey that started when I first traveled overseas at 13 to visit Ireland, where my father was born, and where I first became curious about the world beyond. As a first generation American on my father's side, I am proud to represent the United States and the hope and promise of this country.

This is a hopeful time for Cyprus, a country situated at the crossroads of Europe, the Middle East, and Africa. With the resumption of settlement talks in May and the strong commitment of both the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot leaders, there is a real window of opportunity to forge a just and lasting settlement. If confirmed, I would do all that I could to support efforts by courageous and visionary leaders, ordinary people, and the United Nations to reach the promise of a bizonal, bicomunal federation. A reunified Cyprus would provide for a more prosperous future for all Cypriots. Such an example would resonate well beyond the island, strengthening Greece-Turkey relations and links across the Eastern Mediterranean. It would serve as an inspiration for others who wish to define a new future after a painful past. A reunified Cyprus would also enhance regional security and boost NATO-EU cooperation.

The Republic of Cyprus is a valued friend and important strategic partner. If confirmed, I am committed to boosting our bilateral relationship to promote peace, security, and prosperity in the region and beyond. The United States cooperates closely with Cyprus on a range of priorities including counterterrorism, maritime security, and law enforcement. Cyprus' hosting of the Joint OPCW-U.N. Mission to dismantle Syria's chemical weapons, participation in the Counter-ISIL Coalition, as well as its regional efforts to prevent the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction demonstrate its commitment to international security.

U.S.-led investment in Cyprus, increasing nearly sevenfold over the last 2 years, is a concrete example of our growing economic ties. Cyprus is supportive of our efforts to conclude the U.S.-EU Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (TTIP). TTIP can help develop the island's growing professional services sector and provide new opportunities for entrepreneurship. Cyprus' economy is turning the corner, earlier than projected after the country's acute fiscal crisis in 2012. As the sacrifices required by fiscal consolidation and structural reforms are beginning to bear fruit, Cyprus' economic reform programs will help ensure that this positive growth continues. At the same time, progress on a settlement could have a positive impact on the entire island's economy. Study after study has shown a Cyprus settlement would create opportunities for greater trade and investment, bringing tangible benefits to all Cypriots. If confirmed, I would draw upon my years of experience creating opportunities in the areas of entrepreneurship, innovation, and commerce—particularly for women and young people—and push this vision forward.

The recent discovery of natural gas resources in the Eastern Mediterranean, including in Cyprus' offshore waters by U.S. company Noble Energy in 2011, has expanded possibilities for increasing regional energy security through diversification of resources, routes, and suppliers. We have emphasized our support of the Republic of Cyprus' right to develop hydrocarbon resources in its exclusive economic zone. We also believe the resources should be shared equitably between both communities within the context of an overall settlement. Hydrocarbons have the potential, if managed correctly, to be a catalyst for increased cooperation as well as enhanced regional stability, security, and prosperity. Energy potential should serve as an incentive to a Cyprus settlement. If confirmed, I would seek to build upon this potential.

During his historic visit to Cyprus in May 2014, Vice President Biden emphasized that a reunified Cyprus would expand the possibilities for strengthening our partnership. If confirmed, I will be accredited to one government, the Republic of Cyprus. That said, I will support both Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot communities in their efforts to pursue reconciliation and reunification.

If confirmed, I believe my experience will prepare me well for the challenges and opportunities ahead. Throughout my 25-year career, I have worked closely with Members of Congress, the U.S. military, and nearly all U.S. Government agencies and Departments, and know how we can work together to support the goal of a whole and prosperous Cyprus. While serving in Washington as Deputy Assistant Secretary in our Bureau of European and Eurasian Affairs and at posts overseas, I have strengthened U.S.-European relations, promoting trade, investment, economic opportunity and innovation. I have been a strong advocate for the diversification of energy supplies, and for the U.S. and European Union to work together to address global and regional energy challenges. I have championed efforts that enhanced European security, working through NATO and the EU, and while serving as a Deputy Assistant Secretary of State, I supported the peace process in Northern Ireland, which gave hope to long divided communities.

If confirmed, I will dedicate myself to strengthening the bonds between the United States and Cyprus, and working with Members of Congress, partners in the U.S. Government and elsewhere, and with the talented staff of the Embassy in Nicosia to further our goals in Cyprus and support the promise of a better future for all Cypriots.

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, thank you again for the opportunity to be here with you today. I would be pleased to answer any questions you may have.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Ms. Doherty.

Our final nominee is Mr. Thomas Melia.

Am I pronouncing that correctly, "Melia"?

Mr. MELIA. We pronounce it "Melia." But you may have it—

Senator JOHNSON. I am happy to go with your pronunciation. I will probably still get it wrong, but it is close.

A nominee for Assistant Administrator for Europe and Eurasia at USAID, Mr. Melia is currently executive director of Democracy International and previously served from 2010 to 2015 as Deputy Assistant Secretary in the Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor at the Department of State.

Mr. Melia.

STATEMENT OF THOMAS MELIA, NOMINATED TO BE AN ASSISTANT ADMINISTRATOR OF THE U.S. AGENCY FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. MELIA. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Senator Shaheen, Senator Murphy. It is an honor to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to be Assistant Administrator for Europe and Eurasia at the U.S. Agency for International Development.

I am grateful for the trust and confidence placed in me by President Obama, Acting Administrator Lenhardt, and Secretary Kerry at this critical time in the region.

I am pleased to be joined today by my best friend, my spouse, Amy Conroy; our son, Tomás; and my brother, Tim, who is standing in for the wider Melia clan, my mother, Margaret; my sister, Kay; my brothers, Terry and Pat, who may be watching on the video link today.

It happens that Amy grew up in a USAID family as her father, Dennis, pursued a career in the agency and its predecessor agencies from the early 1950s to the 1980s, working to advance U.S. interests in Asia and sub-Saharan Africa. Since then, Amy has built a distinguished career promoting women's participation in American politics and in leading some of the best-known and most important nonprofit advocacy organizations in the United States.

My son, Tomás, meanwhile, as he prepares to enter the seventh grade, is learning the importance of public service, too, and investing great energy in developing critical national security skills in lacrosse, basketball, and soccer.

For more than 30 years, I have worked to promote democratic governance and fundamental freedoms throughout the world, mainly while working for nongovernmental, nonprofit organizations, and now at Democracy International, an exciting new entrant in the community of democracy support organizations.

I believe the United States can, and should always be, a reliable friend of democracy and its advocates worldwide, not only because a more democratic world would enhance America's prosperity and security, but because democracy is the only political framework that can ensure that universal human rights are respected and that the voices of the poor and marginalized are heard by their leaders.

As Deputy Assistant Secretary of State in the Bureau for Democracy, Human Rights and Labor most of these last 5 years, I oversaw the Bureau's work in three regions, including Europe and Eurasia.

I know this region and its people well. I was the U.S. chair of several bilateral working groups and led delegations to address human rights, civil society, rule of law issues in countries across the region—including Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Georgia, Hungary, Moldova, Russia, Turkey, and, of course, Ukraine, where I led official U.S. missions more than six times in 3 years.

Ukraine is a central focus of USAID's Bureau for Europe and Eurasia, as it is across the administration. The agency plays an important role supporting the Government of Ukraine's accelerated reform efforts, and I want to acknowledge the many members of this committee, in particular, who have led Congress in providing vital support to the people of Ukraine.

In various capacities inside and outside government over the years throughout my career, I have seen firsthand the effectiveness of development assistance as an important aspect of our foreign policy, particularly in the former Communist countries of Europe and Eurasia. Yet, even with this success, the region's transformation is incomplete, and we find ourselves today at a tipping point.

The threat of political and economic backsliding remains. The resurgence of extreme nationalism across the continent reminds us of the fragility of the post-war social compact we once thought had been secured by creation of the European Union. Trafficking in persons continues to be a serious human rights challenge in the region. Conspicuous, high-level corruption undermines public confidence in the utility of democratic institutions and open markets.

It turns out there is more to be done to secure the transition from totalitarianism to the Europe we have all envisioned—whole, free, and at peace.

Having begun my professional career working for more than 5 formative years for Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan, I understand and appreciate the important role that Congress plays—and in my view should play—in the development and execution of U.S. foreign policy. The Congress is the democratic fulcrum that ensures our international policies properly project American values and remain focused on core national interests. If confirmed to the position the President has nominated me for, I would welcome the opportunity to work closely with this committee as together we chart the way forward to advance USAID's mission: to end extreme poverty and promote resilient, democratic societies—while advancing our own security and prosperity.

If confirmed, I look forward to working with you on a regular basis. Thank you again for the opportunity to speak to you today. I welcome any questions you may have.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Melia follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF THOMAS O. MELIA

Chairman Johnson, Ranking Member Shaheen, members of the committee, it is an honor to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to be Assistant Administrator for Europe and Eurasia (E&E) at the U. S. Agency for International Development (USAID). I am grateful for the trust and confidence placed in me by President Obama, Acting Administrator Lenhardt, and Secretary Kerry at this critical time for the region.

I want first to recognize the outstanding work being done by Susan Fritz, who has been leading the Bureau as acting Assistant Administrator since January. Ms. Fritz has served our country with great distinction throughout a 25-year career at USAID and is a true expert on the development challenges we confront in the region. I also want to acknowledge with appreciation Paige Alexander, the previous Assistant Administrator for E&E, and to thank her for advice and guidance during this process. I worked closely with Ms. Alexander in my previous position at the Department of State and know how effective her leadership was in the region and in the U.S. Government's interagency deliberations.

I also want to thank my family, friends, and professional colleagues whose support and encouragement have allowed me to pursue this opportunity. I am especially pleased to be joined today by my best friend, my spouse, Amy Conroy, and our son Tomás. It happens that Amy grew up in a USAID family, as her father pursued a career in the Agency and its predecessors from the early 1950s to the 1980s, working to advance U.S. interests in Asia and sub-Saharan Africa. Her sisters were born in Ethiopia and Iran, when the Conroy family was posted to those countries. Since then, Amy has built a distinguished career promoting women's participation in American politics and in leading some of the best-known and most important nonprofit advocacy organizations in the U.S. For more than 30 years, she has been making significant contributions to strengthen American democracy. Tomás, meanwhile, as he prepares to enter the seventh grade, is learning the importance of public service at the community, national and international levels.

For more than 30 years, I have worked to promote democratic governance and fundamental freedoms throughout the world, mainly while working for nongovernmental, nonprofit organizations, including the National Democratic Institute and the bipartisan Freedom House. Since leaving government service earlier this year, I am proud to be working at Democracy International, an exciting new entrant in the community of democracy support organizations. As a university teacher and occasional writer of articles and books, I have also had the opportunity to discuss with scholars and practitioners how the United States might better help those men and women in other countries who share our values to build their own democratic societies and institutions. While each country's path will be decided by its own citizens—we as outsiders will only ever be supporting actors in other nations' national dramas—I believe that the United States can and should always be a reliable friend of democracy and its advocates worldwide. This is why it is so important that the U.S. Government's recently released second Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review (QDDR) highlights, as one of the Nation's four top strategic priorities, "promoting open, resilient and democratic societies." For this is the only sure path to enduring development outcomes for the poorest and least resilient societies. It is the only political framework that can ensure that universal human rights are respected, and that the voices of the poor and the marginalized are heard by their leaders.

From 2010 to earlier this year, I served as Deputy Assistant Secretary of State in the Bureau for Democracy, Human Rights and Labor (DRL). In that role, I oversaw the Bureau's work in three regions, including Europe and Eurasia. I know this region and its people well. I have worked with political leaders, including government officials and opposition leaders, human rights activists and community leaders. I have coordinated our efforts with our closest allies. I was the U.S. chair of several bilateral working groups, and led delegations to address human rights, civil society, or rule of law issues in countries in this region—including Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Georgia, Hungary, Moldova, Russia, Turkey—and of course Ukraine, where I led official U.S. missions more than six times in 3 years.

Senator Cardin may recall that I led or participated in many U.S. delegations to meetings of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) during those 5 years, including each year's Human Dimension Implementation Meeting in Warsaw, where I led our interaction with civil society and human rights activists from across the OSCE region. I was honored to serve and work closely with both Secretaries of State Hillary Clinton and John Kerry in the annual ministerial meetings of the OSCE. Moreover, during these past 5 years, I was also fortunate to work with impressive colleagues from across the U.S. Government, including at the Department of Justice and Department of Defense, as well as the National Security Council staff, and most frequently with USAID counterparts, so I know the inter-agency apparatus and procedures well.

Having begun my professional career working for more than 5 years for Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan, I understand and appreciate the important role the Congress plays—and in my view should play—in the development and execution of U.S. foreign policy. The Congress is the democratic fulcrum that ensures our international policies are leveraged to properly project American values and remain focused on core national interests. If confirmed in this role, I would welcome the opportunity to work closely with this committee as together we chart the way forward to advance USAID's mission: to end extreme poverty and promote resilient, democratic societies—while advancing our own security and prosperity.

USAID's Bureau for Europe and Eurasia was created a quarter century ago, pursuant to specific legislative mandates enacted after the fall of the Berlin Wall and the dissolution of the Soviet Union, with the goals of promoting Euro-Atlantic integration and fostering a Europe whole, free, and at peace. I have seen firsthand the effectiveness of development assistance as an important aspect of our foreign policy, particularly in the formerly Communist countries of Europe and Eurasia. For well over two decades, the United States and USAID have played a key role in the region, supporting successful transitions from assistance to partnership in 10 formerly Communist countries that have joined the European Union. Today, we count several of these countries as some of the United States strongest and most able allies. The region serves as a model for the principles of sustainable development, for creating the conditions where international assistance is no longer needed.

However, even with this success, the region's transformation is incomplete, and we find ourselves today at a tipping point. In a growing number of countries that had appeared to have successfully transformed, the threat of political and economic backsliding still remains. Multiple political crises and the recent resurgence of extreme nationalism in multiple countries across the European Continent remind us of the fragility of the post-war social compact we once thought had been secured by creation of the European Union. Trafficking in persons continues to be a serious human rights challenge in the region. Conspicuous high-level corruption undermines public confidence in the viability and utility of democratic institutions and open markets. It turns out there is more to be done to secure the transition from totalitarian rule to the Europe we all have envisioned—whole, free, and at peace.

Development assistance remains a strategic imperative in a region facing rising internal and external pressures. Structural instability and democratic and economic stagnation are all exacerbated by Russia's aggressive actions, reminding us that the United States still has an important role to play.

Ukraine is a central focus of USAID's E&E Bureau, as it is across the Obama administration. The agency continues to play an important role supporting the Government of Ukraine's accelerated reform efforts across key sectors, providing macro-economic assistance, helping strengthen civil society, supporting energy security, and providing humanitarian relief to conflict-affected communities in the east. While progress is being made, Ukraine must continue to aggressively pursue not only enactment of new laws, but also actually implementing real reforms. In order to be successful, Ukraine will need continued support and technical assistance from the international community, and I want to acknowledge the many members of this committee in particular who have led the Congress in providing vital support to the people of Ukraine.

I want to emphasize, however, that Russian pressure is not limited to Ukraine. At a Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on State and Foreign Operations hearing on February 24, 2015, Secretary Kerry, in response to a question regarding Russian influence in the region, stated, "Whether it's Serbia, Kosovo, Montenegro, Macedonia, other places—they are all in the firing line." If confirmed, I will be a strong advocate for strong continued USAID engagement in the Balkans, as well as in Georgia and Moldova, where increased Russian pressure has the potential to destabilize those countries and threaten important progress toward implementation of the historic Association Agreements and Deep and Comprehensive Free Trade Area agreements with the European Union. It is important that the United States continues to support the sovereign right of these countries to choose their own futures and help them meet the conditions of these agreements. I also want to say—to the peoples of Belarus, Armenia, and Azerbaijan, and Russia—that we support their aspirations to live in prosperous, democratic countries, at peace internally and with their neighbors, and more fully integrated into Europe and the modern world.

This is a pivotal moment for the wider European region, facing its most significant challenges—economic, social, political and military—in decades. The United States and USAID have an important role to play in the region and must continue to demonstrate leadership and commitment to Europe's success. If confirmed, I look forward to working with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and all of our partners to achieve our objectives in the region.

Thank you again for giving me the opportunity to appear before you today. I welcome any questions you might have.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Mr. Melia.

Let me start with the nominees for ambassadorships to the different countries with the same question. We will just go from left to right. Tell me what is the number one or top two or three opportunities in terms of economic cooperation between our two countries.

Ambassador JONES. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

As I briefly outlined in my statement, we have a strong economic-commercial relationship between the United States and Poland, but I believe there is opportunity for significant growth.

Poland's economy has been consistently growing over the last years, even during the financial crisis. And it is strong across the board, a comprehensive growth. Poland's significant domestic market, its location next to significant markets, present a lot of opportunities for U.S. exporters and U.S. investors.

Secretary Pritzker led a delegation of the President's export council last fall to Poland and identified several different areas where there is great promise to expand our exports and our investments in both directions. Those include areas such as defense, as I mentioned, the defense industry, IT, aerospace, areas such as green cities, green technology, energy cooperation.

So I will, if confirmed, work very closely with the American business community, the Polish business community, to try to expand those opportunities.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you, Ambassador.

Ambassador Klemm.

Ambassador KLEMM. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, an excellent question.

You are familiar with Romania, as a result of your visit there last year. The country has great potential. It is one of the fastest growing in the European Union. It has relatively low debt, and it is fiscally sound and has an educated population. As a result, there is already a substantial presence of U.S. investment in the country, particularly in the sectors of energy, IT, and manufacturing.

All that said, I think there is still great potential for American firms to increase their presence in Romania and, importantly, increase exports to the country to support job growth here at home.

That growth in U.S. presence and, actually, economic development in of itself in Romania is hindered I think by two major factors. One is corruption. Romania still faces a serious problem with corruption. Within the European Union, it is ranked among the very bottom of countries facing corruption and, of course, the contribution that makes to its business and investment environment. And the other one is infrastructure.

In both cases, Romania is committed to improving its environment. It is drawing on European Union resources to help build out its infrastructure, particularly in roads and rail and energy. And then corruption, as I mentioned in my remarks, and as you saw firsthand, Senator, it has put into place some very powerful and courageous institutions in law enforcement and the judiciary to try to deal with corruption and over time has established really both a courageous and remarkable record in terms of pursuing corruption at the local, regional, as well as national level. Thank you.

Senator JOHNSON. Senator Murphy and I, when we were in Romania, met an incredibly courageous young woman, Laura Kovesi. And as Ambassador, we, certainly, hope that you make sure that she remains supported by the Romanian Government.

Mr. Heins.

Mr. HEINS. Thank you, Senator.

There are identified a number of really great opportunities for American companies in Norway. They include oil and gas, in particular technologies for cleaner extraction, more efficient extraction, of oil and gas, and technologies that would permit the extraction of oil and gas in evermore remote and difficult to work in areas.

LNG transport, carbon capture and technology, other green technologies, including wind and solar and hydro; there are opportunities in the marine industry for joint partnerships with Norway; and in health care, with regard to medical devices, medical equipment and pharmaceuticals—these all present real opportunities, I believe, for U.S. industry to export to Norway.

Senator JOHNSON. Mr. Melville.

Mr. MELVILLE. Thank you, Senator.

Estonia is a very successful economy and very welcoming to American businesses. There are approximately 100 American companies who already have a presence in Estonia, which has a well-deserved reputation as an innovative, creative place for startups. And the best example, of course, I already mentioned. That is Skype.

But Estonia has a very responsible approach to managing their economy, as well. They have a balanced budget. They are very open to investors from the United States. We only have about 2.2 percent of their economy in exports now, and there is lots of room for advocacy and growth there, which, if confirmed, I look forward to taking advantage of.

Senator JOHNSON. I would mention the way they balanced their budget was to dramatically reduce spending.

Ms. Doherty.

Ms. DOHERTY. Thank you, Senator.

As I mentioned in my testimony, U.S. investment has already increased sevenfold in the past 2 years in Cyprus, primarily in the professional services sector and tourism, but, most importantly, in the energy sector. Cyprus is in the process of identifying the depth of its natural gas reserves, but the potential is quite high. U.S. company Noble has already invested a significant amount of money in exploration.

But, obviously, the most important thing that could happen for Cyprus and U.S. business opportunity is reunification of the island, which would offer great opportunity for U.S. trade and investment and also Cypriot investment in the United States.

I spent most of my career actually doing economic and commercial advocacy and diplomacy, and I spent a lot of years promoting innovation and entrepreneurship, especially among young people and women. So I look forward to doing that, if I were to be confirmed.

Senator JOHNSON. Can you also tell me a little bit about what you know about the banking crisis there in 2012 and 2013, kind of the cause and effect, and the aftermath?

Ms. DOHERTY. Yes, Senator.

As you do know, Cyprus went through a very serious economic and fiscal crisis in 2012. Cyprus has undertaken several economic reforms. Despite very high unemployment and other constraints, it actually expects to have modest growth this year. So we are reasonably optimistic that Cyprus is moving forward in terms of economic opportunity, and its reform program is quite serious and ambitious.

Senator JOHNSON. Mr. Melia, within Europe and Eurasia, can you talk about the top priorities for U.S. assistance through USAID?

Mr. MELIA. Yes, Mr. Chairman. Thank you.

The mix of assistance programs in this region differs somewhat from other parts of the world for some obvious reasons. In the Europe and Eurasia region, USAID's programs revolve around support for democratic transformation, through democracy and governance programs; support for economic growth, helping promote institutional and structural reform to make these countries more attractive to international investment; to reform their legal structures, to be more law-abiding and fair and transparent; and providing, in some cases, startup investments for small- and medium-sized businesses to model the kind of investments that the private sector can use to jump start business development.

So economic growth is a big part of it. Energy security is the other piece, energy security, economic growth and democratic transformation.

Senator JOHNSON. Can you just mention the country names where the top priorities are, where most of the aid is flowing?

Mr. MELIA. Well, the biggest focus these days, of course, is Ukraine. The investment in Ukraine went from about $50 million, 2 years ago, to $150 million in the current year. That reflects the heightened priority that we are all placing on bolstering Ukraine at this difficult moment and the action by this committee and the Congress to enable us to do that.

So Ukraine is the biggest focus and that program is built around these three priority sectors—democratic transformation, economic growth, energy security, which is paramount in Ukraine. And there is a modest health program as well in Ukraine, which has a large incidence of drug-resistant tuberculosis.

Senator JOHNSON. Thank you.

Senator Shaheen.

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Since I think almost everyone has mentioned energy security, let me just urge you, as you are looking at the potential for energy resources throughout Eastern Europe and in the countries that we hope you will be representing the United States in, that you also look at energy efficiency. It is an area where we have tremendous potential to export. It is the cheapest and fastest way to develop energy. And it is a place where I think, particularly in some of the countries that you are representing, that there has not been much focus. Ukraine is one of those, which has been mentioned several times. So I would just urge you to think about that.

Mr. Melia, you talked about support for Ukraine. Georgia and Moldova are also countries where USAID still has a robust effort. But in most of the countries in Europe, USAID funding has declined precipitously.

So is that a reflection of a lack of need for those economic development programs?

Mr. MELIA. Well, thank you, Senator. And coming from the great State of New Hampshire, I am sure you are very familiar with energy-efficiency programs. That is very much a part of the energy programs in Ukraine and in the region. So I want to acknowledge that it is an important part.

No, the declines over the last few years in assistance levels for the region do not reflect necessarily a diminishing of the need. It has reflected the challenge we all face in trying to make limited and sometimes dwindling amounts of money available to deal with a growing number of crises in the world.

In the FY16 budget request, the administration has proposed increasing funding levels in almost, I believe, in every country that we have an aid program in these days.

I would be a strong advocate for enlarging those budgets, at the same time ensuring that the money is well-targeted and well-spent.

We have not talked about the Balkans, Serbia and its neighbors—

Senator SHAHEEN. I was about to raise that. So I am glad that you did.

Mr. MELIA. They are also in the line of fire from Russia. The Russian propaganda and meddling in local politics and the pugnacious energy politics are being applied against Serbia and its neighbors, as well as against those countries that adjoin Russia.

So I will be an advocate for more robust programs in the key countries across the region.

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you. I appreciate you saying that. As you point out, economic assistance, development assistance, is one of the best ways that we can encourage democratic values in many of the countries that we are working in.

Let me just ask you, if you could, to zero in a little bit more on the Balkans. I was just in Bosnia, and one of the things we heard there is the economic challenges that they are facing. And given the other governance challenges, are there other ways in which we can support Bosnia that would be helpful as they are trying to address their governance challenges as well?

Mr. MELIA. Bosnia and its neighbors are still in the process of creating new states. Institutions and habits of democratic governance are still very much in their nascent stages. So I would hope that we would be able to continue to provide the kind of technical advice and information exchanges that help them do that.

At the same time, we can deploy American know-how in other fields that are important to them—energy security, how to manage grids, how to develop energy efficient approaches to industry and housing. There is a lot of information that we can bring to help people make better decisions. It does not always require a lot of money, but it requires some money to be present and to be able to deploy the know-how that Americans have developed over the years.

So I think there is more to be done in the Balkans. I just visited Kosovo, Serbia, and Macedonia earlier this year on one of my last trips at the State Department. And they generally want more American presence. They are finding their way through coalition-building and democratic politics, media, and transparency. There are a lot of things that are very much in progress there that I think we should not walk away from at this point. When Europe writ large is at a tipping point, we need to consolidate the gains that we helped them achieve before we move on to the next crisis.

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you. I could not agree more, and I look forward to working with you to address those challenges.

Ms. Doherty, you talked about the potential in Cyprus to come to an agreement that might reunite the country and address what has been a frozen conflict for a very long time. We have heard that before. So what are the reasons that we should be hopeful that this time might be different?

Ms. DOHERTY. Thank you, Senator. That is an extremely important question, and I would like to express why we think the situation is different.

Primarily, the commitment of the two leaders, the Greek Cypriot President and the Turkish Cypriot leader, are fundamentally committed to the process of reunification. They actually know each other from their childhood. They have worked together before. And they have been pursuing these talks since May. They have been meeting regularly and the negotiators meet almost every single day.

We want to be supportive of the process as much as possible, and if confirmed, I will do what I can to be supportive to both communities as they try to undertake a very difficult path to reconciliation and reunification.

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you very much.

Mr. Jones, one of the other places I recently visited was Poland. I was there in June for the global security conference in Wroclaw.

What I heard from the Poles was a great deal of concern about Russia and its renewed threat to particularly Eastern Europe.

What more can we do to support Poland in its efforts to be a bulwark against further incursions by Putin into Eastern Europe?

Ambassador JONES. Thank you, Senator, for obviously a very important question and one that can be addressed in many ways.

Briefly, Poland obviously has become a significant contributor to security in the alliance and in Central and Eastern Europe through its military but also through its society, its democracy and the activism of its civil society in the region, and through its economy that is helping other countries nearby grow.

I think we want to address the full spectrum, the hybrid spectrum of possibilities of interference with our partners and our allies. And I think we have done an excellent job within the NATO alliance and bilaterally at deterring and bolstering the security of Poland and our allies. I think there is more we can do in the areas of cybersecurity, in the areas of countering disinformation, in the areas of energy security, as you mentioned, all of which are vulnerabilities to allies and partners in the region.

Thank you.

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you very much. My time has expired. Again, thank you all for your willingness to serve.

Senator JOHNSON. Senator Menendez.

Senator MENENDEZ. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Let me congratulate all of the nominees on their nominations and extend I think the thanks of all of us for your families' willingness to join, because it is a collective effort, at the end of the day, so we appreciate their willingness to sacrifice on behalf of the Nation as well.

Mr. Melville, anyone who was born in Jersey City and has family from Berlin has got to be an extraordinary public servant. So congratulations on your particular nomination.

As you know, the President Ilves, whom I visited with last year, lived and studied in New Jersey. And he can actually turn a New Jersey accent pretty quickly, so you will have a lot to talk about with them.

Mr. MELVILLE. If confirmed, Senator, I very much look looking forward to working with President Ilves, another Jersey boy.

Senator MENENDEZ. Yes, and it is amazing how he can turn it on. He tells me he does not do it very often, and it does not necessarily help him there are lot. But anyhow, you will have a lot to talk to him about.

I think what is happening in Estonia, the challenges, the concerns they have in Poland, which I was also at last year, obviously with the Russian invasion, countries that all have legitimate reasons to be concerned about Russia's resurgence and its actions, concerns in the case of Estonia about Russian-speaking populations and what that means to stability in the country, particularly with all the propaganda that Russia spends an enormous amount of money in those countries, and how we counteract that. So I look forward to working with both of you in your respective nominations.

Let me turn to Ms. Doherty. You are going to a country that as you and I discussed, I have a lot of interest in, Cyprus. I have been following the Cyprus question for the better part of my congressional career.

I think for the first time in decades, Cyprus has a historic opportunity to forge a lasting agreement between the Greek and Turkish Cypriots. And the efforts of President Anastasiades and the Turkish Cypriot leader Akinci have put all of the difficult issues on the table, which I think is very important.

However, one of the concerns that I have even in a moment in which I think there is an opportunity is that, at the end of the day, any potential agreement has to be Cypriot-led and Cypriot-agreed to. When we try to impose upon the Cypriots our will or the will of the international community, that is a challenge. We saw that in the Annan plan, which was rejected by the people of Cyprus.

So I hope we have learned from that lesson and try to be a facilitator, but not try to impose our will on the Cypriots, because that will not have a lasting effect.

I think there are some things that are important to recognize, and so as you visited with me and I shared with you some of my concerns, I come to this with the view that, even though we have expectations at this moment, at the core of this problem is an invasion of Turkey and an occupation of Northern Cyprus. And I would like to hear your views on that, as a starting point.

Ms. DOHERTY. Thank you, Senator. And thank you for your interest in Cyprus all these years. You have a lot of expertise on the issue and on the country, and I very much appreciate that as well.

As you mentioned, this needs to be a Cypriot-led process, and it is a Cypriot-led process. The commitment of both the Turkish Cypriot leader and the Greek Cypriot President, they seem very determined to doing and taking the very tough questions at hand.

I think the issues of the past are very painful. They need to be recognized. They need to be considered. They need to be acknowledged.

But I think at this moment, as we said, we have a historic moment that we need to look at the future and really concentrate on what can be done to actually move this process through its process of reconciliation and reunification. And if I were to be confirmed, I would do a lot of listening to both sides. I would be engaged as much as possible, as they asked me to be, and try to be supportive of the U.N.-facilitated process as well, Senator.

Senator MENENDEZ. I appreciate our desire to look forward, but sometimes unless we reconcile ourselves with the past, it is difficult to move forward.

America had slavery as an original sin, and it was not until we came face to face with that reality that it was not truly possible for us to liberate ourselves and to move forward in a way that really had all American society progress.

So what I would hate to hear is you as the United States Ambassador not acknowledge or say what your predecessor has said about the reality is that we have the most militarized place in the world in Northern Cyprus with thousands of Turkish troops who invaded and occupied a sovereign country, a country that is part of the European Union.

So while you want to focus on the future, can I have an assurance that I will not be hearing from you that there was never an invasion of Cyprus?

Ms. DOHERTY. Senator, the years of intercommunal violence were terrible and many lives were lost. I think we need to really think about those and recognize it.

I worked in the peace process in Northern Ireland, and I also understand how violence can divide communities.

I think we need to focus on the future, Senator, and I think the issue—

Senator MENENDEZ. I appreciate that, but you are not giving me an answer to my question.

Ms. DOHERTY. The issue of foreign troops is one of the core elements of the peace process and settlement process. The two Cypriot leaders need to find a resolution that is satisfactory to both—

Senator MENENDEZ. So if Turkey, who says in a recent visit by the President of Turkey to the occupied section of Cyprus, who says that this is time for the agreement to come about—sounds good—but then at the end insists that Turkish groups continue to be in Northern Cyprus even if there is an agreement between Turkish and Greek Cypriots that the European Union is enough of a safeguard.

Would we say that we still want to look forward then? Or would we acknowledge that agreement between the two parties is what should prevail, and that Turkey would have to seek to withdraw its troops?

Ms. DOHERTY. I think, Senator, we need to focus on what the Turkish President has said. He said this is an opportunity not to be missed. He said that even just this morning in Cyprus.

So I think we need to work very closely with Ankara, as well as Athens, as well as the two communities on both sides of the island, in ensuring that we have a resolution that is satisfactory to all parties.

Senator MENENDEZ. Mr. Chairman, may I have two additional minutes?

Well, okay, I know what the State Department tells you to say. That is not satisfactory to me. And I think it does not take a lot to acknowledge that if Greek and Turkish Cypriots come to an agreement, which says we want the Turkish troops out of here and we are willing to accept the European Union as our security guarantee, that we should be able to say that the two parties who are the people who are most involved in terms of their lives and future, that we should be able to honor that. And if we cannot say that, that is a problem.

So I hope that the State Department will allow you in some response in writing to give me a better response than what we got.

Let me ask you this, the committee on missing persons in Cyprus has been unable to access so-called Turkish military zones where the remains of Greek and Turkish Cypriots missing persons are likely buried. They have been very slow in allowing the process of exhumations to move forward. What is your take on this issue, considering the fact that the United States has contributed over $500,000 to the committee for the exhumation and identification of the remains of 500 Turkish Cypriots and 1,500 Greek Cypriots?

Ms. DOHERTY. We have called repeatedly for expeditious access to all burial sites, as have the two Cypriot leaders. While the access has been slow, Senator, the Turkish Government has provided information on two new military sites, as you have seen in the U.N. security report that was just released, which is a step forward, a positive trend forward.

That said, we continue to raise this issue with Ankara, and we will continue to press for a greater and more expeditious access to all burial sites.

Senator MENENDEZ. So if you are confirmed as Ambassador, you will make that one of your priorities?

Ms. DOHERTY. I will, indeed, sir.

Senator MENENDEZ. Finally, for the purposes of not extending the time here, I will submit some questions for the record for you and a few others.

Cyprus is the only European country where the United States still maintains an arms embargo. It is on a short list with countries that it does not deserve to be, like North Korea and Iran—despite being a strategic partner of the United States, despite being part of the coalition fighting ISIL, despite being one of the only stable democracies in the region, a member of the European Union, and someone that is working with us on just about every element that we want to.

Now, an amendment that I authored was passed on the national defense authorization bill, which passed here in the Senate. Do you have a view as to lifting the outdated arms embargo on this European Union country?

Ms. DOHERTY. Thank you, Senator.

Cyprus is an important partner. We are prohibited under the Foreign Assistance Act of 1987. There is a statutory requirement that prohibits defense sales and transfers. So we are obligated to follow that statutory requirement.

That said, we do have some waiver authority. And we have on a case-by-case basis, provided equipment to Cyprus under our waiver authority. And we would consider all possibilities should the Cypriot Government present us with a list of requests. We will consider those within our own authorities.

Senator MENENDEZ. Well, I will submit, Mr. Chairman. I do not want to delay—

Senator JOHNSON. You can ask more questions.

Senator MENENDEZ. That is an invitation I will not resist. I am sure Ms. Doherty would appreciate—

Ms. DOHERTY. I am from New York, sir.

Senator MENENDEZ. I understand, yes. Which is a great suburb of New Jersey. [Laughter.]

So we like New Yorkers.

Look, just a different topic, on Cyprus, obviously, but a different topic.

In the future for both the Greek and Turkish Cypriots is the exclusive economic zone, which abuts alongside Israel, in terms of the zone. Cyprus and Israelis have been working jointly toward being able to explore the fulfillment of that exclusive economic zone, which can not only be a tremendous opportunity for Cyprus and, if there is reunification, a tremendous opportunity for Turkish and Greek Cypriots, but also an opportunity to help Europe with its energy needs and keep moving away from Russia's dominance in that respect.

But Turkey came in there and started claiming responsibility—not responsibilities, but started claiming that it has rights, even though it is nowhere near this exclusive economic zone, sent in the Barbaros exploration ship into Cypriot waters, followed it with warships.

Do we believe that the Cypriot Government has the right to explore the exclusive economic zone in accordance with international law that we would want to have observed in our own interests?

Ms. DOHERTY. Yes, Senator. We believe the Republic of Cyprus has the right to develop its exclusive economic zone.

Senator MENENDEZ. Okay. And we would hope that that would be without the interference of other countries? Is that a fair statement?

Ms. DOHERTY. The incident mentioned, that you described, sir, we did raise our concerns and we feel very strongly that the Republic of Cyprus does have its right to develop its own. So if I were to be confirmed, I would also speak out for anything that raises tension and serves as an impediment to the reconciliation process.

Senator MENENDEZ. One final question, then to Mr. Melville and Ambassador Jones. What do you think, in your respective roles with Poland and Estonia—and you may have answered this before. I tried to listen while I was in my office in a meeting, keeping the TV on. So I do not know if I missed it.

But as it relates to this issue of Russia and its bombardment in Eastern Europe and the efforts on both trying through its media and other forums to affect communities particular more in Estonia but also with the challenge that the former President of Poland described to me when I was visiting with him, what is the U.S. role in responding to that?

Mr. MELVILLE. Thank you, Senator, for that important question.

Yes, the Russian-speaking population of Estonia is about a quarter, more or less 300,000, concentrated in the northeast part of the country. Fortunately, recent polling indicates a strong identity on the part of these Russian-speaking Estonians with Estonia. They like the fact that they are members of a stalwart ally, a strong democracy with progressive, liberal economic opportunities. But it is true there is a cultural pull of Russia.

We have been looking for opportunities to reach out to that community to counter the Russian propaganda with fact-based, truthful reporting.

So, for example, through the international visitors program, we have invited journalists to be trained in the United States, and through various other programs, in investigative techniques and honest reporting. We are looking for opportunities to encourage English-language training in this community as well. And the Embassy, as a matter of fact, spends a lot of time and resources on public outreach to that community.

As a Russian speaker myself, if confirmed, Senator, I would look to spend a lot of time there. And I think there is a lot of strength through diversity that I think the United States provides a wonderful model of. And that would be an important part of the public outreach that I would engage in, were I to be confirmed as Ambassador.

Ambassador JONES. Thank you, Senator.

Poland is a terrific partner in this effort to counter Russian disinformation and propaganda. Some of the things that the United States is doing in cooperation with Poland and a number of other interested partners include helping to network and build capacity among Russian-speaking independent journalists in the Russian-speaking areas, such as in Estonia and other countries nearby Russia, also helping with building capacity in content and building capacity of broadcast capability.

I think there are a couple of different threats coming our way in the area of disinformation. One is to this Russian-speaking community. Another is, frankly, to Europe and even in our country where the effort is more about trying to confuse debates and undermine solidarity within the alliance and within the European Union.

I think what we are working together with several countries on is to try to make clear, sort of unmask this propaganda machine, and make clear to our publics, our elites, our legislatures, and our government partners how this is done and how coordinated it is emanating from Moscow.

And if confirmed, I will, certainly, take up that issue very energetically with the Government of Poland.

Senator MENENDEZ. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for your courtesy. I appreciate it.

Senator JOHNSON. No, I appreciate it, because that is actually a line of questioning I was going to continue on, quite honestly.

So I am hearing that we are pushing back. Do either of you two gentlemen think that we are pushing back even close to enough?

Ambassador Jones.

Ambassador JONES. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I think Russia has invested a significant amount of money over a period of many years in creating what appears to be very slick and Western-looking media capabilities that are existing in many, many countries, including our own, and I think we are starting our pushback.

I think we are off to an important start, collaborating with other governments. But we will not be matching the annual budget that Russia frankly puts into this effort. So we have to do it smarter. We have to rely on, in my view, as I say, networking and building capacity among journalists. And I think over time, we have the potential to turn this into a strategic vulnerability for Russia.

Senator JOHNSON. I am concerned when I hear you say we are not going to match the budget. Russia is about a $2 trillion a year economy. Western Europe combined with the U.S. is over $30 trillion. We have started but we are not even close to pushing back. It is completely inadequate.

And this is extremely important. They are getting away with what they are doing in Ukraine because of their incredibly effective propaganda.

When I was over there with Senator McCain, we sat down with Foreign Minister Sikorski. I know he has some ideas. I would really encourage you to work with the Foreign Minister and, certainly, the Polish people. We have to push back. I think it is just absolutely vital.

As long as I am on Poland here, we held a hearing in my other committee, the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, on the visa waiver program. I think an awful lot of people had a perspective that this actually represented a security threat to America. I think the testimony was pretty clear that if properly handled, if properly structured, if a country is fully cooperating and put in place the requirements of a visa waiver program, that it actually improves our security.

Can you speak to that, because I know Poland as well as other European countries that are no longer on these visa waiver systems would like to become part of it? Can you just kind of speak to your perspective in terms Poland?

Ambassador JONES. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I could not agree more with the approach you just outlined.

The Obama administration is committed to the expansion of the visa waiver program through legislation that would allow greater flexibility, so that countries such as Poland can be considered to join the visa waiver program.

Poland has a growing and strong economy. So we strongly believe that it would benefit our business as well as our people-to-people ties. As you indicated, there are a number of requirements that Poland has already instituted. Poland is a very close cooperators on counterterrorism and law enforcement. So those requirements are virtually all met.

So as I say, we would welcome additional flexibility that would allow us to consider Poland.

Senator JOHNSON. Okay, good. Obviously, I hope they succeed, because it actually does improve our own security, particularly in light of what is happening now with terrorism around the world and folks going into Europe.

The first congressional delegation trip I took 2 months into my term here was to visit Georgia, Ukraine, Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. It was very obvious then talking to representatives of all five of those nations that Russia had a very overt, were not trying to hide it at all, effort to destabilize those democracies.

Again, propaganda is going to be extremely important. What other measures can we take? I will start with you, Ambassador Klemm.

Ambassador KLEMM. Thank you, Senator.

In the case of Romania, you do not have the presence of a population with strong Russian ties. In fact, the relationship between Russia and Romania, historically, has often been fraught. So the inclination of the population in Romania to be attracted to Russian propaganda starts at a very low level.

The affection, according to opinion polls, among Romanians for the United States, for example, is very, very high, and for Russia actually remarkably low.

That said, Romanians are very concerned about Russia and Russian aggression and the impact that has had on regional security. They share a very long border with Ukraine. And right over the horizon across the Black Sea, is Russia itself.

So the steps that they have taken are working with us and with the NATO alliance to ensure that the alliance and the bilateral security posture is strong and able to resist Russian aggression.

Senator JOHNSON. Talk about the other ways that Russia tries to destabilize. Obviously, they utilize their oil and gas resources. Corruption within these systems is endemic and a legacy of the Soviet system.

Just describe a little bit about that in terms of what the pushback would be and the other ways that Russia tries to destabilize other than just propaganda.

Ambassador KLEMM. Yes, sir. You have raised two important areas.

One is in energy. Here, too, Romania is fortunate that it is somewhat isolated from those pressures in that it is still a net exporter of energy. It is very, very slight. Their oil and gas reserves are declining. But at least today, they have not been vulnerable to Russian pressure on energy. That said, all of their neighbors are. All of their neighbors are very much reliant on Gazprom sources, particularly natural gas.

What we have been encouraging Romania to do is to invest in its energy infrastructure, which is antiquated, so that it can be part of a European-wide solution to improve diversification of energy resources.

Senator JOHNSON. Mr. Melville, you can feel free to answer those two questions, but I also want you to speak to the difference in perspective that I hear as I meet with representatives from Eastern Europe versus representatives of Western Europe, in terms of the imperative of pushing back or basically how we should push back on Russian aggression. Can you speak to that issue?

Mr. MELVILLE. Yes, Senator.

Estonia, as you know, has been one of our most stalwart allies in terms of responding to the recent Russian aggression. Within the European Union, they have advocated the imposition of sanctions, despite the fact of having that border with Russia and close trade ties. It would have economic consequences, but Russia's conduct is so objectionable that they are willing to take the leadership role in standing up to that aggression.

So the Estonian Government has been very clear that until Russia implements all of the provisions of the Minsk agreement and withdraws from their illegal annexation of Crimea, the sanctions should stay in place.

So the policy of the Estonian Government and the United States Government in response to Russian aggression is indistinguishable.

Senator JOHNSON. Although, do the Eastern European countries not want us to have a far more robust response? I mean, they would like to see us provide lethal defensive weaponry, for example. I think the Eastern European countries would like to see that. Western European countries would not or are certainly more cautious about it.

Is that an accurate statement?

Mr. MELVILLE. I would point to Estonia's role as a NATO ally. They provide security to the alliance. They have stepped up markedly their contributions toward host nation support for the presence that has been increased since the Wales summit last year.

We have a persistent and continuing presence of American troops now in Estonia. The Estonians are spending 40 million over the next 5 years to beef up the host nation support that they are providing for the infrastructure to support those troops. They are taking great measures to improve their border security. And, of course, their borders are also NATO borders. That is another contribution to our collective security.

And as the President said when he was in Tallinn last September, the defense of Tallinn, Riga, and Vilnius is the same as the defense of Berlin, Paris, and London.

So I think Estonia's role in the alliance and leadership in standing up to Russia and the increased aggression has been admirable.

Senator JOHNSON. Ambassador Jones, can you speak to that basic comment about the different perspectives, Eastern Europe versus Western Europe? And do you really believe that Poland is satisfied with America's response to this? Do you think they prefer seeing a little bit more robust response to the situation in Ukraine, for example?

Ambassador JONES. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I think that since the summit in Wales, the last NATO summit, the response from NATO and from the United States has grown much more visible and much more tangible to countries such as Poland.

Senator JOHNSON. Describe that a little bit for us.

Ambassador JONES. As Secretary Carter just announced last month, we will be prepositioning an armored brigade worth of equipment and materiel in several countries of Central and Eastern Europe for use in exercises, for use in training. We will also be, using the European reassurance initiative funding, upgrading the infrastructure in Poland, particularly at two bases, an aviation base and an army base. So we will be able to more effectively train together on this continuous, persistent basis with U.S. forces and forces from—every member of the alliance that contributes to this effort.

I think as we have seen, we have had an aviation detachment in Poland for some years now. We increased the numbers within days of aircraft to that detachment, within days of Russia's land grab in Crimea.

So I think the people of these countries are seeing that response. Now I will not say that there are not differences about how we should take it forward. As I indicated in response to Senator Shaheen's question, I think that that conversation has to be a wide-ranging one that includes all of the hybrid war threats and not only military equipment.

Senator JOHNSON. Is it your sense that the Government of Poland is satisfied with our response? Is there going to be mounting pressure to do more?

Ambassador JONES. I think the government is satisfied with our response to date. But obviously the threat is evolving, and our response to it continues to grow. So as that goes on, I look forward, if confirmed, to participate in that conversation.

Senator JOHNSON. Mr. Melia, you mentioned human trafficking. Can you just make a few comments on that?

Mr. MELIA. Thanks for the question, Mr. Chairman.

It remains one of the scourges of the region, human trafficking and forced labor, sex trafficking. It is a widespread problem. Some of the governments are beginning to pay more attention to it and take our exhortations more seriously.

USAID has several programs in five countries in the region, specifically working either with government agencies to increase the ability of the justice sector to address this as a criminal matter and prosecute offenders, and also with civil society to increase social service provisions to victims of trafficking.

Senator JOHNSON. Can you talk about where the real problem regions are?

Mr. MELIA. I confess I do not have the numbers at the tip of my tongue. Ukraine is the biggest country with the largest population. It is centrally located. It is a big problem there. There are other countries that are both sources and transit points for trafficking. A number of these countries have large portions of their laborers working in Russia, where they are often subject to atrocious working conditions.

So there are a number of countries that have different aspects of this problem. The programs that the U.S. Government has been supporting address both the government efforts in those cases where we have willing partners but also then supporting social service and advocacy organizations in a number of the countries to press their governments to be more active on this.

Senator JOHNSON. Okay, thank you.

Again, I just want to wrap up and thank all of the nominees for your willingness to serve this Nation.

As Senator Menendez mentioned, I also want to thank your families. This is a full commitment on the part of yourself and your families. Thank you very much.

I, certainly, wish you the best in what I am sure will be your appointments to the posts.

So with that, the record will remain open for questions until noon on Monday, July 27.

This hearing is adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 3:41 p.m., the hearing was adjourned.]

ADDITIONAL MATERIAL SUBMITTED FOR THE RECORD

RESPONSES OF JAMES DESMOND MELVILLE, JR., NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF ESTONIA, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE MELVILLE'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR MENENDEZ

Question. The OIG gave our Embassy in Tallinn a "D" grade last month, citing serious concerns about maintenance and security issues, finding that it does not meet—and cannot be retrofitted to meet—even the most basic security standards. Despite this, the Embassy was taken off the "Top 80" OBO Capital Security Construction Program.

♦ Please explain why that is the case. If confirmed, how will you make securing our Embassy in Tallinn a priority of the U.S. Government?

Answer. If confirmed, keeping personnel safe and secure will be one of my highest priorities. Based on its security risk rating relative to other posts, Tallinn did not score high enough on the Department's September 2013 Risk Matrix to be placed on the Department's Top 80 List. Hence it is not scheduled for a New Embassy Compound (NEC) on the current Capital Security Construction Program (CSCP) schedule. The Bureau of Diplomatic Security is currently conducting its annual update to its Risk Matrix, which will be the basis for a revised Top 80 List and CSCP schedule. The Department does, however, have projects underway and plans to improve Embassy Tallinn's physical and security infrastructure.

Understanding that the Department has a prioritization process, OBO continues to improve the security and physical infrastructure of Embassy Tallinn to the extent possible. If confirmed, I will work with my colleagues in the Department of State to keep U.S. personnel serving in Tallinn safe and secure.

RESPONSES OF KATHLEEN ANN DOHERTY, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF CYPRUS, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE DOHERTY'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR MENENDEZ

Question. Is the Cyprus problem, at its core, one of invasion and occupation?

Answer. The Cyprus problem is rooted in a complicated history, which has resulted in the presence of U.N. peacekeeping forces; the division of the island, and the presence of Turkish troops in the north. Outstanding issues related to these events, including properties and the presence of foreign troops, must be addressed in the context of the settlement process. We remain focused on supporting efforts to achieve a just and lasting settlement. The U.S. Government has consistently sought to use language to describe these events that would enable us to play an effective role in support of that process. Like you, we believe that Cyprus is poised for tremendous economic growth and opportunity, and we look forward to working together to unlock the island's great potential.

Question. Do you support lifting the arms embargo on Cyprus?

Answer. I believe we should have normal trade and security relations with all of our European Union partners. The United States is actively supporting efforts to achieve a just and comprehensive settlement, which would obviate the rationale and statutory requirements for special procedures for arms exports to Cyprus. Until then, we will continue to license, on a case-by-case basis, exports to Cyprus of defense articles in accordance with the existing statutory framework.

Question. What will the U.S. position be if Turkey isn't willing to honor an agreement between Greek Cypriots and Turkish Cypriots to have Turkish troops leave? Will the United States pressure Turkey to honor that agreement?

Answer. The United States would support a settlement that is agreed to by both Greek Cypriots and Turkish Cypriots. We believe Cypriot leadership of the settlement process is critical to its success. Thus, we would actively urge Turkey, and all stakeholders, to respect and support a solution welcomed by both sides, including one in which the sides agreed to address the withdrawal of troops from the island.

RESPONSES OF THOMAS O. MELIA, NOMINATED TO BE ASSISTANT ADMINISTRATOR OF THE U.S. AGENCY FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEM-BERS OF THE COMMITTEE

ASSISTANT ADMINISTRATOR-DESIGNATE MELIA'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR MENENDEZ

Question. Europe and Eurasia Bureau.—With the rise of a belligerent Russia, the E&E Bureau has taken on new prominence, yet the E&E Bureau offices at USAID are offsite. This sends a bad message. If you are confirmed, will you commit to working to move this now much more important bureau to offices within the USAID headquarters building?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with agency officials to ensure that the E&E bureau's space needs are adequately addressed consistent with the challenges of finding appropriate space for all the agency's personnel.

ASSISTANT ADMINISTRATOR-DESIGNATE MELIA'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR PERDUE

Question. Please describe your top three priorities for your role, if confirmed.

Answer. As I mentioned in my testimony, the Europe and Eurasia region faces heightened political, economic, and energy challenges at present. If confirmed, I will bring the Europe & Eurasia (E&E) Bureau's considerable expertise to bear as the United States elevates its support for Ukraine, Moldova, and Georgia to counter Russian aggression and continue to advance a Europe whole, free, and at peace.

I will continue to prioritize the E&E Bureau's work across the region on Democracy, Human Rights and Governance, Economic Growth, and Energy Security. All three of these areas are mutually reinforcing and are critical to the short- and longer-term development of countries across the region, helping to make them more stable and resilient to external pressure.

If confirmed, I will also continue to advance USAID's new model of development by leveraging partnerships with the private sector, universities, and civil society; promoting science, technology, and innovation; and focusing on sustainable results through rigorous monitoring and evaluation of our work. In addition, if confirmed, I will seek closer partnership with like-minded partners, including support for countries in the region seeking further Euro-Atlantic integration.

Question. If confirmed, what could Congress do to help USAID Europe and Eurasia better meet your goals and mission?

Answer. Congress has long played a critical role in helping to advance the U.S. objective of a Europe whole, free, and at peace—and particularly during the crisis of the past 2 years as Russia's aggressive behavior has obliged us to reinvigorate our efforts to assist the countries transitioning from communism.

As I stated in my testimony, having worked for more than 5 years for Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan, I understand and appreciate the important role that Congress plays in the development and execution of U.S. foreign policy. The Congress is the democratic fulcrum that ensures our international policies are leveraged to properly project American values and remain focused on core national interests. Congress has long played a critical role in helping to advance the U.S. objective of a Europe whole, free, and at peace. If confirmed, it will be a priority for me to work closely with members this committee and with others in Congress to address the challenges we face in Europe and Eurasia.

Question. The Foreign Relations Committee is working to draft legislation to help tackle corruption in Ukraine and assist in their economic recovery. What recommendations would you have for this legislation, pertaining to USAID efforts?

Answer. As I noted in my testimony, I am grateful for the strong bipartisan support that the Congress has shown Ukraine and for the consistently strong position regarding the need for the Ukrainian Government to take concrete measures to address corruption. If confirmed, I look forward to working closely with the committee and others in Congress to identify additional tools and resources to support the Government of Ukraine's efforts to address endemic corruption.

It is important to recognize the whole-of-government approach required to tackle corruption. USAID, along with colleagues across the U.S. Government, is working closely with the Ukrainian Government, the Verkhovna Rada and Ukrainian civil society to address the long-standing challenge of combating corruption in Ukraine. The impact of corruption on Ukraine's economy over the past two decades has been far reaching and has left Ukraine with a weakened economy, preventing sustainable growth and prosperity for the Ukrainian people.

USAID's efforts are closely linked to State Department and Justice Department efforts to support the Prosecutor General's Office (PGO) and National Anti-Corruption Bureau of Ukraine (NABU) to ensure the Government of Ukraine prosecutes corruption, as a real deterrent to corrupt practices. USAID also continues to support civil society actors as they hold the Government of Ukraine accountable and advocate for reforms.

It is also worth noting that the new Ukrainian Government has taken steps to put in place a strategy and laws to fight corruption, including setting up a new independent National Anti-Corruption Bureau, ensuring that politicians and government officials disclose their assets and recently standing up new patrol police in Kiev. To support this effort, since the Maidan, the U.S. Government has provided $38 million in assistance including: technical assistance; support to establish new agencies; and support for civil society and media engagement on passage, enactment, and implementation of anticorruption measures and key reforms.

Question. What progress has Ukraine made under President Poroshenko on fighting corruption? How is USAID helping with this effort?

Answer. Corruption is a central challenge for Ukraine, and it must be addressed in order for Ukraine's reforms and progress to be sustainable. Eliminating opportunities for corruption is an overarching and cross-cutting focus of all of USAID's programming in Ukraine from agriculture, to energy, to health. For example, USAID works with Ukraine's judiciary to promote greater transparency and accountability of judicial institutions and reduce opportunities for corruption. USAID supports the development and implementation of merit-based judicial selection and standardized judicial discipline procedures and monitoring by civil society organizations of judicial selection and discipline processes. USAID also works with Ukraine's Parliament to advance an anticorruption framework and legislation, and to increase understanding of the national budget process for both parliamentarians and the public.

USAID's support to civil society fosters citizen activism and participation in policymaking, and helps civil society organizations monitor the government, which directly ties into anticorruption efforts by enhancing government accountability. I understand that USAID has promoted reforms through a broad coalition of civic activists and experts, who have played a significant role in driving many of the government's major anticorruption achievements to date. These achievements include the creation of a national anticorruption strategy, reform of the public procurement system, the creation of a National Anti-Corruption Bureau and National Agency for the Prevention of Corruption, strengthened antimoney laundering regulations, official asset disclosure laws, and partial judicial reform, including reform of the Prosecutor General's office. USAID also works to improve the quality of local media and investigative journalism to promote government accountability and enhance the transparency of public activities.

The Group of States against Corruption (GRECO), the Council of Europe's corruption watchdog, said Ukraine had fulfilled 20 of 25 recommendations the group made, marking considerable progress over the past year. However, full implementation of these anticorruption reforms will be critical to Ukraine's long-term success.

Question. What conditionality would you recommend to ensure that Ukraine's anticorruption efforts are successful?

Answer. It is my understanding that the United States and international partners are working closely with the Ukrainian Government and civil society to incentivize Ukraine's efforts to address corruption. A key element is conditionality on U.S. and international financing (macroeconomic support) to Ukraine. Major structural reforms required for IMF, U.S., and other international support include: governance reforms, including anticorruption and judicial measures, deregulation and tax administration reforms, and reforms of state-owned enterprises to improve corporate governance and reduce fiscal risks. Broader energy sector reforms, including Naftogaz's restructuring, are intended to increase energy efficiency and foster energy independence. The loan guarantees signed by the United States and Ukraine also included conditionality focused on two new Ukrainian anticorruption agencies, the establishment of the National Agency on Prevention of Corruption (NAPC) and ensuring that the Ukraine's National Anti-Corruption Bureau (NAB) has the necessary startup resources to begin investigations and operations to combat corruption. To fulfill loan guarantee conditionally Ukraine also passed a new State Procurement Law to strengthen governance and checks and balances, including by reducing exemptions from competitive processes.

Question. How long do you think that the United States and EU will need to commit to ensure Ukraine develops the proper rule of law and sufficient economic growth?

Answer. The United States is strongly committed to support Ukraine's short, medium, and long term reform efforts in the area of rule of law. The United States partners with the European Union and other international donors to work collaboratively in support of these reforms. Over the past year, the Government of Ukraine (GOU) has achieved some progress in this area—such as instituting merit-based tests for judges. However, there is still significant work to be done to reform the judiciary and establish a credible rule of law in Ukraine. Both the U.S., EU, and international community understand that reforming the rule of law in Ukraine is a long-term process given the deteriorating effects of more than 20 years of entrenched corruption in the rule of law sector and of longer term legacies from the Soviet era that continue to distort the justice system in Ukraine.

USAID is well-positioned to support the GOU in developing the rule of law in Ukraine, and has provided key technical support in informing the GOU about the lustration efforts and models that were developed in Eastern Europe after the fall of communism in the early 1990s. For example, USAID rule of law efforts established objective reappointment criteria that are being used to vet judges. The Agency also works with civil society organizations and media professionals to engage various audiences outside of the judiciary and justice sector to build demand for the rule of law in Ukrainian society.

The United States is similarly engaged, taking short, medium, and longer term steps to strengthen Ukraine's economy. Ukraine has suffered from decades of economic mismanagement and corruption and its economy has been severely impacted by the eurozone crisis. More recently, Russian aggression, including the use of energy, trade, and finance as weapons, has led to further economic contraction. Given these challenges, USAID, as part of the broader U.S. Government effort, is committed to working with the GOU, and partners like the EU, to take steps to strengthen the Ukrainian economy today and into the future.

Question. What safeguards are in place to ensure that U.S. foreign assistance to Ukraine is not diverted into the pockets of corrupt officials? Do you believe more could be done on this front?

Answer. My understanding is that the majority of U.S. assistance to Ukraine is given in the form of technical, or advisory, assistance rather than direct assistance to the Government of Ukraine. I have been assured that when assistance is, in fact, provided to the GOU, it is accompanied by rigorous oversight measures on the part of the USAID mission, including funding for independent civil society watchdogs to ensure greater accountability and transparency. If confirmed as Assistant Administrator, I will place a premium on safeguarding all taxpayer investments in the region through robust oversight, including strong fiduciary controls, and rigorous monitoring and evaluation.

Question. What USAID programs can be used to help in President Poroshenko's "de-oligarchization" effort?

Answer. Improvements to economic governance are the key to curbing the influence of oligarchs in the economy. This includes removing barriers to business start-ups; increasing transparency and uniform enforcement of laws and regulations that govern the business sector; and adopting and enforcing strong antimonopoly, competition policy, and antitrust legislation. Changes to the legal and regulatory regime are important but the creation and strengthening of the institutions that implement and enforce the rules is a more difficult task that requires changing the attitudes and behavior of underpaid and poorly trained civil servants at all levels.

I understand that USAID has received a request from the Government of Ukraine (GOU) to provide technical assistance in privatizing state-owned companies, and is exploring ways to support this request. USAID personnel have deep expertise in this area and could provide technical assistance working with the GOU to ensure that tender documents reflect accurate valuation and that competitions are free and fair. Other municipal entities in Ukraine have requested USAID assistance in "de-oligarchizing" unfair concession agreements so that contracts provide value to citizens, rather than funnel money uniquely to oligarchs.

Question. What effect, if any, have U.S. Sanctions against Russia had on Ukraine? What could be done to mitigate negative effects?

Answer. As I understand the situation, an important part of the U.S. assistance program is aimed at helping Ukraine reorient its trade and become less reliant on the Russian market and therefore less vulnerable to Russia's abrupt and punitive cutoffs of trade with Ukraine, a tactic Russia has frequently used to pressure Ukraine before and since the imposition of international sanctions against Russia for its aggression against its neighbor. This includes not only the considerable work with European nations to provide reverse flow of natural gas to assist Ukraine during the winter seasons, but also assistance to help Ukrainian firms meet Western product standards and improve their productivity and competitiveness; building business linkages and relationship in new markets; helping the government develop and implement a sound export promotion strategy; improving trade policy, including better capacity to utilize understanding of WTO rules and procedures; and enhancing trade facilitation to reduce the time and cost of getting goods across borders.

Question. What efforts, specifically, is USAID taking spark or support FDI by the private sector both from the EU and other developed nations? What industries or economic sectors do you see as the best potentialities for these efforts?

Answer. The most important step that any country in this region can take to attract foreign direct investment (FDI) is to make meaningful and visible improvements in the business enabling environment. Potential investors need to know that the host country government truly welcomes investors and protects their rights. A significant focus of the U.S. assistance program in the Europe and Eurasia region is aimed at improving economic governance. While there are significant differences between countries, the most promising sectors in the region include agriculture and agro-processing, energy, information technology, light manufacturing, and tourism.

For example, in Ukraine, the sectors with the greatest potential for FDI are agriculture production and processing, energy, information technology, health, and transportation infrastructure roads, highways, rail, ports, and commodity storage. With a focus on small- and medium-sized enterprises in the agricultural sector, I understand that USAID supports partnerships in developing Ukraine's agriculture sector to spur economic growth that increases competitiveness, productivity, employment, and incomes. USAID's goal is to work with private sector partners to promote agricultural development by leveraging the expertise of commercial partnerships to benefit small- and medium-sized enterprises in productive and profitable ways.

Question. How is/does USAID (intend to) work with the EU, the IMF, and DOS to insure that USAID funds are not allotted in a duplicative manner? To what extent does USAID work in conjunction with the EU, the IMF, and DOS to prevent duplication of efforts and funds?

Answer. USAID participates in broad donor coordination, including the EU, IMF, multilateral organizations, and bilateral donors in the field across Europe and Eurasia. This is done regularly on a sector-by-sector basis to ensure complementarity and effective use of resources. For example, with respect to coordination with the Department of State and the broader interagency, coordination on assistance and funds in Ukraine is done in Washington through the State Department's Assistance Coordinator for Europe and Eurasia (State/EUR/ACE) and in Kiev through the U.S. Embassy's special coordinator for assistance, retired ambassador Clifford Bond. USAID's guidance for developing Country Development Cooperation Strategies (CDCS) and project design documents includes mandatory sections on donor cooperation to promote collaboration and guard against duplication.

Question. The Department of State's 2014 Trafficking in Persons report cites Ukraine and other E&E countries in the Tier 2 and Watch List categories, meaning they have made commitments to pursue significant efforts to reduce trafficking. What USAID programs are helping to combat human trafficking and verify these efforts? In your opinion, what more could be done by USAID to address this problem?

USAID has committed to playing a vital role in international efforts to counter all forms of human trafficking. Through the adoption of its code of conduct in compliance with Executive Order 13627, USAID has pledged to incorporate a standard trafficking in persons clause into all of its acquisition and assistance instruments.

My understanding is that missions are expected to support the implementation of the Countering Trafficking in Persons (C-TIP) Code of Conduct and to identify opportunities to strengthen anti-TIP efforts in their respective missions. Especially in Tier 2 Watch List and Tier 3 countries, missions are encouraged to develop anti-TIP strategies across all technical areas and integrate anti-TIP components into ongoing programming. To support these efforts, the Europe and Eurasia Bureau has developed a Toolkit for Integrating C-TIP into Cross-Sectoral Programming in Europe and Eurasia.

At the regional level, USAID has projects in five countries: Azerbaijan, Belarus, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Moldova, and Ukraine:

In Azerbaijan, USAID provides assistance victims of human trafficking and forced labor, through the provision of technical and financial assistance to NGO-run shelters for female, male, and child victims of human trafficking and forced labor.

In Belarus, USAID works to strengthen government agencies and civil society organizations to counter TIP. The project has two objectives: (1) containing TIP through prevention and protection activities; (2) and capacity-building for domestic stakeholders. The project is also supporting civil society organizations to strengthen their role in countertrafficking efforts.

In Bosnia and Herzegovina, USAID supports the Ministry of Security and the Department for Combating Trafficking in Human Beings to carry out their strategy and action plan. The goal of the assistance is to strengthen the capacities of C-TIP institutions and organizations to adopt and implement more effective policies, laws, and regulations to provide better protection and assistance to the TIP victims. USAID's support will help Bosnia and Herzegovina implement 18 out of 33 strategic goals of the strategy.

In Moldova, USAID addresses trafficking issues by working to strengthen and improve the capacity of justice sector institutions to respond to the needs of victims in a more transparent and accountable manner. USAID support has improved the knowledge of judges and prosecutors to investigate and classify trafficking as well as assisted the National Institute of Justice to develop a C-TIP curriculum for in-service training of judges and prosecutors.

In Ukraine, USAID and the Department of State work to strengthen the Government of Ukraine's capacity to undertake countertrafficking work, including prosecution and prevention and reintegration assistance to victims of trafficking under the institutionalized framework of the National Referral Mechanism (NRM). Additionally, U.S. Government programs work to build local capacity and support for targeted prevention programs and strengthen the capacities of law enforcement to investigate and prosecute trafficking crimes.

Question. What current USAID missions in Ukraine have been affected by Russian aggression in the past year? Have these instances affected project design for future missions? If so, how would you address these interruptions?

Answer. Following the Maidan, USAID has strategically refocused several programs in Ukraine to respond to the rapidly changing environment in Ukraine which has been impacted by increased Russian aggression, the conflict in Ukraine's east, and the severely weakened Ukrainian economy.

For example, I understand that the USAID economic growth programming for the financial sector was affected by conditions on the ground and as the GOU reprioritized its most pressing needs. USAID has strategically considered the priorities for the current and anticipated environment and needs of the GOU, not only for the financial sector, but across sectors to ensure that assistance programs are impactful and well targeted. My understanding is that USAID has been addressing such interruptions by assessing how other programs may be able to extend assistance, considering headquarters (Washington, DC)-managed regional mechanisms, and using other tools to fill gaps and address short-term assistance needs.

Question. What role is USAID playing in providing humanitarian assistance to those areas of eastern Ukraine affected by the war? What are the biggest problems? Is more funding needed?

Answer. The presence of more than 1 million registered internally displaced persons (IDPs) in Ukraine is a major potential source of instability. Tensions emanate from competition over resources and economic opportunity, social integration of IDPs, and diminishing morale and confidence in the Ukrainian state. The lawless environment, unstable security situation, and bureaucratic restrictions have severely disrupted freedom of movement into and out of the nongovernment controlled areas (NGCAs) of Eastern Ukraine, affecting civilians' access to critical services, income, and basic goods. The elderly, persons with disabilities, families with children, and people in institutional care, many of whom are unable to flee, are extremely vulnerable. Hospitals and clinics are only partially operational due to lack of medicines, medical supplies, and personnel, as well as damage and destruction.

Although some international organizations and NGOs are currently able to operate in NGCAs, their status is precarious, in part due to the security situation and new registration requirements by separatist authorities' increasing interference by separatist authorities. The needs of the displaced population outside of the conflict zone have outstripped the response capacity of the local government and civil society and volunteer groups. IDP reception centers and local governments are overwhelmed, underresourced and underprepared for possible high levels of new arrivals. Burdensome administrative processes, challenges in replacing lost documentation, the poor state of the economy, and competition over limited resources continues to restrict the ability of IDPs to get jobs, housing, and access government IDP benefits. Further, there is a near total lack of direct service provision for survivors of gender-based violence.

To respond to these challenges, the U.S. Government has provided $61.5 million in humanitarian assistance in FY 2014 and FY 2015, including $27.4 million from USAID.

USAID has provided food, shelter, water supplies, cash resources for local procurement of food, psychosocial support, and livelihood assistance to the most vulnerable conflict-affected populations, including children, the elderly, and female-headed households.

Before the humanitarian response was fully operational, USAID helped catalyze assistance to communities responding to the displacement crisis and has since committed $10.2 million to help communities and government at the local and national level to mitigate deepened social tensions in conflict-affected communities in the east, and to increase access to information and inform public debate on the crisis. The Agency is also committing $3 million to support help Ukraine's health sector efforts in addressing psychosocial trauma and support physical rehabilitation for people with disabilities.

If confirmed, I will work with my team, and with the Congress, to assess the needs on the ground and mobilize the requisite resources.

Question. What role do you foresee USAID playing in helping Ukraine hold free and fair elections later this year? Under what conditions would USAID be able to help separatists?

Answer. I understand that USAID intends to provide assistance in training election commissions and educating voters and other stakeholders on an entirely new system for local elections. The Agency's programming will also support robust election oversight, including comprehensive monitoring by Ukrainian civil society. In the lead up to the elections, USAID has assisted and supported civil society engagement in improving election legislation and is supporting efforts to reform political and campaign finance. USAID programs encourage political parties and candidates to be more responsive to citizens and to engage more constructively with civic organizations and local officials between elections. I understand that USAID is providing approximately $3.1 million in assistance related to the upcoming local elections. Any local elections in the nongovernment controlled areas in the east would have to be conducted according to Ukrainian law and OSCE/ODIHR standards.

Question. How is USAID working to help Ukraine achieve an independent and effective judicial system?

Answer. USAID has been working with the Government of Ukraine (GOU) to develop an independent and efficient judicial system, by supporting judicial self-governance in Ukraine to help insulate the judiciary from political influence. This includes budget independence, disciplining of judges, judicial education, as well as the development of court administration functions. I understand that USAID has supported amendments to the Law on the Judiciary and the Status of Judges and the Law on the High Council of Justice. Additionally, USAID supports efforts to strengthen the institutional capacity of the High Qualifications Commission by supporting clear standards for transferring judges; automating the judicial qualifications exam; training judicial inspectors and establishing standards for adjudicating judicial misconduct; and developing an integrated system for managing judicial selection and discipline procedures. All of these efforts are aimed at helping Ukraine develop an independent and effective judicial system.

In 2015, several notable achievements have occurred in the sector, many of which were directly supported by USAID assistance: the Verkhovna Rada passed the Law on Fair Trial, signed into law in March 2015; the GOU passed the Justice Sector Reform Strategy in May 2015; the High Council of Justice is now operational again as of June 2015, after being blocked for over a year, and is proceeding to consider a backlog of cases regarding approval of transfer, reprimand, and dismissal of judges; and the judiciary amendments to the constitution have been drafted and the Venice Commission issued a preliminary opinion on July 24 positively assessing the judicial amendments to the constitution with some key recommendations to further improve these amendments. The success of these current interventions will be both the foundations for genuine rule of law reform, and serve as indicators for progress, such as judiciary amendments to the constitution, and the GOU's ability to reform core judicial functions and roles, including lustration of judges and limiting judicial immunity.

Question. Given that Ukraine's current natural gas exchange with Gazprom, as well as imports from Poland, Hungary, and Slovakia, is a temporary solution at best, what is USAID doing to address the short-term "reverse-flow" supply shortage of natural gas?

Answer. USAID support to Ukraine is part of a broad U.S. interagency and multidonor effort that balances near term priorities with longer term development needs, focusing on areas of greatest impact. The Department of Energy and the State Department Energy and Natural Resources Bureau are focused on improved natural gas production and alternative supply arrangements.

USAID continues to focus on near term activities to lessen external energy market pressure on Ukraine, specifically through the stabilization of Ukraine's power sector in light of external pressure on fuel supply; and providing legal regulatory support to move Ukraine into European Union energy markets and offering protections associated with inclusion in a larger market.

My understanding is that medium- to long-term activities focus on setting the groundwork for Ukraine to upgrade its energy sector to modern standards, specifically through improving the investment environment necessary for energy supply diversification and energy efficiency; and improving energy sector governance to help curb corrupt practices and wasteful mismanagement.

Question. In the latest USAID-Department of State (DOS) joint strategic plan, USAID and DOS list Strategic Goal 3 as promoting a transition to "low-emission, climate resilient" energy projects. Considering the dire economic situation in Ukraine, Kosovo, Bosnia, and Herzegovina and others, as well as the precarious energy situation in light of Russian energy dependence and aggression, do you see this as a viable economic goal for these countries? What research is USAID doing to compare the immediate cost-benefit and investment necessary for pursuing "green" technologies over other more cost-effective sources of power that could help jumpstart these economies?

Answer. USAID seeks to support the mutually reinforcing goals of enhanced energy security, EU integration, and accelerated transition to a sustainable, clean energy economy throughout the region, following five key tenets:

1. Diversification of energy imports and domestic supplies is essential to reduce vulnerability to potential disruptions.
2. Integrated regional electricity and gas networks and markets are needed to enhance security, foster energy development, and tap economies of scale.
3. Rational energy pricing and harmonized, transparent energy regulatory frameworks are required to attract private investment to modernize energy infrastructure and develop new supplies.
4. Improved energy efficiency and renewable energy development can contribute to enhancing energy security as well as increased competitiveness, sustainable economic growth and GHG emissions reduction.
5. Addressing the energy needs of low income and vulnerable populations is a necessary component of an overall energy reform program.

USAID works toward these objectives through support of the Energy Community Treaty, which seeks to harmonize energy and environmental practices and regulations of the Contracting Parties of the Balkans and Eastern Europe countries with those of the European Union. Accomplishing this goal would modernize energy governance in the E&E region and link E&E countries to the EU internal energy market, enhancing energy security and encouraging investment, regardless of the chosen electric generation technology.

Question. Kosovo has suffered from shortcomings in the rule of law, including corruption and organized crime. What role is USAID playing to help Kosovo in this area? What results have been achieved?

Answer. USAID has been supporting Kosovo's justice sector since Kosovo gained its de facto independence from the former Yugoslav Republic. USAID helped establish the Kosovo Judicial Council (KJC) and worked to support the Kosovo Prosecutorial Council, Kosovo Judicial Institute, Ministry of Justice and other justice sector institutions. The Agency played a key role in the process of judicial reappointments and vetting of judges in Kosovo. Through its efforts with the KJC, USAID has helped the Kosovar judiciary develop objective and transparent performance criteria to allow judges to do their work more effectively and efficiently. The Agency has also been working to reduce the backlog of cases in Kosovo, introduce more effective case management techniques, and professionalize the cadre of court administrators and managers. By introducing more transparent and streamlined court and case management techniques, USAID has helped to reduce opportunities for corruption in the judiciary in Kosovo. For example, I understand that through one USAID program the KJC drafted and approved its first strategic plan since 2007, providing the courts a roadmap to improve the work and independence of the judiciary and implemented a backlog reduction strategy, including a case tracking database to register all current and pending court cases. Over 20,000 cases have been reviewed and over 5,000 cases have been closed. In addition, 18 courts have been refurbished in compliance with international standards, significantly increasing court staff efficiency, public accessibility, and accommodation for persons with disabilities.

Question. How do USAID programs help the nation of Georgia reduce its economic and energy dependence on Russia?

Answer. My understanding is that USAID's programs in Georgia are oriented around the goal of strengthening and sustaining a democratic, free-market, Western-oriented transformation in that country. Specific components of the Economic Growth program seek to improve the business enabling environment for trade and investment and strengthen ties with the West. This includes support for harmonization of Georgia's laws and regulations with its Deep and Comprehensive Free Trade Agreement (DCFTA) with the European Union, promotion of East-West trade via the New Silk Road linking the Black Sea to Central and East Asia, and development of policies and regulations in the energy sector to promote energy security and regional trade of electricity.

Contributions by USAID and other donors have helped Georgia to reduce its dependency on Russia in the areas of fossil fuels, oil and gas, through the establishment of the Southern Corridor for oil and gas. Over the last decade USAID/Georgia installed gas pipelines from Azerbaijan; built electricity infrastructure; leveraged hundreds of millions of dollars in private financing for hydropower generation; and built the capacity of the Ministry of Energy, the energy regulator, the Transmission System Operators and other stakeholders to assess, model, plan, and implement all the steps necessary to set up an open electricity market. Current assistance is devoted to increasing energy efficiency.

In the gas sector, by laying pipeline to transport gas from Azerbaijan through Georgia, the country has already decreased its reliance on Russian exports. In 2013 Georgia imported 27 percent less gas from Russian and 1,052 percent more gas from Azerbaijan than it had in 2010 when USAID assistance began.

In the electricity sector, USAID is helping transition the country into an open-market system in which Georgia is able to trade freely with Turkey. By opening the Georgian market to Turkey, Georgia will be able to access the wider European market for exports of its native hydrogeneration resources, and in so doing, will invite increased foreign, likely European, investments in hydrogeneration within its borders—and decrease dependency on Russian trade. Increased hydrogeneration capacity within Georgia and a direct connection to European markets will significantly decrease, if not eliminate, the country's remaining reliance on Russian electricity markets.

Question. Is Georgia making progress in creating an independent judiciary? How is USAID helping Georgia develop a depoliticized judicial system?

Answer. I believe that Georgia is making progress to create a more independent judiciary, but challenges remain to further strengthen its judiciary. USAID has played a leadership role in supporting Georgia's efforts to develop an independent judicial system for more than a decade. Specifically, USAID efforts have strengthened the High Council of Justice (HCOJ), the High School of Justice (HSOJ), as well as the Ministry of Justice (MOJ), the Legal Aid Service (LAS), and the National Center for the Development of the Quality in Education (NCDQE). Institutional independence of the judiciary insulates judges from political influence and coercion. I understand that USAID has engaged with a number of prominent NGOs, such as the Eurasia Partnership Foundation (EPF) and its affiliate the Caucasus Resource Research Center (CRRC), as well as the Georgian Young Lawyers Association (GYLA), and Transparency International (TI) to provide external oversight of the judiciary and make the system more transparent to the public and reduce opportunities for abuse and corruption. Most recently, the composition of the High Council of Justice was changed to bring in members of civil society, which reduces political control of the Chair of the Supreme Court.

Question. What lessons can USAID learn from programs in Georgia in the wake of Russian aggression that it could apply to Ukraine?

Answer. My understanding is that USAID's efforts in Georgia have informed how USAID addresses similar challenges in Ukraine. In response to a crisis like we saw in Georgia in 2008 and in Ukraine today, timely, coordinated assistance, based on an assessment of needs can have powerful and lasting impacts. For example, USG contributions to economic stabilization in Georgia, combined with those of other partners, likely prevented a much deeper and more drawn out economic decline, in the face of both conflict and global recession. Years later, beneficiaries are aware and appreciative of U.S. emergency humanitarian and long-term development assistance.

One of the greatest challenges facing Ukraine is the legacy of corruption. Georgia has demonstrated that the best way to fight corruption is to get out in front of the problem and put in place systems for transparency and proactive disclosure of information. USAID has been instrumental in helping to put many of these systems into place. This includes strengthening the professionalism of the State Audit Office so that it can exercise its independence, working with the Ministry of Justice to enhance freedom of information requirements, expanding the use of open government data through Georgia's open data portal, helping the Competition and State Procurement Agency stand up a Dispute Resolution Board, and setting the stage for a new civil service legal framework based on open competition and consistent standards. Many of these activities were coupled with grants to civil society to monitor compliance and hold government accountable to its promises.

Question. What is your opinion of USAID Forward and other reform efforts? If so, how do you see these reforms being implemented in Eastern European and Eurasian nations specifically?

Answer. I understand that USAID has implemented a series of reforms over the last several years, known collectively as USAID Forward. By all accounts, these reforms have strengthened the Agency's focus on results, partnership, and innovation over the past 5 years. USAID now has in place a rigorous and transparent process for designing strategies and projects while evaluating their achievement of results in a more focused and selective manner. Its partnership agenda has grown substantially. USAID's direct partnering with local actors and local systems, which has almost doubled since 2010, reflects the Agency's commitment to creating processes whereby countries own, resource, and sustain their development. It has also increased its emphasis on innovative approaches through the use of science, technology and open innovation.

Regarding implementation of USAID Forward in Europe and Eurasia, I understand that efforts are furthering collaboration among external partners, leveraging additional resources, and increasing innovation through two Science, Technology, Innovation and Partnership (STIP) leader Missions. Public-private partnerships in the region are highly leveraged and direct support to local organizations has increased tremendously.

Additionally, USAID's development projects are designed with monitoring mechanisms at the forefront, allowing for objective evidence-based evaluations of development projects and for ensuring a responsible use of resources. Evaluations are used in the region to not only track progress and results, but to provide evidence that will inform management decisions for improvements that are needed, and to inform follow on or future programming.

Question. Specifically, what is your plan for implementing "local solutions" to promote country ownership while also ensuring reasonable accountability measures? Do you believe these two goals are compatible for Ukraine in its current state?

Answer. I understand that USAID is committed to enabling countries to lead, resource, and sustain their own development. This is a commitment I share and, if confirmed, will prioritize in Europe and Eurasia. I agree that country ownership should be at the core of how USAID does business. At the same time, USAID should and does exercise robust oversight and maintain appropriate fiduciary controls to safeguard taxpayer dollars and ensure prudent investments with an increased emphasis on solid project design with clear purpose and measures of progress and evidence-based monitoring and evaluation.

With regard to Ukraine specifically, my understanding is that USAID integrates anticorruption activities into every project design in Ukraine. For example, anticorruption measures are included in programs to support the judiciary, education, health/pharmaceutical procurement, e-governance, permitting, financial disclosure, and energy, agriculture, and economic development.

After many years of false starts, under the current government in Kiev, the world is beginning to see progress on implementation of anticorruption reforms in Ukraine. More than a dozen key pieces of legislation have been passed, including laws to establish the National Anti-Corruption Bureau (NABU) and the National Anti-Corruption Prevention Agency (NAPC). The Ukrainian government is in the process of standing up these two agencies, which are critical to fighting corruption.

USAID has bolstered monitoring and independent evaluations in the region by organizing monitoring workshops for implementing partner staff, and contracting for independent evaluations of its programs to ensure intended impact, including three such evaluations in Ukraine last year. If confirmed, I will build on these efforts to strengthen the monitoring and evaluation of Agency programming, including in Ukraine.

Question. Historically, some have cited tensions between USAID and the Department of State, stating that USAID efforts are often supplanted by the diplomatic imperatives of DOS. Do you feel this is the case? If so, other than publishing the joint strategic plan every 5 years, how else do you plan to work with DOS to ensure that USAID missions are not sidelined?

Answer. All agencies report to the President of the United States and seek to implement his articulated policies. While each agency has its distinct role to play, I believe that the inevitable tensions that emerge in large organizations can be effectively mitigated and minimized through personal diplomacy and a tone of collaboration and complementarity that is set by senior officials. During my time at the Department of State, from 2010 to 2015, I actively reached out to USAID and to other agencies—including the Department of Defense, the Department of Justice, and of course, the National Security Council staff—to ensure that funded programs and diplomatic initiatives were mutually understood and reinforced. This included joint missions to a number of countries in the E&E region, including with the previous Assistant Administrator, Paige Alexander, and other counterparts across the U.S. Government. These visits were, in my opinion, valuable in enhancing collaboration and finding an appropriate balance between diplomatic imperatives and development goals. If confirmed, I hope to continue this practice with colleagues at the Department of State and other U.S. agencies.

The committee met, pursuant to notice, at 2:04 p.m., in room SD-419, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Hon. Jeff Flake presiding.
Present: Senators Flake, Gardner, Murphy, and Markey.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. JEFF FLAKE, U.S. SENATOR FROM ARIZONA

Senator FLAKE. This hearing of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee will come to order.

Thank you all for being here. It is nice to see the nominees and family members, as well. That is always the best part.

Today, we have ambassadorial nominees for Benin, Togo, Central African Republic, Tunisia, and The Gambia. These are all important and challenging posts, to put it mildly. I look forward to hearing from today's nominees about how diplomatic engagement can help build positive economic and political trends in Benin and Togo, and how to address ongoing challenges that we have in Tunisia, which is often said to be, as we spoke about yesterday, the most successful democratic transition of those who were involved in the Arab Spring.

If confirmed, the Ambassador-designate will mark the return of the U.S. Ambassador to Bangui, following a 2-year gap. That is significant. I look forward to hearing how U.S. interests, including stability, can be advanced in the complex environment, certainly, in Central Africa.

Finally, the committee is eager to hear about the best way to go forward in The Gambia as well.

I look forward to all of you sharing your expertise.

Senator Markey is voting and will come back here shortly, but we will go ahead and get started. I am glad to have Senator Gardner here. I know he has to leave shortly, but I appreciate his interest.

The first nominee is Lucy Tamlyn. Ms. Tamlyn is a career Foreign Service officer with the Foreign Service and currently is serving as director in the Office of Special Envoy for Sudan and South Sudan. Ms. Tamlyn has served in a wide range of overseas positions, including Deputy Chief of Mission in Lisbon, economic consular at the U.S. mission in the OECD in Paris, Provincial Reconstruction team leader in Iraq. And Ms. Tamlyn also served as Deputy Chief of Mission in Chad.

So glad to have you here.

Our second nominee is David Gilmour. Mr. Gilmour is a career Foreign Service officer and currently serves as Deputy Assistant Secretary in the Bureau of African Affairs. Previously, Mr. Gilmour led the Africa Bureau's Public Diplomacy Office. Mr. Gilmour's numerous overseas assignments include Deputy Chief of Mission in Panama City, Panama, and in Malawi as well.

Jeffrey Hawkins is our third nominee today. He is a career member of the Foreign Service also, most recently consul general in Lagos, Nigeria. Prior to that assignment, he was director of the South and Central Asian Affairs Office in the Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor. He served in a number of overseas assignments, as you all have, including Deputy Chief of Mission in Angola, Brunei, and political economic chief at the U.S. Embassy in Kabul, Afghanistan.

Daniel Rubinstein is a career Foreign Service officer as well. He most recently served as Special Envoy for Syria, a place without any problems at all, so thank you for your service there. That is the position that he has held since 2014. Previously, he served as Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of State in the Bureau of Intelligence and Research. Mr. Rubinstein's overseas leadership positions include serving as consul general in Jerusalem, chief of the Civilian Observer Unit in the Sinai in Egypt, and Deputy Chief of Mission in Amman, Jordan. He also served as director of the Office of Israel and Palestinian Affairs.

Finally, we have Carolyn Patricia Alsup, a career member of the Foreign Service. Ms. Alsup also served recently as Deputy Chief of Mission in Ghana. Previously, she led the Office of Central African Affairs and Deputy Chief of Mission in The Gambia. So this will be a return trip for you, if confirmed. Ms. Alsup also held a number of positions in economic affairs at the State Department, including serving as executive assistant of the Economic Bureau and special assistant in the Office of Under Secretary of Economics, Business and Agricultural Affairs.

Thank you all for being here, and I appreciate your service and meeting with you before. I am just amazed at the sacrifices that you made and that your families have made as well.

I appreciate having family members here. I hope that you will introduce them as you begin your remarks.

And we will recognize Lucy Tamlyn first.

STATEMENT OF LUCY TAMLYN, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF BENIN

Ms. TAMLYN. Thank you. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it is a great honor for me to appear before you today. I am grateful to President Obama and Secretary Kerry for the confidence they have placed in me as their nominee for Ambassador to the Republic of Benin.

My husband, Jorge Serpa, is here today, representing many far-flung family members, especially our children, Ben and Filipa. Unexpected evacuations and long separations have not dampened their enthusiasm or the pride they take in being part of the Foreign Service family. I know that I could not have come this far without their support.

I joined the Foreign Service in 1982 and have served in positions of increasing responsibility across three continents, including three assignments with the Bureau of African Affairs.

Working alongside of, and learning from, extraordinary colleagues and leaders in the State Department, I have gained the experience and the understanding, which, if confirmed, will enable me to faithfully represent and advance U.S. interests in Benin.

Mr. Chairman, Benin is a strong partner of the United States. The people of Benin are justly proud of their democratic traditions and record of peaceful transfers of power. President Thomas Boni Yayi, serving his second and final 5-year term, was invited by President Obama in 2011 to the White House as one of four African Presidents representing Africa's democratic progress, which, as President Obama stated at the time, is vital to a stable and prosperous Africa, and also critical to the stability and prosperity of the world.

With 50 percent of the Beninese population under 18 years of age, Benin is a vibrant and dynamic nation rich in culture, history, and potential. We partner with the Government of Benin to provide a helping hand to support the inclusive economic growth, which is the centerpiece of the country's own poverty reduction strategy, and which will enable the people of Benin to achieve a better future for themselves and their families.

Our largest assistance program targets malaria, a disease which is particularly deadly for the young and which takes an enormous economic toll on the economy.

Benin is on track to receive a second Millennium Challenge Compact, a reflection of its ability to sustain high rankings in the MCC's political, economic, and social indicators, and to muster the political will to address shortcomings when those rankings slip.

U.S. investment in Benin through the Millennium Challenge Account will help address energy shortfalls, which are a serious impediment to economic growth.

Benin is a strong regional partner on other fronts. It has stood with its neighbors to confront the horrors of Boko Haram and is a member of the Lake Chad Basin Multinational Joint Task Force, to which it has pledged a battalion.

The government partners with the United States and other international donors to combat drug trafficking, piracy, and maritime crime.

Our shared human rights values are reflected in the stands that Benin takes in international fora and its multiple contributions to peacekeeping operations worldwide, including in Cote d'Ivoire, Mali, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

But challenges remain internally and externally for Benin. Robust economic growth is essential to meet the needs of the people. But despite considerable efforts on the part of President Yayi's government, extreme poverty and corruption remain serious obstacles to achieving development goals.

The country is vulnerable to economic shocks, particularly emanating from larger economies in the region. Transnational organized crime can flourish where borders are porous and thinly surveilled, and where corruption corrodes the rule of law.

And finally, extremist violence threatens Benin's near neighbors, where perpetrators of such violence find recruits in disenfranchised and vulnerable communities.

My priorities, if confirmed, will be to identify those areas where U.S. partnership can assist the government and people of Benin continue as a beacon of democracy, stability, peace, and tolerance in the region. I will seek to further strengthen the ties of friendship and understanding with the people of Benin. And I will look for ways to advance U.S. interests for the benefit of the American people through a partnership with Benin, which bolsters the fight against transnational organized crime and enables us to stand together for shared values internationally.

Benin has welcomed more than 2,000 Peace Corps Volunteers over the years, and in the truest spirit of partnership, these Volunteers have given much and received much from the host communities in which they worked.

Kate Puzey was one such Volunteer whose life was tragically cut short, but whose memory very much endures. If confirmed, one of my highest priorities will be to continue to work with the Government of Benin for justice for Kate Puzey and our family.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, for the opportunity to address you today. I am very happy to take any questions that you may have.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Tamlyn follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF LUCY TAMLYN

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it is a great honor for me to appear before you today. I am grateful to President Obama and Secretary Kerry for the confidence they have placed in me as their nominee for Ambassador to the Republic of Benin.

My husband, Jorge Serpa, is here today representing many far-flung family members, especially our children, Ben and Filipa. STATEMENT OF DAVID R. GILMOUR, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE TOGOLESE REPUBLIC

Mr. GILMOUR. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have submitted a longer version of my statement for the record.

Mr. Chairman, I am honored to appear before you today, and I am grateful to President Obama and Secretary Kerry for the confidence they have placed in me as their nominee for Ambassador to Togo. I am also grateful for the support of Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Linda Thomas-Greenfield.

I am joined today by my wife, Judith Martin, who has spent a lifetime in the Foreign Service, first with her father, S. Douglas Martin, a career State Department officer, and her mother, Pauline, and later as my cherished partner as we traveled the world and raised our family in eight overseas posts and in Washington during my 29 years in the Foreign Service.

Also, here is our son, Tristan. Our other two children, Miles and Schyler, are watching online from Texas.

I would also like to acknowledge my father, John Gilmour, who could not be here today. He worked for 34 years in local government, proudly serving the citizens of the small town in Michigan where I grew up. Everything I know about integrity, treating people with respect, and dedication to public service, I learned from my dad.

Mr. Chairman, I believe my service in four African posts and in senior positions in Washington, as well as postings elsewhere in the world, including as Deputy Chief of Mission in Panama, have prepared me for this assignment. If confirmed, I will draw upon these experiences to advance U.S. interests in Togo and the West African region.

The United States and Togo enjoy a strong relationship and broad mutual interests. Togo lies at the heart of West Africa, a region that is important to the security of the United States, and to which the United States has long-standing economic and cultural ties.

Mr. Chairman, our policy priorities in Togo are to safeguard the welfare of American citizens, promote democracy and good governance, improve maritime security in the Gulf of Guinea, promote human rights, combat transnational crime, advance commercial opportunities for U.S. business, and improve the quality of health care and education.

Togo is recovering from 15 years of political and economic isolation that began in the early 1990s due to political instability. The country's long cycle of decline ended in 2007, following largely free and fair legislative elections.

The political situation has stabilized over the past few years, and successive elections were recognized by the international community as free and fair, despite some shortfalls.

Most recently, Presidential elections in April of this year were judged credible by international observers, and the United States congratulated the people of Togo for exercising their democratic rights.

The country is presently at peace. Should I be confirmed, I will work to maintain a peaceful, transparent, and fair political climate, thereby consolidating and expanding on the democratic gains of the past several years.

Togo has been a willing partner in advancing security in West Africa and beyond. If confirmed, I look forward to helping enhance Togo's ability to police and regulate the Gulf of Guinea and to expand their capacity to train and deploy peacekeepers, as they have successfully done in Mali, Darfur, Cote d'Ivoire, and many other conflicts.

If confirmed, I will strongly support Togo's efforts to address the challenges of corruption, wildlife trafficking, smuggling, and trafficking in persons, which also threaten the national interests of the United States.

The Government of Togo recognizes that improving the investment climate is key to sustained economic growth and eliminating poverty. If confirmed, I will support reforms that promote investment and provide opportunities for American companies. I will work to strengthen Togo's developing role as a regional trade and transportation hub, and encourage Togolese entrepreneurs to take full advantage of the opportunities provided by AGOA.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for this opportunity to address you. If confirmed, I look forward to working with you in representing the interests of the American people in Togo. I am happy to answer any questions. Thank you.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF DAVID R. GILMOUR

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am honored to appear before you today, and grateful to President Obama and Secretary Kerry for the confidence they have placed in me as their nominee for Ambassador to Togo. I am also grateful for the support of Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Linda Thomas-Greenfield.

I am joined today by my wife, Judith Martin, who has spent a lifetime in the Foreign Service, first with her father, S. Douglas Martin, a career State Department officer, and later as my cherished partner as we traveled the world together and raised our family in eight overseas posts and in Washington during the 29 years of my Foreign Service career. Also here is our son, Tristan. Our other two children, Miles and Schyler, will be watching online from Texas. I would also like to acknowledge my father, John Gilmour, who could not be here today. He worked 34 years in local government, serving the citizens of the small town where I grew up in Michigan. Everything I know about respect, integrity, and dedication to public service, I learned from my dad.

Mr. Chairman, I believe my service in four African posts and in senior positions in the Bureau of African Affairs in Washington, as well as postings elsewhere in the world, including as Deputy Chief of Mission in Panama, have prepared me for this assignment. If confirmed, I will draw upon these experiences to advance U.S. interests in Togo and the West African region.

The United States and Togo enjoy a strong relationship and broad mutual interests. With a population of nearly 7 million inhabitants, Togo lies at the heart of West Africa, a region that is important to the security of the United States, and to which the United States has long-standing cultural ties. If confirmed, I will do my utmost to broaden and strengthen our mutual pursuit of this shared agenda.

Mr. Chairman, our policy priorities in Togo are to safeguard the welfare of American citizens, promote a representative democracy and good governance, improve maritime security in the Gulf of Guinea, promote human rights, improve the capacity to combat transnational crime, advance commercial opportunities for U.S. businesses, and improve the quality of health care and education. To achieve these goals, the United States has a range of programs supporting public health, security sector reform, international peacekeeping and economic development. If confirmed, I commit to working closely with our international partners to help Togo promote empowerment and prosperity for all Togolese, regardless of their ethnic, religious, regional or political affiliations.

The United States established diplomatic relations with Togo in 1960 following its independence from a French-administered trusteeship. Togo is recovering from 15 years of political and economic isolation that began in the early 1990s due to political instability. Togo's long cycle of decline ended in 2007, following largely free and fair legislative elections. The political situation has stabilized over the past few years, and Presidential and legislative elections, held in 2010 and 2013, respectively, were recognized by the international community as free and fair, despite some shortfalls. Most recently, April's Presidential elections were judged credible by international observers, and the United States congratulated the people of Togo for exercising their democratic rights before, during, and after the vote. The country is presently at peace. Should I be confirmed, one of Embassy Lomé's top priorities will be to support and maintain a peaceful, transparent, and fair political climate, thereby consolidating and expanding on the democratic gains of the past several years.

A stable, peaceful, and prosperous Togo serves American interests and expands Togo's ability to contribute to regional stability. The United States maintains a good relationship with the Togolese military, which has been a willing partner in key areas such as maritime security and international peacekeeping. If confirmed, I look forward to maintaining our strong partnership with Togolese security officials to effectively police and regulate Togolese waters in the Gulf of Guinea. Additionally, if confirmed I hope to strengthen Togo's capacity to engage in peacekeeping missions through the Africa Contingency Operations Training and Assistance program, which has been active in Togo since 2009, and has assisted with the training and deployment of Togolese peacekeeping forces to Mali, Darfur, Cote d'Ivoire, Liberia, Burundi, Sudan, Chad, and the Central African Republic. Also, beginning in 2013, the Government of Togo has stepped up its effort to curb wildlife trafficking, making several seizures and arrests. The United States is providing technical expertise and material support to help the Togolese law enforcement community overcome this rising challenge. If confirmed, I look forward to maintaining our strong partnership with the Togolese on this issue.

Poverty continues to breed corruption and crime, smuggling, and trafficking in persons. If confirmed, I will support Togo's efforts to address these challenges, which also threaten the national interests of the United States. The Government of Togo recognizes that an improving but still challenging investment climate and a developing but still weak private sector are key impediments to Togo's prospects for sustained economic growth, and eliminating poverty. If confirmed, I will take advantage of available initiatives to promote a healthy economy, including identification of public-private partnerships that include American companies and that enjoy United States Government guarantees. The Embassy will look to use regional programs offered through the U.S. Agency for International Development to strengthen Togo's developing role as a regional trade hub, as well as to help ensure that the country makes the most of Lomé's deep-water port, which is a significant contributor to the Togolese economy. If confirmed, I will encourage the Togolese Government and Togolese entrepreneurs to take full advantages of the opportunities and preferences provided by AGOA.

Development assistance to Togo provided through the U.S. Agency for International Development focuses primarily on improving Togo's national public health capacity; USAID's West African Regional Health Office runs multiple health programs in Togo, including HIV/AIDS prevention. Through the Department of Defense's HIV/AIDS Prevention Program monitored by Embassy Lomé, 50 newborns were born free of HIV to HIV-positive mothers last year. This year that program has been expanded to include 150 mothers. If confirmed, I will look to employ such existing initiatives, including the multilateral partnership of the Global Fund to Fight Aids, Tuberculosis and Malaria (GFATM), to assist the Togolese Ministry of Health in improving basic public health programs and treating and eradicating disease. The Embassy in Lomé will also continue to support a robust Peace Corps presence in country with a programmatic focus on health, especially on HIV/AIDS awareness and prevention.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman and distinguished members of the committee, for this opportunity to address you. If confirmed, I look forward to working with you in representing the interests of the American people in Togo. I am happy to answer any questions you have.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

Mr. Hawkins.

STATEMENT OF JEFFREY J. HAWKINS, JR., NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

Mr. HAWKINS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am honored to appear before you today as the President's nominee to be the next Ambassador of the United States to the Central African Republic. I thank President Obama and Secretary Kerry for entrusting me with this important responsibility.

If confirmed, I will work with Congress to advance the interests of the United States in the Central African Republic.

Joining me here today is my wife, Annie. I am deeply grateful to Annie and to our small children, Max and Alex, for allowing me this opportunity to serve my country, despite the hardships and sacrifices that it will require of them.

Mr. Chairman, the Central African Republic, a Texas-sized nation in the heart of Africa, is blessed with an abundance of natural resources and a resilient and entrepreneurial people. Sadly, however, cycles of conflict have roiled that nation for decades.

Beginning in late 2012, the Central African Republic saw its latest and certainly its worst such cycle. Conflict left thousands dead and hundreds of thousands displaced. Armed factions, including foreign groups like the heinous Lord's Resistance Army, controlled large swathes of its territory. The picture, frankly, was bleak.

Mr. Chairman, a transitional government, with strong support from the international community and the United States Government, is taking the first, difficult steps toward peace. If confirmed, my primary objective will be to support this process.

We have a strong interest in CAR's success. A successful transition will help forestall a return to anarchy and atrocities on victim populations. A successful transition also will assist in preventing extremist and trafficking groups from using the country's ungoverned spaces for their own nefarious purposes.

Finally, it will also aid in reducing regional instability.

The people of the Central African Republic are clearly ready for a new beginning. Earlier this year, they gathered together in grassroots consultations to speak about their hopes for their nation's future. Armed groups agreed to halt the use of child soldiers and committed to stopping violent conflict.

The country's political transition will culminate later this year with a constitutional referendum and elections.

The international community provides key support to this process. In particular, the U.N. Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in the Central African Republic, MINUSCA, has operated in the country since September 2014. Nearly 10,000 U.N. peacekeepers and some 900 French troops provide the security backbone for this deployment.

The United States has made a real commitment to the positive change we are beginning to see in the Central African Republic. Over the past 2 years, we have contributed some $800 million to assist at-risk populations, underwrite the U.N. effort, reform the justice sector, aid the electoral process, and encourage peace-building and reconciliation.

In September of last year, with support of the Congress, we reopened our Embassy after nearly 2 years of closure.

Mr. Chairman, we may not have a better opportunity to break the cycles of conflict in CAR. If confirmed as Ambassador, I will ensure that U.S. resources are used appropriately. I believe my deep experience in Africa, years working in post-conflict environments like Afghanistan, and strong Foreign Service leadership credentials will be useful in promoting U.S. Government interests there.

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, I thank you for this opportunity to appear before you today, and welcome any questions you might have.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Hawkins follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF JEFFREY J. HAWKINS, JR.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am honored to appear before you today as the President's nominee to be the next Ambassador of the United States to the Central African Republic. I thank President Obama and Secretary Kerry for entrusting me with this important responsibility. If confirmed, I will work with Congress to advance the interests of the United States in the Central African Republic.

Joining me here today are my wife, Annie, and our children, Max, 5, and Alex, 3. Regrettably, security conditions do not permit families to join our diplomats working in Bangui. I am deeply grateful to Annie and the boys for allowing me this opportunity to serve my country, despite the hardships and sacrifices that it will require of them.

Mr. Chairman, the Central African Republic, a Texas-sized nation in the heart of Africa, is blessed with an abundance of natural resources and a resilient and entrepreneurial population.

Sadly, however, cycles of conflict and political instability have roiled that nation for more than 30 years. Beginning in late 2012, the Central African Republic saw its latest, and worst, such cycle. Regional and ethnic conflict left thousands dead and hundreds of thousands displaced. Armed factions, including foreign groups like the heinous Lord's Resistance Army, controlled large swathes of its territory. The picture, frankly, was bleak.

Mr. Chairman, there is now reason for hope in the Central African Republic. A transitional government—with strong support from the international community and the United States Government—is taking the first, difficult steps toward peace.

If confirmed, my primary objective will be to support this process. Should this process succeed, a newly peaceful and democratic Central African Republic will face many serious challenges. We have a strong interest in CAR's success. A successful transition will help forestall a return to anarchy and atrocities on victim populations. The transition also will assist in preventing extremist and criminal trafficking groups from using the country's ungoverned spaces for their own nefarious purposes and in reducing regional instability. A successful transition will put the people of CAR in a position to rebuild their lives and build a better nation themselves.

The people of the Central African Republic are clearly ready for a new beginning. Earlier this year, Central Africans gathered together, in grassroots consultations known as the Bangui Forum, to speak about their hopes for their nation's future. At the forum, armed groups agreed to halt the use of child soldiers and committed to stopping violent conflict. Voter registration began in June and continues to expand throughout the country. The country's political transition will culminate later this year with a constitutional referendum and elections.

The international community provides key support to this process. In particular, the U.N. Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in the Central African Republic—MINUSCA—has operated in the country since September 2014, to reinforce the transition and protect civilian populations. Nearly 10,000 U.N. peacekeepers and approximately 900 French troops provide a security backbone for this deployment.

The United States has made a real commitment to the positive change in the Central African Republic. Over the past 2 years, we have contributed over $800 million to assist at-risk populations, underwrite the U.N. effort, reform the justice sector, aid the electoral process, and encourage peace-building and reconciliation. In September of last year, with support of the Congress, we reopened our Embassy after nearly 2 years; the Embassy is a vital platform for oversight of our operations and I want to recognize here the extraordinary efforts of our team on the ground in Bangui.

Mr. Chairman, we may not have a better opportunity to break the cycles of conflict in CAR. If confirmed as Ambassador, I will ensure that U.S. resources are used appropriately so that they will contribute effectively to sustainable change in the Central African Republic. I believe my deep experience in Africa, years working in post-conflict environments like Afghanistan, and strong Foreign Service leadership credentials will be useful in promoting U.S. Government interests there.

In closing, I would like to express particular thanks to the outstanding team currently serving at Embassy Bangui for their courage and fortitude in leading our engagement in the Central African Republic.

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, I thank you for this opportunity to appear before you today, and welcome any questions you may have.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.
Mr. Rubinstein.

STATEMENT OF DANIEL H. RUBINSTEIN, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF TUNISIA

Mr. RUBINSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, I am honored to appear before you as President Obama's nominee to be the next Ambassador to the Republic of Tunisia.

I would also like to thank Secretary Kerry for placing his trust in me to manage the relationship with this important partner, and recently designated Major Non-NATO Ally.

Before I begin, I would also like to take a moment to recognize and thank my family, my wife, Julie, and our children, Jonah and Simon. They have provided unconditional love and constant support throughout my career.

Mr. Chairman, I have had the honor of serving as a Foreign Service officer for the last 26 years, much of it in the Middle East, including 1 year in Tunisia. My previous assignments have provided me with an extensive background in economic and counter-terrorism issues that are critical to our partnership with Tunisia.

While my time in Tunisia was before the 2011 revolution, I maintain an abiding respect and admiration for the country, its culture, and its people. If confirmed as U.S. Ambassador to Tunisia, I pledge to work with my colleagues in the executive and legislative branches of our government to advance our national interests and deepen this partnership.

During President Caid Essebsi's visit to Washington in May, President Obama affirmed the enduring partnership between the United States and Tunisia based on both mutual interests and shared values. Tunisia's democratic progress is an important counterpoint to those who assert that Islam and the Arab world are somehow incompatible with democracy.

Chairman Flake, let me assure you that during these challenging times, I am deeply cognizant that the number one priority of an Ambassador is the safety of Americans abroad. If confirmed, I assure you that I will carefully monitor the security environment as I seek to advance our diplomatic objectives, with no higher responsibility than ensuring the security of all U.S. citizens in Tunisia and all personnel under my charge.

In addition to keeping this commitment in mind, I will also continue to be mindful that this is a critical time in our engagement with Tunisia.

Since the 2011 revolution, Tunisia has taken remarkable and inspiring steps to build an accountable and representative democracy. But despite historic legislative and Presidential elections in 2014, the democratic transition and the country's security remain fragile.

In recent months, Tunisia has endured two horrific terrorist attacks that threaten the progress so many Tunisians have fought for since Mohamed Bouazizi set himself alight in Sidi Bouzid and thus sparked the Arab Spring.

Those vile attacks on innocent tourists and Tunisian citizens underline the enormous security challenges facing Tunisia. The reasons for radicalization are many but what is clear is that high levels of youth unemployment, feelings of marginalization, and instability in Libya are exploited by those who wish to undercut Tunisia's progress in the name of radicalism and barbaric violence.

If confirmed, I will work with my colleagues across the U.S. Government to direct resources to increasing the capacity of Tunisian Security Forces to address and degrade the threats posed by groups like AQIM, Ansar al-Sharia Tunisia, and ISIL, which has claimed responsibility for the Bardo Museum and Sousse attacks.

Tunisia's security services have made commendable progress in dealing with dangerous extremists, but more needs to be done. In the wake of the attacks, the Tunisians have asked for continued support for their military and internal security forces to include increased information-sharing, equipment, and training to effectively identify threats and subvert efforts of violent extremist groups.

If confirmed, I will continue these endeavors, and I will also support reform to Tunisia's judicial, prison, and police forces to help make them more professional institutions that are more responsive and accountable to their public.

And while security support is critical, Mr. Chairman, the United States must also help strengthen Tunisia's economy in order to address some of the root causes contributing to the rise of extremist violence. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Government of Tunisia in support of its economic reform agenda. I will also support the government and private sector's efforts to increase access to economic opportunities for all, to include marginalized and economically disadvantaged populations.

I firmly believe that we cannot forget what makes Tunisia special: Its democracy. Islamists, secularists, and many in between are working together daily to negotiate and seek consensus. Tunisia is the only Arab country ranked as "free" by Freedom House. The consolidation of democratic governance will take time and patience as Tunisia builds its institutions and works to ensure the freedoms guaranteed to Tunisian citizens by their constitution.

Tunisia's people expect transparency in government institutions, and for government officials, security forces, and their private sector leaders to behave in ways that are not corrupt and that benefit the public. If confirmed, I will ensure the United States continues to promote reforms that will address issues of transparency and accountability, and prioritizes the rights of the Tunisian people.

If confirmed, Mr. Chairman, I will also pay close attention to the management of the Embassy and its hardworking and dedicated personnel. As our partnership with and assistance to Tunisia grows, I can assure you I will work to ensure we have adequate staff and resources to properly manage the many facets of the relationship.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, for the opportunity to testify before you. I can assure you today that, if confirmed, it will be my honor to further U.S. interests and strengthen our relationship with Tunisia, and I look forward to the opportunity to welcome you in Tunisia, if confirmed, and work with you and your staffs to achieve those goals.

Thank you very much.

STATEMENT OF CAROLYN PATRICIA ALSUP, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF THE GAMBIA

Ms. ALSUP. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am honored to appear before you today. I wish to express my gratitude to the President and Secretary of State for the trust and confidence they have placed in me as their nominee for Ambassador to the Republic of The Gambia.

If confirmed, I would embrace the opportunity to apply my 23 years of experience as a Foreign Service officer to advance U.S. priorities in The Gambia. I believe my previous experience as Deputy Chief of Mission in The Gambia from 2005 to 2007, and my most recent experience as Deputy Chief of Mission at our Embassy in Ghana, would be particularly helpful in continuing to advocate for U.S. objectives in The Gambia.

Throughout my Foreign Service career, I have relied on my ability to build and maintain a strong, collaborative team with high morale and a clear sense of purpose to advance U.S. interests and objectives, whether it was promoting increased literacy, facilitating U.S. investment, encouraging entrepreneurship, advancing human rights, or supporting democratic institutions and free and fair elections.

I believe I am well-prepared to assume the duties and responsibilities of U.S. Ambassador to The Gambia and to deal with the many opportunities and challenges associated with that position.

The United States and The Gambia share a long history dating back to the mid-1800s. The Gambia has a rich cultural heritage, perhaps made most famous in the United States by Alex Haley's novel, "Roots," which still today brings many African-Americans to the country on a journey to discover their heritage.

The United States is committed to helping the Gambian people improve their lives by promoting democratic principles, human rights, and economic development. If confirmed, I will continue our efforts to engage the Government of The Gambia on these core areas to accomplish our shared goal of greater prosperity for The Gambia and for the Gambian people.

The Gambia is a troop-contributing country for U.N. peace-keeping missions, including a substantial presence in Darfur, a very important contribution to international peace and security. But peace and security must start at home.

The Gambia, as a predominately moderate Muslim country where people of different faiths have long lived together with little tension, could play an important role in promoting tolerance and countering violent extremism. However, The Gambia will not be able to play that role to the fullest without making changes at home.

We remain deeply concerned about the downward trajectory of The Gambia's human rights record. Gambians are being arbitrarily arrested and detained for longer than the constitutionally mandated 72-hour period, and discriminatory legislation and verbal and physical abuse have been targeted against the LGBTI community.

Furthermore, we still do not know the whereabouts of two missing dual Gambian-American citizens who were last seen in The Gambia over 2 years ago.

Human rights is a cornerstone of U.S. foreign policy; respecting and upholding human rights is also a cornerstone of maintaining a just and peace society, and mitigating the lure of violent extremism.

In my career, I have found that when we as diplomats are open to dialogue, to listen and speak frankly, that we can make great strides in narrowing our differences on even the most contentious issues. If confirmed, I will seek regular dialogue with Gambian officials, political parties, civil society, journalists, youth, and women to emphasize the importance of respect for and protection of all human rights.

Lastly, although the U.S. Embassy footprint in The Gambia is small, we are able to expand our reach through the 92 Peace Corps Volunteers working in the education, environment, and health sectors. Peace Corps has been active in The Gambia since 1967 and has been warmly welcomed by the government and people of The Gambia. If confirmed, I would make my top concern the safety and security of the nearly 2,000 U.S. citizens in The Gambia, about half of whom are minors.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the opportunity to appear today. I would be pleased to respond to your questions.

The Gambia—as a predominately moderate, Muslim country where people of different faiths have long lived together with little tension—could play an important role in promoting tolerance and countering violent extremism.

However, The Gambia will not be able to play that role to the fullest without making changes at home. We remain deeply concerned about the downward trajectory of The Gambia's human rights record. Gambians are being arbitrarily arrested and detained for longer than the constitutionally mandated 72-hour period, and discriminatory legislation and verbal and physical abuse have been targeted against the LGBTI community. Furthermore, we still do not know the whereabouts of two missing Gambian-American citizens who were last seen in The Gambia over 2 years ago. Human rights is a cornerstone of U.S. foreign policy; respecting and upholding human rights is also a cornerstone of maintaining a just and peace society and mitigating the lure of violent extremism. In my career, I have found that when we as diplomats are open to dialogue—to listen and speak frankly—that we can make great strides in narrowing our differences on even the most contentious of issues. If confirmed, I will seek regular dialogue with Gambian officials, political parties, civil society, journalists, youth and women to emphasize the importance of respect for, and protection of, all human rights.

Lastly, although the U.S. Embassy footprint in The Gambia is small, we are able to expand our reach through the 92 Peace Corps Volunteers working in the education, environment, and health sectors. Peace Corps has been active in The Gambia since 1967 and has been warmly welcomed by the government and people of The Gambia. If confirmed, I would make my top concern the safety and security of the nearly 2,000 U.S. citizens in The Gambia, about half of whom are minors.

Thank you Mr. Chairman for the opportunity to appear today. I would be pleased to respond to your questions.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you all for your testimony.

We have been joined by Chris Murphy, a Senator from Connecticut. Thank you for being here.

Let me just start with a couple questions.

Ms. Tamlyn, how can Benin take better advantage of AGOA and improve their economic performance? Is that a reasonable prospect?

Ms. TAMLYN. Thank you, Senator. That is an excellent question.

Their exports under AGOA are very small, at least those that are covered by AGOA. Of course, some of their primary exports are not covered, such as cotton.

But I think one of the ways we can work with them to improve that record is, in fact, through the Millennium Challenge Compact, which is going to work on improving the supply of electricity. For many small businesses or agro industry, the inability to maintain a steady production line because of gaps in electricity coverage is a real impediment to economic growth and to getting those products out to market.

So I think that is a very important contribution that we are making. We do hope that we will be able to see an increase in economic production generally and hope that that translates as well into products that can be exported to the United States, products that are valued added that U.S. consumers seek and that help benefit to the economy of Benin.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

Mr. Gilmour, to what extent does the Togolese military play in domestic politics?

Mr. GILMOUR. Thank you, Senator.

The military has played less and less of a role in politics, fortunately, in recent years because there has been a process of reform since 2007. There have been successful free and fair elections. And part of our strategy has been to work with the Togolese military to increase their professionalism to be able to deploy peacekeeping missions.

They have about 1,000 peacekeepers on deployment right now. That is both military and foreign police units that have deployed. I think that is the largest contingent in Mali right now.

So that has helped a great deal. And then our other key area in working with them has been in the maritime area. They have been a very strong partner in terms of building their capacity to patrol the waters off the coast of Togo. Togo has become a kind of safe harbor for the region. On any given day, there are over 100 ships lying off of Lome, waiting to go into the other nearby ports and into Lome itself, because the Togolese military has done such a good job of patrolling their waters.

Much of that is thanks to assistance from the United States. We have donated patrol boats and done quite a bit of training. If confirmed, I would certainly look forward to working to intensify that cooperation.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

Mr. Hawkins, elections have been postponed now twice in CAR. What is the likelihood that they will go as scheduled? And if so, does that allow for adequate preparation?

Mr. HAWKINS. An excellent question and one that will be determinate in the future of this country.

The electoral process is underway. Elections are scheduled in October. There will be a constitutional referendum followed by Presidential elections subsequently. In November, there will be legislative elections. That is the plan.

The first part of that now is voter registration, and we have had some fairly promising news. Registration in Bangui is up. Almost 300,000 people have been registered there. The Embassy estimates that approximately 350,000 eligible voters live in Bangui, so that part of the process is doing well.

They are moving out into the provinces now to register voters.

Funding remains an issue, and there is still a gap of about $15 million to pay for the elections. Getting election preparations out into those provinces, particularly in areas where government control is weak, is going to be an issue.

Another issue is the voting of refugees. That is a key element in this because those refugee populations must be brought in and included, or you will not have elections that will reflect the will of the entirety of the people.

So there are a lot of issues at stake, but we are there. We are supportive. We have done work. The U.S. Government has done work on the constitutional drafting process, on the electoral code. We are just putting in $2 million into electoral education. So we are hopeful that things will go ahead as planned.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

Mr. Rubinstein, what types of U.S. engagement have been effective in Tunisia? It is one of the best examples of transition after the Arab Spring. What have we done that has worked?

Mr. RUBINSTEIN. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, for the question.

My sense is that there has been some very effective diplomatic engagement in the first instance, particularly to keep all of the leading elements of Tunisia's body politic, whether they were secularist, Islamist, or others, working together during some of these very fragile moments of the transition. That involved, I think, some very good engagement out in the field at the most senior levels.

Of course, we provided resources to ensure that both the legislative and the Presidential elections occurred peacefully and in ways that were credible, free, and fair. So I think that engagement was very, very effective.

I think on the security side, there has been as well some very effective engagement. The Tunisian and U.S. militaries have a long history of working together. That engagement has deepened not only through Joint Military Commissioned annual meetings but also through now a far more robust set of activities, primarily training and equipping the Tunisians on various capabilities, particularly in the CT area. So that is going to continue.

I think on the economic side as well there has been some very effective engagement. We are providing some technical advice as they tackle some of the key critical economic reforms that need to be really driven home during this period. That includes getting a new investment code, banking reform, tax and customs reforms, as well as a public-private partnership law. We have had some really good engagement with technical advisers to get them where they need to be on those fronts.

Senator FLAKE. That sounds like a full range.

Mr. RUBINSTEIN. Yes, sir.

Senator FLAKE. Ms. Alsup, when we spoke in my office, we talked about realistic expectations about the situation in The Gambia. One of the issues is trafficking. How can we help in that regard? What impact can we have on government there?

Ms. ALSUP. I am glad you asked that question, Senator. We are, in fact, bringing the head of The Gambia's coordinating committee on anti-trafficking here to the United States for a seminar that is coming up in August on combating trafficking in persons. Through the J/TIP office at the State Department we also provided some training through UNODC, the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

With regard to prisoners who were released, I believe 200 a while ago, what do you think prompted that action?

Ms. ALSUP. Well, I think that the action was purportedly a gesture in honor of the Eid celebration. However, I believe that it was done primarily to show the world that The Gambia is trying to move toward a greater respect for human rights. At least, that is my hope that is what it means.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

We have been joined by Senator Markey. If we seem blurry-eyed, we both arrived yesterday at 3:30 a.m., having just traveled to Africa. I am glad to have taken the trip and to be back.

If you want to make any statement or launch into questions?

Senator MARKEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The chairman and I did have a great time in Africa, Ethiopia and Kenya, for several days.

We thank you each for being willing to serve our country in the roles that you are nominated for. It is a very important continent, and it is just exploding economically. But underneath it, there are many historical tensions, problems that continue to exist.

Mr. Rubinstein, I was in Tunisia 3 years ago. They were just drafting the new constitution, with a lot of hope for the country. It is where the peaceful revolution really began, and it turned into something that is unrecognizable in other countries. But in Tunisia, I think there is still a commitment to trying to fulfill the original ideal.

Can you talk a little bit about that and what, from your perspective, is the greatest threat to Tunisia being a model that ultimately can be emulated?

Mr. RUBINSTEIN. Thank you very much, Senator.

I share your optimism regarding Tunisia. What I would say though is, as opposed to a model for the rest of the Middle East, perhaps it is better to think of it as an example. The reason I mention that is because the very high number of differences between all of these countries in the Middle East, whether going through Arab Spring experiences or not.

But certainly, it serves as an example where there was political compromise practiced by people of very, very different perspectives, if we think about Nahda on the Islamist side all the way through to Nida Tounes on the other side, strongly secular. The fact that those political movements and others have continued through very, very challenging times to work through their differences, reach consensus, and also pass off power, as we saw Nahda do in 2014 to the transitional government, concede defeat in the last elections, these are hopeful signs that there is significant buy-in on the part of really all parts of the Tunisian political spectrum to continue on that path of democratic transition.

Frankly, I think what threatens it most are these horrific terrorist attacks. That is why the Tunisian security forces do need to be bolstered. They do need our help. With the generosity of the Congress, I suspect that we will be able to bring them greater security capacity, particularly in the area of border security.

Senator MARKEY. I agree with you. I visited Tunisia, Libya, and Egypt in the spring of 2012. They were all drafting their new constitutions. They each had a Muslim Brotherhood in each country. It was pretty clear that each Muslim Brotherhood was different from the other. It is not monolithic. Each one, to a certain extent, has to reflect the history of its own country and be accommodating to it, including the 1959 constitution that gave equal rights to women in Tunisia. It just cannot be overturned overnight in a country.

That is why Tunisia, in my mind, is something that is really hopeful, but we have to keep our eye on it as well.

If I could go to Togo for a second, there was just an election. There was a resounding victory. It has been rejected by the opposition. There are accusations of fraud.

You just heard the President, Mr. Gilmour, talk about that in Ethiopia before the African Union. Can you talk a little bit about Togo, this election, and how you view our ability to work for that government to make sure that it has the kind of credibility that the President was talking about?

Mr. GILMOUR. Thank you, Senator.

There has been a process of political reform going on in Togo since 2006, with what they call the global political agreement that was negotiated between the opposition and the government. Since that time, they have had free and fair elections in several instances, including in April of this year. There were questions about the fairness of the election and the administration beforehand.

Our Ambassador, Ambassador Whitehead, who is there was very much part of the discussions of bringing in the other international observers, including the International Organisation of La Francophonie, to help lend credibility to the administration of the elections.

So everyone who was there who observed had a consensus that the elections were, indeed, free and fair.

One opposition leader, as you mentioned, has rejected the results, but fortunately since the election, things have been peaceful, so people have not come out in the street to protest. I think we still can make progress, certainly, on the issue of term limits, which the President talked about in his speech in Ethiopia.

In fact, term limits have been on the agenda in Togo for several years. There were negotiations as recently as last year between the government and opposition about the modalities of how they might work that out. In fact, in the legislature last year, there was legislation introduced but did not pass. So the government and opposition were not able to come to agreement on kind of the implementation and how term limits could work.

I am told that term limits are still on the agenda and that the president is willing to talk about this and that the opposition is, of course, very much engaged in the question. So I would look forward to, if confirmed, continue to facilitate that dialogue, as Ambassador Whitehead has done.

Senator MARKEY. If I could go to Gambia for a second and talk a little bit about that tension that exists between the United States and the Gambian Government over democracy and its operation in Gambia.

Can you talk a little bit about that, Ms. Alsup, so we can get your perspective?

Ms. ALSUP. Thank you, Senator, for that question.

Yes, there is a very real tension between the United States and The Gambia regarding democracy and human rights. If confirmed, that would be one of my priorities, to establish a dialogue. I believe it is important that we engage. I do not think that changes can be made overnight, but I think it is important that we continue to emphasize the importance of democratic principles, the importance of respect for human rights, particularly with regard to arrests. There have been many arbitrary arrests.

We were pleased with the release of the prisoners recently. Many of them were the family members of people who had been involved in the December 30 coup attempt, so we were very pleased that they had been released.

However, it is something that would be ongoing. We have had a good relationship now with the Foreign Minister, someone whom I had met with frequently when I was in The Gambia before. But I think we need to have that kind of dialogue that we have with her at all levels of the government. That would be my top priority, to establish that dialogue.

Senator MARKEY. Thank you so much. I thank all of you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

Senator Murphy?

Senator MURPHY. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Thank you all for being with us here today.

Mr. Hawkins, I just wanted to talk about what you have learned so far in your preparation for this post, as to the effect of the U.S. spending and U.S. aid in CAR. I was trying to figure out what the number is. It looks to me around $70 million or so, heavily in humanitarian aid and really small amounts of money being spent on this election. I think we have less than $1 million in electoral support.

What is your sense of what we have been able to leverage with the amount of money that we are spending there, and what you have heard from folks in terms of recommendations about where we might need to spend more in order to get a bigger bang for our buck?

Mr. HAWKINS. Thank you, Senator. I appreciate that question.

I think you have to break our assistance down a bit. The overall number in the last 2 years is quite large. It is about $828 million. A lot of that is for assistance for refugees and internally displaced people. They estimate that about 2.7 million people in CAR need some sort of assistance. That is over half the population of the country. So this year alone, we will be providing about $101 million in that area.

Another big ticket item is our support to MINUSCA, to the U.N. peacekeeping operation, our assessed contributions. I think for the last little bit over a year, that has run at about $452 million.

So those are big and very impactful and very important contributions that we have made.

In some other areas, the numbers are smaller but still important. One area that we are looking at very closely is the justice sector. The INL Bureau in the State Department has about $25 million to help reestablish the justice system in that country, in a place that has had such dreadful occurrences and people's rights abused in such awful way, providing people an outlet, a justice outlet, is hugely important. That has been impactful. The court has started working in Bangui, at least. In the first session, they went through a number of cases.

We are also providing assistance for victims of sexual abuse, which in that conflict context is very important.

Some of the contributions in other areas are smaller. The electoral area is certainly one that requires attention of the international community. The shortfall there is pretty significant, as I mentioned earlier. It is about $15 million. That is an immediate need, because those elections are taking place in a few months, if they hold to the schedule. So that is, certainly, something that we will need to look at more closely.

We are not alone on this, of course. There is an international coalition of willing partners who have contributed in various ways. The International Contact Group for CAR just met on the 27th, and we were represented there, and a number of countries in the AU and others were looking at those issues.

But there is a lot to do. I am very proud of the U.S. contributions so far. If confirmed, I look forward to overseeing those programs, ensuring that they are operated appropriately, and making the best case possible that we have the resources we need to move this forward.

Senator MURPHY. Having spent $800 million there, it would be a shame if we relatively nickel and dined them such that they could not run an appropriately funded election.

Mr. Rubinstein, I was with a big delegation in Tunisia earlier in the year, and I wanted to ask you a couple questions in that context.

On a bipartisan basis, we were there and made a commitment to do everything that Tunisia needed in order to continue on its democratic path. Then as a member of the Appropriations Committee, we just voted for a foreign aid budget that did not fund the President's request for Tunisia, something that, from what I understand, the Tunisians have noticed. There seems to be a separation between our rhetoric and what we are able to deliver.

There is some vague language in the appropriations bill that we are going to try to find the money somewhere else, but is this going to be an issue for you? Can we fulfill the commitments that we have made, formally or informally, if we do not ultimately fund the number that the President has requested?

Mr. RUBINSTEIN. Thank you very much, Senator, for that question.

My sense is that the increases that are in the administration's request for fiscal year 2016 are very well grounded and they reflect some very serious needs not only in the security area where it is plainly obvious that Tunisia is facing some extremely serious threats with these two major attacks, but also in the economic reform and the democracy, governance, and rights areas.

Frankly, if those two areas do not keep up in some way with the security side of the relationship, that could get out of whack. I think that is a problem.

So I do sense that we have made those rhetorical commitments. Tunisia is counting on our support as well as that of other countries. Thankfully, we do have other countries that are in the mix. Of course, Tunisia getting support from the IMF and the World Bank and others. But I think they are primarily looking to the United States to meet these needs at this time and to ensure that they stay on the path, particularly, I would add, on the side of giving them the fiscal space so that they can make these very difficult economic reforms, particularly reforming state-owned banks, investment, tax, customs. These are going to entail some real choices, and probably some winners and losers. It will be important for us to provide that fiscal space for them.

Senator MURPHY. I wanted to ask you one more question, drawing on your long experience in the region. I tend to think the way that we think of the region is far too black and white. There are not really friends and enemies. There are degrees of friends and degrees of enemies or adversaries, whatever you want to call them.

We had a meeting with a cross-section of opposition leadership while we were there that included Nahda, that included Rachid Ghannouchi.

Actually, some members of our delegation chose not to take part in that meeting because they did not want to be associated with a member of an Islamist party.

So just talk to me about how the United States deals with, specifically, a group like Nahda, but the general phenomenon of Islamist parties who cannot be completely excluded from political coalitions but often have values that are completely antithetical to those that we wish were the core of these emerging democracies? So maybe speak to it specifically with respect with Nahda, but I am sure you may have thoughts in a broader sense from your experience in the region.

Mr. RUBINSTEIN. Senator, I think you properly identified the key factor, and that is: Is the Islamist movement both an important part of the national political fabric and social fabric of the country? And secondly, are they playing by the rules? Those are two indicators that at least I have looked to and, if confirmed, I would look to in Tunisia to see if they are continuing to do what they have done so far, which is to participate fully and constructively in political life there, to engage in compromise, to be supportive of the reforms the country needs.

In fact, they have been very supportive. They have formed key coalitions to get things done with Nida Tunis and other parties. That is something I think should be, frankly, strengthened.

As far as other movements in other parts of the region, I think you made an excellent point. They do need to be looked at in terms of their commitments to representative democracy and whether they want to be a good actor, a constructive actor, and know how to turn over power to others when appropriate, when citizens have voted. On those indices or indicators, Nahda has done very well. Certainly, I think it has been entirely appropriate that we engage with them, as we do with other Tunisian political parties and movements.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

Senator Markey had a followup.

Senator MARKEY. I just had a couple questions for you, Mr. Hawkins.

The Central African Republic has historically not really had religious tensions, but they seem to have broken out. Can you talk a little bit about how out of character it is in the history of the country? And what is going on right now in terms of those new ethnic and religious tensions being activated?

Mr. HAWKINS. Thank you very much, Senator.

The origins of the current cycle of conflict in CAR are complicated. There are many different elements to that. There are regional and economic, ethnic tensions that all play into this.

Unfortunately, as we went from late 2012, 2013, some of these tensions took on, as you noted, sir, an increasingly sectarian flavor. I think that is a cause of real concern. That has been one area of emphasis for us on the policy side and on the assistance side, focusing again on reconciliation and bringing people together after this incredibly divisive period in their history.

We are spending this year and last about $15 million on reconciliation programs.

Given my experience in Nigeria, where we did a lot of interfaith work, working with evangelical Christians and Muslim clerics, bringing those people together is so important to creating a national identity, an inclusive national identity. If confirmed, that will be one of my priorities as Ambassador to the re.

Senator MARKEY. Can you talk a little bit about the role of conflict diamonds in the Central African Republic right now?

Mr. HAWKINS. Hugely important. One of the major industries of the country, and again, this is a country that has been blessed with very rich resources and yet is at the bottom of every indicator for economic growth.

Diamonds play a key part now in fueling conflict because many of the bad actors in CAR are sitting on diamond resources. And diamonds will play an absolutely crucial role in getting this country out of this conflict, because that will be one of the main sources of revenue.

I was quite surprised, in studying for preparation for taking on this assignment, if confirmed, that something like 100,000 people in a country of 5 million depend on the diamond industry in the CAR. So it has a huge effect.

The focus internationally has been on the Kimberley Process. That coalition of producing and purchasing countries has suspended CAR since 2013. The Kimberley Process is looking very closely at ways that those parts of the diamond industry that are now increasingly under the international control or under state control can be brought into the system and that maybe diamonds can be used to fund good things, to fund the government, to fund support for the people, as opposed to funding conflict.

Senator MARKEY. Good luck to all of you on your missions.

And thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you, Senator Markey.

I want to thank all of you for being here. I appreciated meeting you all in my office. I wish you all the best. Certainly, our country relies on your professionalism and your expertise and your willingness to serve.

And also to your families, I want to express appreciation for the sacrifices that they all make in their own way.

I think one of these is an unaccompanied post. To Annie and Max and Alex, that is a particular sacrifice, in that regard.

But for all of you, I know that there are a lot of sacrifices that are made, and we just want you to know that this committee and the Senate, the Congress, appreciates that.

So thank you for your service. Thank you for what you are doing. We look forward to moving this process along with your nominations.

I should say that the record will stay open for a couple days, until Friday. So if anything needs to be submitted until then, it will be included in the record.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you very much. This meeting is adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 3:03 p.m., the hearing was adjourned.]

ADDITIONAL MATERIAL SUBMITTED FOR THE RECORD

RESPONSES OF LUCY TAMLYN, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF BENIN, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE TAMLYN'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR ISAKSON

Question. As we discussed during your office call, one of my highest priorities in office is ensuring that justice is done for Kate Puzey, who was murdered in Benin while serving as a Peace Corps Volunteer. There has been progress in the prosecution of this case, including assistance by our own FBI.

♦ Will you commit to continuing the same level of engagement on this issue as your predecessor, Ambassador Michael Raynor?

Answer. If confirmed, I am committed to continuing Ambassador Raynor's high level of engagement to achieve justice for Kate Puzey. This tragedy took the life of an extraordinary young woman who was dedicated to improving the well-being of Beninese children—especially girls—and to promoting increased understanding between the United States and Benin through her service in the Peace Corps.

Your ongoing engagement on this issue and numerous trips to Benin, including for the 5th anniversary of Kate's murder in March 2014, have helped keep the Puzey investigation at the forefront of bilateral relations. President Yayi has been consistent in his commitment to seeing that justice is served. The Beninese Government and law enforcement cooperation with U.S. authorities and U.S. law enforcement remains high. The U.S. interagency law enforcement team is working closely with Beninese counterparts to develop and pursue new leads and to lay the foundation for successful prosecution.

If confirmed, I will work to continue this strong cooperation between the U.S. interagency team and the Government of Benin. I also pledge to work with you to ensure this issue remains a top priority in U.S.-Benin relations.

RESPONSES OF DAVID R. GILMOUR, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE TOGOLESE REPUBLIC, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE GILMOUR'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR MENENDEZ

Question. According to the most recent Country Reports on Human Rights, "corruption and inefficiency were endemic in the police force, and impunity was a problem."

♦ What resources are available through State Department to combat police corruption, and what can you do as Ambassador to help Togo establish a roadmap to reforming police?

Answer. Police modernization and training programs are available through the Department of State Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement (INL) to help combat police corruption. If confirmed as U.S. Ambassador to Togo, I will continue to advocate for efforts to modernize Togo's stance toward corruption and the prosecution of corruption.

I will also continue to promote programs to combat corruption through the Embassy in Lome and the Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement (INL). The United States, through the Embassy in Lome and through other INL and Department of Justice programs, has facilitated several anticorruption workshops and other training opportunities for Togolese law enforcement and judicial personnel. Embassy Lome also enjoys a very productive working relationship with the Ministry of Security and Civil Protection and engages with the government regularly on efforts to reinforce the capacity of Togo's national police. This summer the Government of Togo announced the creation of a high authority unit tasked with preventing and fighting against corruption, including corruption among government officials. If confirmed, I will also pursue additional INL programs aimed at increasing police professionalism and capacity. Additionally, with assistance from donors such as the European Union, I will work collaboratively with our international partners to implement a justice modernization project to improve transparency and efficiency as a roadmap to reforming police in Togo.

Question. The 2015 Trafficking in Persons Report indicates that Togo is making considerable efforts to comply with the minimum standards for eliminating trafficking, but has not demonstrated efforts to address trafficking of adults.

♦ If confirmed, what steps will you take to encourage the Government of Togo to increase prosecution of traffickers, and enact draft laws outlawing forced labor and trafficking for sexual exploitation?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue our call on the Government of Togo to step up its current efforts to convict and punish traffickers. I will also stress to the Government of Togo the importance of enacting the draft law prohibiting forced labor and forced prostitution of adults. To help the Togolese public better understand the complexities involved in human trafficking in Togo and influence their government to enact the draft legislation, I will increase Embassy Lome's public diplomacy on the issue and engage with grassroots organizations and the public in antitrafficking efforts.

RESPONSES OF JEFFREY J. HAWKINS, JR., NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE HAWKINS'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CORKER

Question. What is the status of the position held most recently by Ambassador Stuart Symington and what is the plan as it relates to U.S. engagement on the issue of facilitating a regional effort toward political reconciliation?

Answer. Ambassador Stuart Symington becomes Deputy Assistant Secretary for African Affairs for the Central African Region and Security Affairs on August 3, but will continue to serve as the Special Representative for the Central African Republic (CAR). Special Representative Symington will continue to support our policy objectives in the Central African Republic by engaging and facilitating regional and international efforts toward the ongoing political reconciliation processes in CAR.

Question. What role will the J Under Secretariat, and specifically the Bureau for Conflict and Stabilization (CSO) have in maintaining close and continuing cooperation toward a negotiated settlement and stabilization of the country?

Answer. CSO is providing targeted, diplomatic, and analytic support in Washington and the Central African region, to Embassy Bangui, the Africa Bureau, and other key international actors to help advance critical transition processes in the Central African Republic (CAR). These processes include local and national-level dialogues, constitutional reform, reconciliation, and elections preparations, as part of our effort to help ensure that these initiatives continue to be a priority beyond the May 2015 Bangui Forum. CSO is focusing on analyzing atrocities and political violence risks associated with the transition process, and, depending on funding and the situation in country, providing direct on-the-ground support to programs, such as those associated with reconciliation and early warning/response, furthering the objectives which came out of the Bangui Forum.

CSO initially deployed an employee to Bangui in May 2015 for 3 weeks to support the Embassy in analyzing atrocities and political violence risks during the transition process; providing an update on these processes as they relate to medium and longer term goals of the U.S. Government, CAR Government, and international community; developing recommendations on how to guide next steps; and providing enhanced diplomatic engagement. The CSO employee returned to Bangui in July for another 3 weeks in order to followup on these initiatives and identify potential points of intervention for CSO in the areas of reconciliation and early-warning/response. CSO's current effort in CAR is supported by CSO's previous work in CAR, which includes an in-country interagency conflict assessment and planning exercise in 2011; DC-based mass atrocities prevention planning in 2013; and DC-based national and local level dialogue consultations and research in 2014.

Since 2011, CSO has also been involved in the counter-Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) mission, which includes CAR, through a field representative, based in Kampala, Uganda, that supports the LRA-affected countries.

Question. In the same vein as above, what role will the Department of Defense play in helping to facilitate a more stable and politically viable CAR in this challenging region and what priority will they have?

Answer. The Department of Defense (DOD) will continue to support U.S. security assistance efforts, led by the State Department, in the Central African Republic (CAR). To date, DOD has supported the troop contributing countries to the U.N. Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in CAR (MINUSCA) by providing airlift, equipment, and the construction of U.N. base camps in-country, and will continue to provide support to the peacekeepers on a bilateral basis and to the U.N. where possible.

Question. How will the nominee be further empowered as Ambassador and the post and his country team be resourced to address the significant deficiencies at post and those in the political environment identified during his confirmation hearing?

Answer. We remain committed to expanding and normalizing operations following the resumption of the activities of Embassy Bangui in September 2014, despite operating in a challenging environment in the Central African Republic (CAR).

This summer, we will increase the number of Embassy staff in order to expand our political, economic, development, and public diplomacy engagement in CAR. We intend to maintain and, when conditions permit, increase the number of temporary personnel, allowing the United States to address specific programmatic and operational priorities that broaden our overall engagement and ensure appropriate stewardship of U.S. resources.

In addition, Embassy support staff will continue their efforts to improve management and information technology platforms, thus enabling staff to keep up with the increased workload.

We are working to lease housing in addition to using existing U.S. Government-owned residences on and off the Embassy chancery compound, thereby lessening the burdens placed upon the Embassy's aging infrastructure and improving the overall quality of life for Embassy personnel.

If confirmed, I will continue to make strides in normalizing our Embassy's operations, thus permitting us to continue the important work of helping the Central Africans find the peace, justice, and prosperity they richly deserve.

Question. What is the U.S. Government position on the holding of an election in October 2015 in CAR?

Answer. The United States, in line with the position of the international community, supports the efforts of the CAR authorities to hold the first round of Presidential and legislative elections in October 2015 or as soon as possible.

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE HAWKINS'S RESPONSES TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR MENENDEZ

Question. As the Central African Republic looks toward national elections, many people in the country are continuing to face a humanitarian crisis. There are approximately 400,000 people displaced internally and another 420,000 Central Africans living as refugees in neighboring countries. The U.N. estimates that 2.7 million people throughout the Central African Republic, over half the country's population, are in need of humanitarian assistance. And while parts of the country have indeed stabilized, there are areas of CAR that remain violent and volatile.

- ◆ In your estimation, what are the greatest challenges to a coordinated international response to assisting displaced populations? What can be done to ensure United Nations and international organizations are meeting the continuing needs of these populations?

Answer. The greatest challenges to a coordinated international response to assist displaced populations in the Central African Republic (CAR) are insecurity, lack of basic state services, and funding.

Ongoing insecurity and recent clashes in some areas of CAR continue to create new displacement and additional humanitarian needs while preventing people from returning to their homes and livelihoods. Targeted attacks against humanitarian agencies hinder access and provision of services to affected populations.

Humanitarian agencies also face the daunting task of substituting for the state system in the provision of basic services, such as primary health care, education, and clean water. This stretches their limited resources as they try to meet the needs of all Central Africans, including the displaced, in areas where there is little state presence.

Also, the U.N. strategic response plan to support some 2.7 million people in need of humanitarian aid in CAR remains only 32 percent funded. Consequently, humanitarian agencies must make difficult choices about their operations and the populations slated for assistance.

The United States will continue our critical support and build upon the roughly $251 million in humanitarian aid we have provided in FY14 and FY15 to date in order to ensure the United Nations and international organizations are meeting the needs of the CAR's people. Further, we will work closely with other donors and liaise directly with U.N. humanitarian agencies to ensure that support reaches those most in need, including internally displaced persons and refugees, and is not duplicative.

Question. The Bangui Forum was widely praised by the international community for its inclusiveness. The forum brought together members of the transitional government, armed groups, and civil society to discuss the way forward on elections, disarmament of rebel groups, and the creation of justice and reconciliation mechanisms.

- ♦ (a) What is the status of implementation of recommendations from the Bangui Forum, such as disarmament of Seleka and anti-Balaka fighters, a constitutional revision process, and mechanisms for reconciliation? What, in your view, are the key challenges to implementation?

Answer. (a) Following the conclusion of the May 2015 Bangui Forum, the transitional government established a followup committee to begin the process of implementing the Forum's recommendations. The naming of the committee members, however, has been subject to debate and revisions as some groups, including the primarily Muslim, ethnic Peulhs have complained they were not adequately represented on the committee. Consequently, there has been little progress in the implementation of the Forum's recommendations.

The U.N. Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in CAR (MINUSCA) has developed a $10 million predisarmament, demobilization, reintegration, and repatriation (DDRR) program that intends to jump-start the process of disarming former armed combatants. The program faces challenges as rebel leaders have proven reluctant to comply with the May 10 DDRR agreement because they are unsure of what long-term DDRR and security sector reform will look like. Donor support for DDRR remains insufficient. On a positive note, in May the international community successfully encouraged a group of ex-Seleka soldiers to vacate a camp in downtown Bangui, which allowed the removal of approximately 3 tons of explosives that had been in danger of spontaneous explosion.

Discussions at the Bangui Forum helped inform an early July workshop of Central African Republic (CAR) experts and international observers on the constitution. The draft constitution will now move to the Transitional National Council, the interim Parliament, for consideration, after which the draft will be presented to voters at an October 4 referendum.

The transitional CAR Government is considering several mechanisms for reconciliation including transitional justice measures, a Truth and Reconciliation Commission, and a Commission on Good Governance.

The key implementation challenges of the Bangui Forum recommendations are the lack of financial resources and human capacity capable of organizing, leading, and carrying out programs that could convert recommendations to reality.

- ♦ (b) How is the administration planning to support the implementation of these recommendations?

Answer. (b) In support of the Bangui Forum's recommendations, we are working with the United States Institute of Peace to develop a grant that will assist and work with the Bangui Forum followup committee. In addition, Embassy Bangui is closely monitoring the constitutional drafting process and, through the American Bar Association, is supporting the efforts of CAR's civil society to advocate for an inclusive and representative draft.

- ♦ (c) The inclusion of civil society and community leaders is absolutely essential to the success of these efforts. If confirmed, what would you do to encourage the continued consultation of civil society in the constitutional revision process?

Answer. (c) I witnessed, as Consul General in Lagos, Nigeria, during the recent Presidential elections, the importance of having civil society and community leaders engaged in political processes. If confirmed as Ambassador, I will work closely with all facets of CAR's civil society, through public diplomacy campaigns, training workshops, and informal dialogue, to ensure they are well informed and engaged in the political transition, including the constitutional revision process. I will further work with the CAR transitional authorities, including members of the transitional Parliament who lead the constitutional drafting process, to encourage a robust dialogue with the people of CAR about the democratic foundations upon which their country should be built.

Question. How much in total funding has the United States provided to help reestablish rule of law in the Central African Republic in fiscal years 2014 and 2015, and what do we hope to achieve through the activities that we have funded? What has been accomplished to date? What plans are in place to assess progress in helping reestablish the criminal justice system? What assistance has been provided to the police, gendarmerie, and prosecutors? How do we plan to measure its effectiveness?

Answer. In fiscal year (FY) 2014, the United States Government provided $15.6 million to help reestablish rule of law and criminal justice in the Central African Republic (CAR). In FY 2015, we intend to spend $10.2 million for these activities in the CAR.

With this funding, we hope to assist the CAR Transitional Government reestablish law enforcement and criminal justice processes, thereby strengthening the rule of law in the country.

With our assistance, the CAR Court of Appeals held its first criminal court session in more than 5 years. The court heard 78 cases, a figure that was 25 percent higher than anticipated. We have opened and staffed three legal aid centers in major towns for victims of sexual and gender-based violence (SGBV). With additional U.S. support, the American Bar Association-Rule of Law Initiative (ABA-ROLI) is working on several cases of SGBV victims and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) is working with the Ministry of Justice to deploy mobile courts to the provinces, and to develop rehabilitation plans for courts in provincial cities.

In support of reestablishing the police and gendarme, we, in collaboration with UNDP, expect to hold a groundbreaking ceremony for the rehabilitation of several police and gendarmerie facilities in several weeks. We are also working with the U.N. Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission to CAR (MINUSCA) to deliver critical equipment for the police, gendarmerie, and newly reconstituted civilian prison service.

The capacity and level of operations of criminal justice institutions in CAR are extremely low, and some institutions, such as courts, barely function, which provides a clear baseline for measuring progress. As a result, basic output-related measurements such as the holding of a criminal court session, number of cases heard, opening of legal aid centers, number of SGBV cases being accepted, and rehabilitation and reopening of prisons and police and gendarmerie stations will continue to provide immediate, meaningful indicators on the progress in reestablishing criminal justice and rule of law.

With our partners, we have established clearly defined output and outcome-related measurements to assess and monitor progress. With ABA-ROLI, we have a monitoring and evaluation plan that has defined indicators, ranging from the number of bar association attorneys trained to the percentage increase in paralegals' knowledge of basic legal principles. With UNDP, we are expanding our monitoring and evaluation to better gather and analyze criminal and court data, conduct surveys, and track other information.

Finally, the Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement (INL) sits on the steering committee that directs UNDP's work in CAR and is working to send additional staff to Bangui for on-site monitoring and oversight.

RESPONSES OF DANIEL H. RUBINSTEIN, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF TUNISIA, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE RUBINSTEIN'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CORKER

Question. What is the Chief of Mission's role in engaging the Tunisian American Enterprise Fund? How will you work with the Tunisian American Enterprise Fund to ensure that it is reaching its maximum investment potential? What are the challenges to the Tunisian American Enterprise Fund's success?

Answer. The Tunisian-American Enterprise Fund (TAEF), seeded with $60 million in Economic Support Funds, has made an initial investment of $2.7 million in a Tunisian microcredit firm and hopes to invest approximately $7 million over the next several months in Tunisian Small and Medium Enterprises (SMEs). I expect TAEF to fully invest its funds and create growth in SMEs, venture capital opportunities, and in microfinance.

The TAEF has had challenges navigating a difficult and complicated Tunisian financial regulatory system, but after creating innovative investment platforms, it is poised to make important investments in the Tunisian economy in the coming year. Hopefully, the Enterprise Fund activities will also bolster the Tunisian Government's reforms that directly bear on the Fund's activities, such as small business establishment and expansion.

If confirmed, I will continue to closely monitor the Fund's progress, engage with its board of directors to advocate for additional progress, and ensure that the Fund is effectively working to promote sustainable and inclusive economic growth and employment in Tunisia.

NOMINATIONS

TUESDAY, AUGUST 4, 2015

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, DC.

Ann Calvaresi Barr, of Maryland, to be Inspector General, United States Agency for International Development
David Malcolm Robinson, of Connecticut, to be an Assistant Secretary of State (Conflict and Stabilization Operations) and Coordinator for Reconstruction and Stabilization
Edwin Richard Nolan, Jr., of Massachusetts, to be Ambassador to the Republic of Suriname
John L. Estrada, of Florida, to be Ambassador to the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago
Scott Allen, of Maryland, to be United States Director of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development

The committee met, pursuant to notice, at 2:33 p.m., in room SD-419, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Hon. David Perdue, presiding.

Present: Senators Perdue and Kaine.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. DAVID PERDUE, U.S. SENATOR FROM GEORGIA

Senator PERDUE. The Foreign Relations Committee will come to order.

The hearing today is to consider nominations for five individuals to a wide range of posts. I look forward to discussing the wide ranges of challenges and opportunities that our nominees expect to face, if confirmed.

I want to thank each of you for your dedication to public service, for your families, for the support you have. We welcome your families and friends who are present here today. I have met a few of them.

Today, I would like to introduce our nominees. We will do that first, and then we will proceed to questions after a statement from the ranking member.

First, we have Ms. Ann Calvaresi Barr of Maryland to be Inspector General, United States Agency for International Development. Welcome, Ms. Barr.

Mr. David Malcolm Robinson of Connecticut, to be Assistant Secretary of State, Conflict and Stabilization Operations, and coordinator for Reconstruction and Stabilization.

Mr. Edward Richard Nolan, Jr., of Massachusetts, to be Ambassador to the Republic of Suriname.

John L. Estrada of Florida to be Ambassador to the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago.

Mr. Scott Allen to be Director of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

Several of you have spent many years dedicated in service to our country already. For that, we are sincerely thankful. I look forward to hearing your testimony today, but I would like to add a personal note.

I have made a couple trips outside of the United States. I have met many of your compatriots in the State Department. I can tell the people of America that the best of the best represent us abroad. I want to thank each of you and the people you represent for what you do.

With that, I will turn it over to the ranking member, Senator Kaine.

Senator Kaine.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. TIM KAINE,
U.S. SENATOR FROM VIRGINIA

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Mr. Chair. That was a gracious comment, and I am going to continue in that way.

I think we have a bipartisan appreciation on this committee that the work that you do is very important, and that you do it under very difficult circumstances, and often did you do it without the understanding and, sadly, even the appreciation that we ought to extend to you.

I think one of the lessons that America learned from the Vietnam era is whatever our political feelings about any particular military conflict, we should express our thanks and appreciation to those who serve in uniform. I think we have gotten better at that, and I thank God for that. But we have a whole lot of people who serve not in military uniform but still representing the United States, whether they be State Department or USAID or DEA agents who work overseas. We have a lot of folks who are kind of small-a ambassadors working overseas who represent the United States every day, often in dangerous places, and often sent to places that they did not choose, and often sent without their families, if the places are particularly dangerous.

I have also, as member of this committee and the Armed Services Committee, in my travels have had a chance to interact with a lot of the folks that you are already working with and that you will be working with. You have fantastic colleagues. Those of you who are going to be Ambassadors have that care on your shoulder of protecting the safety of the public servants who work for you.

I congratulate you for being nominated but also just tell you that my sense is the same as Senator Perdue's, that the people you will be working with are really top notch, and we owe you and them a great deal of thanks.

Quickly, about the nominees, Ms. Barr, your experience at GAO and as Deputy Inspector General of the U.S. DOT will be very, very valuable, if you are confirmed in this position as the Inspector General of USAID. It is an important agency. We care deeply about the mission. The role of the IG is very important to the USAID being successful.

Ambassador Robinson, as a Career Member of Foreign Service, your current tenure as the Principal Deputy High Representative of the International Community in Bosnia and Herzegovina and other roles will undoubtedly benefit you in the position you have been nominated for as Assistant Secretary of State for the Bureau of Conflict and Stabilization Operations.

Mr. Allen, your 20 years of work in the financial sector will be a great match as you go to take on the task of an institution whose mission has probably gotten a little bit more complicated than it has been, the U.S. Director of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development. We have been following the situation in Europe closely. I know you will have interesting insights for us on that.

Mr. Nolan, you are also a career Foreign Service member. You currently serve as Minister of Political Affairs of the U.S. Embassy Ottawa and you previously served in The Hague. Thirty-four years of combined service will serve you well as the U.S. Ambassador in Suriname.

And then, Mr. Estrada, I cannot resist, as a father of a Marine, to give you a shout-out for your strong service, 34 years of service in the Marines and really the achievement of what has to be the top job in the Marine Corps, even over Commandant, Sergeant Major of the Marine Corps, the highest-ranking enlisted Marine. What a wonderful track record. I know you will bring that to your position of the Ambassador of the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago.

Everywhere I travel, I always stick my head in Post One at every Embassy to thank the Marine security guards who are trained at Quantico in Virginia. I know you have interacted with them, and they will be new family in this new role.

So I appreciate your service. I applaud you for your nomination.

And, Mr. Chair, I look forward to the questions.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you.

Now we will open it up to questions, and I would like to give each of you—I am sorry, we will do testimony first. I jumped ahead. I am anxious to get to these questions.

Senator KAINE. He is tough. He wants to get to the cross-examination, so you guys better hunker down over there. [Laughter.]

Senator PERDUE. What I was going to do, though, actually, was give you the privilege of introducing your family and guests, each of you, and I will ask you to do that as you give your statement.

Up first is our nominee to become the Inspector General of USAID, Ms. Calvaresi Barr. She is currently the Deputy Inspector General at the Department of Transportation.

Ms. Calvaresi Barr.

STATEMENT OF ANN CALVARESI BARR, NOMINATED TO BE INSPECTOR GENERAL OF THE U.S. AGENCY FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Ms. CALVARESI BARR. Thank you, Chairman Perdue and Ranking Member Kaine. It is a great honor to be here today as the President's nominee for Inspector General of the United States Agency for International Development. If confirmed, I look forward to working with you on important oversight and accountability matters related to U.S. foreign assistance.

Before I begin, I would like to recognize my husband, David, who is in Iraq on a State Department detail; my daughter, Julianna, who completed her second year at Dickinson College and will soon begin a year of study in Italy; my mother, Julia; my late father, Anthony; my siblings, Kathleen, Dominic, and Anthony; my mother-in-law, nieces, nephews, and other members of my sizeable Italian family.

Together, they have instilled in me strong ethical and moral values, and taught me that hard work, dedication, and humility are the foundation to building resilient relationships and mutual respect. As you can see, I am surrounded by much love and support.

I have served in the government accountability community for more than 3 decades. My civil service career includes 25 years at the Government Accountability Office and 6 years at the DOT's Office of Inspector General. GAO served as a critical training ground for me, and I had the privilege to work for many role models, including three outstanding Comptrollers General.

During my time at GAO, I worked in multiple offices, including 5 years in GAO's former European Office, leading audits of large-scale, cross-cutting programs that resulted in improved operations and significant cost-savings across government.

Particularly gratifying and fulfilling was work I performed while stationed overseas, work that concerned national security interests, international development efforts, and the state of human rights conditions in countries throughout Africa and the Middle East.

My GAO experience prepared me well for working alongside DOT's Inspector General Calvin Scovel, whose exceptional leadership I respect very, very much, and I learned from, and is recognized across the OIG community.

I must tell you, he surprised me today, and he is here with me. I could not be happier about that.

Thank you, Cal.

Within my first weeks as Assistant Inspector General for Audit and Evaluation, I led the development of a comprehensive strategy for mitigating risks in DOT's oversight of $48 billion in transportation projects funded under the Recovery Act. Our strategy enabled us to quickly identify and inform the department of vulnerabilities that required immediate attention or a sustained focus before funds were further obligated or expended.

I also collaborated with senior managers to institute new policies and streamline procedures that enhanced product quality and accountability for issuing timely and relevant audit reports.

After my first year at DOT, the inspector general selected me as his deputy. In this role, I identified opportunities for greater synergies among OIG's audit, investigation, and operational support activities, as well as programs to further develop and motivate staff. I also personally sponsored many initiatives aimed at broadening perspectives and encouraging greater coordination and partnering.

Our returns on investment and employee survey scores demonstrate the success we have had in cultivating a skilled and high-performing workforce and in achieving results. Over the past 5 years, we averaged a return of $26 for every dollar appropriated and seen remarkable improvements in our Employee Viewpoint Survey scores.

Of particular note, we ranked first in effective leadership, support for diversity, and innovation across the OIG community.

If confirmed, I would approach this new responsibility with a clear understanding that foreign assistance is an integral part of U.S. engagement with an increasingly interdependent world, and that the success of AID's mission depends in large part on effective partnerships with the State, Defense, and other Federal entities, industry, foreign governments, international donors, and the academic and scientific communities.

The independent work of USAID OIG is critical to ensuring transparency and accountability at USAID, as well as at the four other entities I would have oversight responsibility for.

I would continue to model the highest standards of leadership. Effective leaders marshal rather than direct. And I welcome the opportunity to marshal the dedicated professionals at AID OIG.

I would work to ensure they have the tools needed to combat fraud, waste, and abuse. Despite the many challenges these professionals face, they remain resolved to carry out their important audit and investigative mission around the globe. Nothing short of a work environment characterized by integrity is acceptable to support their dedication.

AID reflects the good will of the American people, and while working in areas affected by poverty, conflict, and instability, I saw firsthand how effective foreign assistance programs can help transform lives and unlock human potential.

I remain passionate about that cause and, to that end, to helping ensure that every dollar spent furthers foreign assistance goals.

If confirmed, I look forward to working with Congress to address your areas of concerns; ensure transparency; and provide complete, timely, and accurate information on the progress of key foreign assistance priorities.

Thank you very much for this opportunity to appear before you today. I am happy to answer any questions you may have.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Calvaresi Barr follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF ANN CALVARESI BARR

Chairman Perdue, Ranking Member Kaine, and members of the committee, it is a great honor to sit before you today as the President's nominee for Inspector General of the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID). I very much appreciate your consideration of my nomination, and if confirmed by the full Senate, I look forward to working with you on important oversight and accountability matters related to U.S. foreign assistance.

I would first like to recognize my family, who are always there for me: my husband, David, who is currently in Iraq on a State Department detail; and my daughter, Julianna, who completed her second year in International Studies at Dickinson College and is beginning a year of study in Italy. I would also like to recognize my mother, Julia, and late father, Anthony; and my siblings, Kathleen, Dominic, and Anthony. Also with me, in person or in spirit, are my mother-in-law, Aldonna; nieces, nephews, and other members of my sizeable Italian family. Together, they have instilled in me strong ethical and moral values and taught me that hard work, dedication, and humility are the foundation to building resilient relationships and mutual respect. I would also like to recognize my mentors, colleagues, and friends for their inspiration, encouragement, and support—some of whom are also here today. As you can see, I am surrounded by much love and personally blessed as a result.

It has been a privilege to serve in the government accountability community for more than three decades. My civil service career—which began in local government in my hometown of Reading, PA—includes 25 years at the Government Accountability Office (GAO) and 6 years at the U.S. Department of Transportation (DOT) Office of Inspector General (OIG). As the premier Government agency that wrote the standards for auditing and accounting, GAO served as a critical training ground for me from the time I started as a graduate co-op to my entry into the Senior Executive Service. During my tenure, I had the privilege to work with three outstanding Comptrollers General, as well as many other leaders who served as role models to me.

While at GAO, I led a number of complex and high-profile audits in multiple offices—including 5 years in GAO's former European Office in Frankfurt, Germany. These audits included assessments of large-scale, cross-cutting programs, and resulted in improved operations and significant cost savings across Government. Many of these audits focused on acquisition and procurement practices, financial and grant management, and export controls. I also worked closely with the Comptroller General to identify and develop key national indicators used by state, local, and foreign governments for gauging economic, social, cultural, and environmental health. This effort resulted in the development of a comprehensive system for assessing and improving the United States position in the world in these areas.

Particularly gratifying and fulfilling was work I performed while stationed overseas, where I took part in improving and overseeing plans for implementing programs that provide aid. This work concerned international development efforts and the state of human rights conditions in Somalia, Turkey, Israel, and the former Yugoslavia and Zaire. I also worked on audits related to national security concerns, such as the drawdown of forces from Europe, the evacuation of noncombatants, and the deployment of female forces to the Persian Gulf.

My GAO experience prepared me well for the next chapter of my Federal career—working alongside DOT's Inspector General, Calvin Scovel III, whose vision and exceptional leadership I learned from and are highly regarded throughout the OIG community. Within my first weeks as Principal Assistant Inspector General for Audit and Evaluation, I led the development of a comprehensive strategy for identifying and mitigating risks in DOT's oversight of $48 billion in transportation projects funded under the new American Recovery and Reinvestment Act. Our risk mitigation strategy enabled us to quickly identify and inform the Department of vulnerabilities that required immediate action or a sustained focus before funds were further obligated or expended. We subsequently adopted this approach for our surface transportation reauthorization and Hurricane Sandy relief audits.

During this time, I developed a vision for the Office of Audits and, in collaboration with senior managers, devised a strategic plan for the office with achievable goals, objectives, and performance measures. Ultimately, our aim was to enhance product quality and stress accountability for issuing timely and relevant reports. To get there, I worked with senior managers to streamline processes and institute new programs, policies, tools, and procedures.

After my first year at DOT, the inspector general selected me as his deputy, expanding the scope of my responsibilities to include providing leadership and direction for OIG's investigation and operational support activities. From this position, I was able to fully appreciate each office's distinct focus and outlook, as well as the need for greater synergies to fully develop and leverage our resources. Continual dedication to developing and motivating staff was critical to achieving these goals. I personally sponsored Communities of Practice, a forum where staff share knowledge to broaden perspectives and encourage greater coordination and partnering. I also established and participate in an OIG-wide mentoring program, monthly leadership brown bags for managers and line staff, an Adjunct Faculty Training Program, a Job Shadow Program, and an external Speakers Series.

Our returns on investment and positive employee survey scores demonstrate the success we have had in cultivating a skilled workforce and high-performing teams, building coalitions, branding the organization, and in achieving results. Over the past 5 years, our return on investment has averaged $26 for every dollar spent on our office, with a high in fiscal year 2013 of $41 for every appropriated dollar. During this time, we made over $8.5 billion in financial recommendations through our audits, and realized more than $1.8 billion in fines, restitutions, and recoveries from our investigations. We have also seen remarkable improvements in our Employee Viewpoint Survey scores. I am proud to report that last year, DOT's OIG ranked in the top 15 percent among the Government's 314 subcomponents. Among the Department's subcomponents and across the OIG community, we ranked first in effective leadership, support for diversity, and innovation. Moreover, we ranked in the top 10 among all 314 subcomponents in those three categories as well as work-life balance.

If confirmed as USAID's inspector general, I would approach this new responsibility with a clear understanding that foreign assistance is an integral part of U.S. engagement with an increasingly interdependent world, and that the success of USAID's mission depends in large part on effective partnerships and coordination with the State Department, Department of Defense, and other Federal entities, as well as with industry, foreign governments, other international donors, and the academic and scientific communities. The independent work of USAID OIG is critical to ensuring transparency, integrity, and accountability at USAID, the Millennium Challenge Corporation, U.S. African Development Foundation, Inter-American Foundation, and Overseas Private Investment Corporation. It is equally important that OIG systems and processes thoroughly reflect oversight community standards and best practices.

If I have the honor and privilege of serving as USAID's next inspector general, I would continue to model the highest standards of leadership and integrity. My experience has taught me that the most effective leaders, past and present, share at least one common trait—they marshal rather than direct. I welcome the opportunity to marshal the workforce of committed professionals at USAID OIG. With shared vision, clear expectations, strategic planning, and stewardship of resources, I would work to ensure they have the tools needed to fully engage in identifying and responding to major management challenges and to combat program fraud, waste, and abuse. Despite the many challenges these professionals face, they remain resolved to carry out their important mission—that is, to promote efficiency, effectiveness, and integrity in foreign assistance programs and operations around the world. Nothing short of a highly motivating, positive, trusting, and productive work environment is acceptable to support their dedication.

Aid reflects the good will of the American people, and during my time working throughout Europe, Africa, and the Middle East, I saw firsthand how effectively implemented foreign assistance programs can help transform lives and unlock human potential. I remain passionate about the cause and, to that end, to helping ensure that every dollar spent furthers foreign assistance goals.

If confirmed as Inspector General, I look forward to continuing my Government service at USAID and to working with Congress to address your concerns; ensure transparency; and provide complete, timely, and accurate information on the progress of key foreign assistance priorities.

Thank you for this opportunity to appear before you today. I am happy to answer any questions you may have.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you very much.

Ambassador Robinson currently serves as Principal Deputy High Representative at Sarajevo, Bosnia and Herzegovina. He is nominated to serve as Assistant Secretary of State for Conflict and Stabilization Operations, and coordinator for Reconstruction and Stabilization.

It sounds like four jobs to me, Mr. Ambassador.

Ambassador Robinson.

STATEMENT OF DAVID MALCOLM ROBINSON, NOMINATED TO BE AN ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE (CONFLICT AND STABILIZATION OPERATIONS) AND COORDINATOR FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND STABILIZATION

Ambassador ROBINSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Ranking Member Kaine. It is an honor to be here today.

I first want to thank the President, the Secretary of State, and Under Secretary Sewall for the confidence they have placed in me.

I look forward, if confirmed, to working with you and other members of this committee to advance the difficult but essential work of the Bureau of Conflict and Stabilization Operations.

But before I say anything else, I want to recognize and thank my wife, Donna, who is here today. She has been the rock of stability and grace in an otherwise hectic Foreign Service life.

So thank you, Donna.

Senators, I have spent much of my 30 years as a Foreign Service officer, nearly half of those as a member of the Senior Foreign Service, in conflict zones or in other unstable environments, from Afghanistan, Bosnia, and Central America, to regions of Africa and Asia that have been scarred by war. I know intimately the civilian costs of violent conflict, and I have worked extensively with other actors in the international arena to try to address those costs.

Unfortunately, the cost in ruined lives and political instability continues to grow. The number of refugees and internally displaced persons worldwide is now nearly 60 million, more than at any other time since World War II, and no corner of the globe is immune, even in areas in which the roots of representative civilian governance are beginning to take root. Some 30 countries in Africa will have elections in the next 2½ years. Those expressions of democratic practice must be protected against efforts to undermine or delegitimize them through violent conflict.

Repeating cycles of conflict sap our diplomatic, military, and development resources. There is no simple solution, including, as the President and the Secretary of State recently noted, a purely military response.

Instead, we have to use all the tools at our disposal, including civilian, to anticipate, prevent, or limit conflict, whenever and wherever we can. A focus on prevention is not only cost effective, it also gives us a chance to find lasting political and social responses to these challenges, because there is a chance to break the cycles of violence.

Three and a half years ago, CSO was created to give the Secretary, the Department of State, and, most importantly, our diplomatic missions overseas the information and tools they need to more effectively address the threat of violent conflict. There have been notable successes. For example, CSO is supporting inter-agency efforts to stem the tide of al-Shabaab in the Horn of Africa and Boko Haram in the Lake Chad Basin. It has helped prevent violence around elections in Kenya, Nigeria, and Bangladesh. And it has strengthened civilian security in some of the most dangerous parts of Central America.

At the same time, I know well that CSO's mission and methodology have not always been clear and consistent. I read last year's hard-hitting inspector general report, and I take it seriously, as does the current leadership of CSO. Most of the recommendations already have been closed, and the few remaining are well on their way to successful conclusion. These changes reflect a maturing culture within the Bureau, and I welcome the chance to make them lasting and to better integrate the Bureau within the broader work of the Department.

CSO has a talented and dedicated staff. What it needs now is seasoned leadership. If confirmed, I will work to make sure the Secretary and our diplomatic missions have reliable tools based on solid analysis and lessons learned to anticipate, prevent, and respond to conflict, especially the worst forms of conflict directed at civilians: mass atrocities and violent extremism.

I will work to ensure the accountability and effectiveness of our efforts through robust monitoring and evaluation and a sound management controls program. And I will strengthen our partnerships within the Department, the interagency community, and among our allies.

Finally, if confirmed, I assure you I will lead a Bureau that measurably strengthens American diplomacy in this critical arena.

I welcome your questions. Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Ambassador Robinson follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF AMBASSADOR DAVID M. ROBINSON

Thank you Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Cardin, and distinguished members of the committee. It is an honor to be here today as the nominee for Assistant Secretary for the Bureau of Conflict and Stabilization Operations. I am grateful for the confidence President Obama, Secretary Kerry, and Under Secretary Sewall have placed in me. If confirmed, I look forward to working with you and other members of the committee to advance the difficult work of preventing and responding to violent conflict.

I have spent much of my 30 years as a Foreign Service officer, almost half as a member of the Senior Foreign Service, in conflict zones and unstable environments, from Afghanistan, Bosnia, and Central America, to other regions of Asia and Africa scarred by war and persecution. I know intimately the civilian costs of violent conflict, atrocity, and extremism, and I have worked extensively with other actors in the international community to overcome them.

Unfortunately, the cost in ruined lives and political instability continues to grow. The number of refugees and internally displaced persons worldwide is now nearly 60 million, more than at any time since World War II, and no corner of the world is immune. Even where representative civilian governance is taking root—some 30 African countries will have elections over the next 2½ years—those exercises in democracy must be protected against threats to violently undermine or delegitimize them.

Conflict carries other costs, as well, sapping our diplomatic, military and development resources. There is no simple solution, including, as the President and the Secretary of State recently noted, a purely military response. Instead, we have to use all the tools at our disposal, including civilian ones, to anticipate and prevent conflict, wherever and whenever we can. A focus on prevention is not only more cost effective; it also gives us the space to find effective, lasting political and social responses to these challenges.

Three and a half years ago, CSO was created to enhance the State Department's ability to prevent and respond to conflict, giving the Secretary of State, regional Assistant Secretaries and our Ambassadors the information and tools they need to more effectively understand and respond to the threat of violent conflict. There have been notable successes. CSO's talented and dedicated staff, for example, is supporting interagency efforts to stem the tide of al-Shabaab in the Horn of Africa and Boko Haram in the Lake Chad Basin. They have helped prevent violence around elections in Kenya, Nigeria, and Bangladesh. And they have strengthened civilian security in some of the most dangerous parts of Central America.

At the same time, I know well that CSO's mission and methodology have not always been clear and consistent. I read last year's hard-hitting inspector general report. Most of the recommendations have already been closed, and the few remaining are well on their way to successful conclusion. These changes reflect a maturing culture within the Bureau. I welcome the chance to make them enduring and to better integrate the Bureau within the work of the Department.

What CSO needs now is seasoned leadership. If confirmed, my priorities will be:

- ◆ To ensure the Secretary and our embassies have reliable tools based on solid analysis and lessons learned to anticipate, prevent, and respond to conflict, especially the most severe forms of conflict affecting civilians, such as atrocities and violent extremism.
- ◆ To assure accountability and effectiveness of our efforts through robust monitoring and evaluation and sound management controls.

- ♦ To serve as an active resource for and active partner with the Department and with our interagency and international counterparts in tackling these challenges.

Finally, if confirmed, I assure you I will lead a Bureau that strengthens American diplomacy where it is needed most, where conflict and extremism undermine United States interests and values.

Thank you, again, Mr. Chairman, for the opportunity to appear before you today. I am happy to answer any questions.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you, Ambassador.

Next we have Mr. Nolan, who is nominated to serve as Ambassador to Suriname. Mr. Nolan currently serves as Minister Counselor for Political Affairs at the U.S. Embassy in Ottawa.

Mr. Nolan.

STATEMENT OF EDWIN RICHARD NOLAN, JR., NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF SURINAME

Mr. NOLAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Ranking Member Kaine. I appreciate this opportunity to appear before you today.

I am honored to be President Obama's nominee to serve as the United States Ambassador to the Republic of Suriname. I thank the President for the confidence he has placed in me by putting me forward to the Senate for consideration, and I thank Secretary Kerry for his trust and support.

I have had the honor to serve our country for 35 years as a Foreign Service officer. Every day of those 35 years, I have had the love and support of my wife, Tricia, who I would like to introduce to the committee, along with my children, Ryan and Katie, of whom I am immensely proud. I would not be here today without my wonderful family.

During those 35 years, I have had the opportunity to contribute to some historic successes in U.S. foreign policy. Among them were the first conventional arms control agreements with the Soviet Union in the 1980s, the successful integration of the Warsaw Pact members into NATO in the 1990s, and the indispensable U.S. efforts to bring lasting peace to Northern Ireland through the implementation of the Good Friday Agreement.

I have also had the opportunity to lead large, multiagency missions, as Deputy Chief of Mission in both Cyprus and the Netherlands, and then later as Chargé d'Affaires at Mission Netherlands from 2011 to 2013. I also gained experience on many Caribbean regional issues in that time as a result of the Netherlands' continued engagement with its Caribbean territories and its historic relationship with Suriname.

If confirmed, I believe my leadership and policy experience will serve our mission and our team in Suriname well. If confirmed, I will proudly represent the United States in Suriname, a country whose people are among the most ethnically and religiously diverse in the world. Its citizens of African, Asian, European, and indigenous descent, practicing Christianity, Hinduism, Islam, Judaism, and indigenous religions, live peacefully and productively together.

As someone who has worked to build understanding between diverse religious and ethnic communities, from Protestants and Catholics in Ireland to Turkish and Greek Cypriots in Cyprus, I look forward to engaging with Suriname's communities to learn how they might be able to share their experiences with others in the region and around the world.

If confirmed, I will also work with the Surinamese Government to promote the adoption of policies to increase U.S. trade and investment. Increased trade has the potential to drive progress and growth in Suriname, and it is in the interests of both of our economies.

We will work with Suriname to find solutions that tap into, as well as conserve, the country's extensive natural resources. The people of Suriname also are heirs to a vast rainforest and other natural areas that are contributing great economic and environmental benefits to Suriname and to the world.

The Obama administration's efforts to combat the dangers posed by pollution and the risks of climate change are tied to the conservation and health of such ecosystems. If confirmed, I will work hard with the Surinamese to help protect these critical natural resources and environment, a goal that I firmly believe is in the interests of both the United States and the people of Suriname.

It is also in our interest to strengthen the rule of law in Suriname. In parliamentary elections this past May, President Desire Bouterse's party won a slim majority, and he has been re-elected to a second 5-year term. International observers found this election to be generally free and fair.

We remain concerned, however, about some aspects of democratic governance, corruption, and judicial independence. If I am granted the opportunity to serve, I will continue the efforts of my predecessor to press the Government of Suriname for an independent judiciary capable of protecting and advancing democracy and the rule of law.

Citizen security is another key goal of this administration in the region. The people of Suriname are benefiting from U.S.-sponsored programs, such as the Caribbean Basin Security Initiative, through providing technical training to law enforcement officers, combating money-laundering and financial crimes, and preparing at-risk youth for successful and crime-free lives. If confirmed, I will seek to gain an increased commitment from the Government of Suriname to this partnership.

Of course, my first priority would be protecting the safety and welfare of Americans in Suriname, both private citizens and the Embassy community. To ensure the safety and security of our staff in Suriname, we are building a new Embassy compound in Paramaribo and plan to move in next summer. I will work with the Government of Suriname, along with local police and other security services, to reinforce cooperation that will keep Americans secure.

If confirmed, I look forward to representing the United States in Suriname, working with you and your colleagues in Congress on behalf of the administration, while also engaging Suriname in a regular and respectful dialogue on broad international issues to exchange views and, where possible, identify means of mutual interest and agreement.

Mr. Chairman, I stand ready to answer any questions you might have. Thank you.

Mr. Chairman, I stand ready to answer any questions you might have. Thank you.

Senator PERDUE. Mr. Nolan, thank you.

Next, we have Mr. John Estrada. Mr. Estrada is nominated for Ambassador to Trinidad and Tobago. He currently serves as senior manager and senior program project manager at Lockheed Martin.

Mr. Estrada.

STATEMENT OF JOHN L. ESTRADA, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO

Mr. ESTRADA. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Ranking Member Kaine. Good afternoon. It is an honor to appear before you today.

I want to express my gratitude to President Obama and Secretary Kerry for the trust and confidence they have placed in me through their renomination of me to represent my country as the next Ambassador to the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago. I am particularly thrilled at the prospect of representing the United States, if confirmed, in the country of my birth.

I was born in Trinidad and Tobago, and at the age of 14, I immigrated to the United States to forge a new life. I brought with me a respect for diversity and an inherent sense of the equal value of all people. I served with honor in the U.S. Marine Corps, attaining the corps' highest enlisted rank as the 15th Sergeant Major in the history of the Marine Corps.

After retiring from the Marine Corps, I continued serving my country as a Presidential appointed commission member of the American Battle Monuments Commission and as a committee member on the Defense Advisory Committee for Women in the Services.

In the private sector, I led Lockheed Martin Training Solutions, Inc., a wholly owned subsidiary company specializing in flight training and logistics solutions.

I firmly believe that one of the greatest aspirations of all free people is to live their lives to the fullest without limitations based on their ethnicity, class, race, gender, or sexual orientation. If confirmed as Ambassador, with that ideal as my guide, I would seek to strengthen the ties between the citizens and elected representatives of our two great nations.

Trinidad and Tobago is an important Caribbean partner of the United States. The relationships between our countries rest on a strong foundation. We share a common language and a firm commitment to democratic principles, the rule of law, and a free market system.

The United States mission to Trinidad and Tobago has three strategic objectives.

On security, the mission first works to protect American citizens in Trinidad and Tobago. Related to the security of Americans, the Embassy works with the Government of Trinidad and Tobago to improve the capacity of Trinidadian law enforcement and justice sector institutions to reduce violent crime and illicit trafficking, safeguard human rights, and create safer communities.

Second, the mission promotes increased commerce and transparent investment climates to enhance our mutual prosperity.

Third, on social inclusion, the mission conducts extensive outreach and encourages regional leadership by Trinidad and Tobago to protect vulnerable populations, including at-risk youth.

If confirmed, I look forward to leading our efforts in these crucial areas.

The United States and Caribbean partners have developed the Caribbean Basin Security Initiative, an ongoing, multifaceted citizen security initiative for the Caribbean, of which Trinidad and Tobago is a key player. In creating the Caribbean Basin Security Initiative, the United States and Caribbean partners are attempting to combat the drug trade and other transnational crimes that threaten regional security with the goal of substantially reducing illicit trafficking, increasing public safety, strengthening the rule of law, and addressing the underlying social and economic root causes of crime.

I will do my utmost, if confirmed, to increase cooperation and encourage Trinidad and Tobago to take more of a leadership role in security in the Caribbean, where it has much to offer its neighbors.

As a resource-rich country, Trinidad and Tobago is full of opportunity for energy companies. The United States works cooperatively with Trinidad and Tobago, both bilaterally and through the Caribbean Energy Security Initiative, to develop new avenues for regional energy security and conservation.

I am excited Trinidad and Tobago is playing a growing role in regional integration and promoting business relationships in the hemisphere. If confirmed, I would advocate on behalf of U.S. companies and commercial interests to ensure a level playing field and support their engagements with Trinidad and Tobago.

Education is the foundation for economic growth. If confirmed, I will work with the Government of Trinidad and Tobago to explore ways in which we can provide at-risk youth and other vulnerable populations with tools that can help them succeed.

I firmly believe that my 34 years of Active Duty service in the United States Marine Corps and my experience in the private sector, coupled with my personal history, have prepared me to represent the Government and people of the United States to the Government and people of Trinidad and Tobago.

If confirmed, it would be my great honor to work closely with this committee and others in Congress to advance our shared objectives in the Caribbean.

Thank you for allowing me the opportunity to appear before this distinguished committee. I look forward to answering your questions.

Senator PERDUE. Mr. Estrada, thank you very much.

Finally, we have Mr. Allen, who is currently a private investor and philanthropist. He is nominated to serve as the U.S. executive director for the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

Mr. Allen.

STATEMENT OF SCOTT ALLEN, NOMINATED TO BE U.S. DIRECTOR OF THE EUROPEAN BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. ALLEN. Thank you, Chairman Perdue and Ranking Member Kaine. I am grateful for the opportunity to appear before you today.

I am honored that President Obama has nominated me to serve as the U.S. executive director for the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

I would like to take this opportunity to introduce my family members that are here today.

Bette Allen, my mother, who is 91 years old, who is becoming a regular at confirmation hearings, as she attended the hearing for my brother, Craig Allen, who was confirmed by this committee to serve as Ambassador to Brunei in July 2014.

My wife, Kanako, who has devoted her career to working on economic development issues, first at the United Nations and currently at the World Bank. She is my rock.

Finally, our two daughters, Lisa, who has just returned from a couple of years in Kyoto, Japan; and Sara, who works in finance in New York.

I come from a very close family with a history of government service. My sister, Sara Bowden, and her husband, Dennis Bowden, are also here today. During the Reagan administration, Sara worked at the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy. Dennis spent nearly 30 years at the CIA.

And prior to his confirmation to serve as the Ambassador to Brunei, my brother, Craig Allen, spent a long career working at the Department of Commerce.

Over the course of a 22-year career in investment banking, I became a specialist in emerging markets and credit. In the early 1980s, I was part of a small team of bankers focused on the sovereign rescheduling of commercial bank debt. My primary country of focus was the Philippines, but I also worked on distressed sovereigns in Latin America as well as Eastern Europe, specifically Yugoslavia.

Through this work, I came to appreciate the tradeoffs between balancing lenders' need to protect loan assets with the sovereign nations' desires to reduce pressure from debt service payments so that economic growth could improve their citizens' livelihoods and increase repayment probabilities.

Thirty years later, the players have changed, but many of the same dynamics continue to play out in Europe.

I arrived in London in 1992 to lead Chemical Bank's emerging markets business. Just a couple of years earlier, during President George H.W. Bush's administration, the EBRD had been established, with the United States contributing 10 percent of the capital, the largest single country stake.

The founding vision of the EBRD remains sound: fostering the economic vitality of the private sector through debt and equity capital to help countries effectively transition to market-oriented, pluralistic, and democratic societies. At the time, the context was a post-Soviet era. EBRD's client countries were Eastern European countries that had just thrown off the yoke of communism.

The EBRD today has new challenges. The EBRD has taken its founding vision into select countries in Northern Africa, Turkey, and Jordan with the same conviction that the development of an economically vibrant private sector will foster a political transition to democracy in these new client countries. At the same time, it is working to complete the transition of several more advanced Eastern European countries by aiming to reduce investments in these countries while recognizing that there is still a role for the EBRD, given the effects of European economic turmoil and the Russian aggression in Ukraine.

Over the medium term, however, these countries will need to follow the path of the Czech Republic, which has graduated from EBRD investments.

EBRD's role in Ukraine deserves special mention. At the time of the unlawful annexation of Crimea, Ukraine was the second-largest recipient of outstanding loans among EBRD countries of operation. Today, virtually all commercial and private sources of fresh capital are reluctant to invest in Ukraine, as lenders and investors judge the risk as too extreme, absent broader signals of support for Ukraine.

The EBRD, true to its mission, continues to provide that signal and to make new lending available to private sector entities and the government. For calendar year 2015, the EBRD expects to make an additional $1.25 billion in new cash disbursements. If confirmed, I will seek to encourage the EBRD to continue to provide new financing to Ukraine entities on a prudent basis.

My long involvement in emerging markets and portfolio management provides me with a deep understanding of credit and event risk. I also ran sales teams from London that covered institutional investors in Eastern Europe, Russia, Turkey, and the Middle East, many of the same countries where the EBRD is most active.

If confirmed, I would like to focus on how the EBRD can most effectively support our allies in the region while balancing the financial risks that entails. My background and experience provides me with the skill set to ask the right questions and to understand the answers.

Thank you again for considering my nomination, and I look forward to answering any questions you may have.

Thank you again for considering my nomination, and I look forward to answering any questions you may have.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you all very much. Now we will move to questions, and we will do it in reverse order.

But I am going to ask one question of each of you, just to get it started, and it is the same question, but it will be for your different posts.

A lot of times when we have these questions, we talk about the historical record and what you have done to get here. I accept the fact that all of you have stellar careers. It is obvious from reading your backgrounds. So I would like to know, for the record, how you see your next post, what those responsibilities would entail. So specifically, I would like to see what you think your priorities might be, as you look at this new responsibility, and what the challenges that you anticipate might be as well.

So, Mr. Allen, you are warmed up, so we will start with you and then we will go in reverse order. Thank you.

Mr. ALLEN. Thank you for the question.

If confirmed, I would like to think that my long experience in managing risk and understanding risk would help the EBRD manage its portfolio.

Clearly, working in emerging markets and sovereigns is full of credit risk and event risk that need to be understood and prudent measures taken to mitigate the risk wherever possible.

In the case of Ukraine, there was a huge event risk. It is noteworthy that EBRD has managed its risk prudently and is continuing to lend to Ukraine, thereby aligning our interests in Ukraine with EBRD.

So the management of risk is an area that I would like to focus on while at the EBRD, if confirmed.

Thank you.

Senator PERDUE. Mr. Estrada.

Mr. ESTRADA. If confirmed, I have three priorities, as I see it. First and foremost is the protection of U.S. citizens traveling, visiting, and working in the country of Trinidad and Tobago. My second priority would be continuing efforts to strengthen the capacity of Trinidadian law enforcement and also improving the justice sector system, so they could deal with the crime and drug issues that they currently face. My third priority would be to focus on improving the climate in Trinidad and Tobago and throughout the Caribbean region for a fair and open, transparent trade market system.

Senator PERDUE. What challenges do you think you will have in trying to achieve those three objectives?

Mr. ESTRADA. For the first challenge, protection of U.S. citizens, Trinidad and Tobago is struggling. They are challenged by high crime. We need to ensure that we educate Americans visiting the country. For those that are living in the country, we need to continue to educate them on safe areas, where not to go, and where to go for assistance. We need to continue to reach out to them. That would be my first challenge. We should be communicating with every American in the country. That would be my biggest challenge.

As far as strengthening the capacity of Trinidad law enforcement and justice sector systems, the country continues to struggle because of the illegal narcotics trade. They continue to struggle with corruption in some areas. And they need to strengthen their borders. They have very open sea lanes, so the challenge would be to get them to move a little bit more quickly on addressing those areas of concern.

Senator PERDUE. Great. Thank you.

Mr. Nolan.

Mr. NOLAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Like Mr. Estrada, my number one goal would be the safety and security of both official and nonofficial Americans in Suriname. The challenge we face there is continuing to professionalize the police and military institutions in the government; education and democratic control of the military; and a full range of law enforcement programs that would improve the police and military's performance. The problem in Suriname is not terrorism at the moment, even though that can change anywhere at any time. It is crime. So that makes it very important to work with the police.

I think that leads into the second goal I would have, which are the issues under citizen security, democratic governance, and the rule of law. If we can work with the Surinamese to strengthen institutions there, it is not only a benefit in and of itself, but it will help us deal with some of our other concerns there, such as the transshipment of drugs and the trafficking in persons.

These are some of the issues that we want to get at with the Surinamese, and I hope to do so, if confirmed.

My third area would be to facilitate economic growth and development in Suriname. We have some significant U.S. investment in Suriname, including a very recent billion-dollar investment by a U.S. mining company in gold-mining. We want to move the Surinamese to a more sustainable, environmentally sensitive development pattern.

Their rain forest is one of the world's ecological treasures. If we can make sure they develop both for the benefit of the Surinamese people, for U.S. investors, but also to preserve that environment, to the extent possible, it will be very important.

Thank you.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you.

Ambassador.

Ambassador ROBINSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, CSO is a young bureau that faces a complex and global challenge, and since its inception it has undergone a period of dynamic learning as it adjusts to that challenge and as it seeks to ensure its place in the interagency community. What I can say is that it has an extraordinarily dedicated and talented staff.

So, my goal, my priority, is to provide the kind of disciplined leadership that seizes that staff, directs its attention, its talents, and its dedication to getting its job done and knitting that skill into the main fabric of the State Department, so that it delivers what it is designed to deliver in a way that is not only recognized as useful for the State Department and for the interagency community but is essential as it faces the challenge of violent conflict.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you.

Ms. Calvaresi Barr.

Ms. CALVARESI BARR. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I look really forward to assuming this role, if confirmed. I believe my 32 years in the accountability community positions me well.

While I am not at the agency currently, I think I know how to get this job done, so a couple things that I would want to begin with. It is about learning the agency. And it sounds very simplistic, but it is a rule that I always followed. I would want to get a sense of the work, the processes, and the people, what is working well, what is not working well. That means I need to be in the listening mode. That means that I need to engage with our staff. I have to look at what sets our priorities. And the most important thing is to make sure that we have processes in place that yield work that is quality, that is reflective of the standards, and that is transparent to Congress and to the American public.

I would certainly want to reach out to members of this committee to understand what your interests are, legislative interests, priorities for the upcoming year, so that I can understand how our work can best meet those needs.

In addition, I would want to coordinate with the AID administrator to understand what that individual believes are some of the greatest challenges and vulnerabilities.

At the end of the day, and I think a couple of my panel members here mentioned it too, people are your greatest asset in an organization. And if you invest in them and you invest in their development, and you are a good leader that marshals and does not direct, it is amazing what you can get done. And the mission can be very, very well-served.

So that would be how I would approach it.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you.

We will move on to the ranking member, Senator Kaine.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thanks to all of you.

Ms. Barr, I wanted to ask you a question. I recognize you are not at AID now, so this is more how you would approach this. In the October 14 OIG audit of USAID and USAID's compliance with FISMA, the Financial Information Security Management Act, the audit had a conclusion that USAID does not comply with FISMA. Although the agency has developed and documented the majority of the information security policies and procedures required under the act, USAID has not established an effective risk management program to ensure that policies and procedures are assessed and working as intended.

Consequently, the audit found a number of information system weaknesses that, if exploited, could adversely affect the confidentiality, integrity, and availability of USAID's data and information systems, and ultimately could have a negative impact on the agency's ability to protect the security of its information and information systems.

This is the kind of warning that I am sure is not unique to USAID, and we are dealing here with the challenge of the OPM data breach.

How would you in the position kind of approach that kind of recommendation, in terms of trying to get USAID to comply more with the FISMA requirements, as described?

Ms. CALVARESI BARR. Thank you for the question, Ranking Member Kaine.

FISMA is a very, very important program and policy that we need to be very, very closely attuned to. I would say, in IT systems, the security posture of any IT system has to be absolutely secure. So conducting work audits that reveal where there are weaknesses or vulnerabilities in those IT systems, it is important to point out what those vulnerabilities are from an agency-wide perspective. In the case of AID, maybe even try to drill down as we did in the case of DOT, not just provide sort of the scorecard on the state of security posture across the agency but a scorecard by, in the case of DOT, administrations.

So what I would like to do is take a look at that report. I would like to see what the recommendations are. I would like to see the status of those recommendations, the extent to which they are followed up. We will continue with our required work in the FISMA area, and we would make sure that that system, as well as any other systems, have to be about protecting the integrity of data. And FISMA speaks to the heart of the integrity of data.

So you would have my full commitment to keep a close eye on that.

Senator KAINE. Here is a question that is really more about philosophically the role of an IG, as I am kind of new on the committee still at 2½ years. I am really learning the job. There was a controversy within USAID about a previous acting director and a suggestion that this acting director, between 2011 and 2013, was removing from public audit reports recommendations or challenging comments and putting them in private letters to management instead. Some in the agency basically said that that was motivated to try to make him or others look better than they were.

From an IG perspective, I mean, I am assuming that sometimes you come up with recommendations and some you might share confidentially or in a prefatory way or a preliminary way to try get people to make improvements, and then some you make public so that the world will know. How as an IG do you handle that as you are analyzing the performance of this agency that you are independently charged with overseeing?

Ms. CALVARESI BARR. Certainly, I am aware of the concerns that you mentioned. I am aware of them but I do not know the key facts surrounding them, so I do not want to speculate actually on any of the particulars.

But to your larger question as to what is the appropriate role of the IG and concern for those matters, it goes back to my role of ensuring that we have absolutely airtight processes that ensure that our work is evidence-based, that it is of quality, that it is free from any type of outside influence. The process has to include a good vetting, verification of the data, quality control checks of the data in-house before it is publicly released.

So I want to take a really good look at the process that was used there that perhaps prompted maybe some weaknesses, and the process that prompted some of these questions, to make sure that we go ahead and fix any of that.

At the end of the day, the most important thing is transparency of our work products. There should be no hidden findings anywhere. There should not be reports that are banished to management letters that never see the light of day. So you have my commitment that all of our work will be posted publicly upon final publication of the work.

Senator KAINE. Thank you very much, Ms. Barr.

Now to you, Mr. Robinson, two questions. I would like to ask you about Honduras, and I would like to ask you about Syria and the CSO work that is being done.

I know there is work being done in Honduras because of the serious violence problem there. Honduras has been a good U.S. ally, but this is a very, very challenging area. In the Northern Triangle, you have the highest murder rates in the world, three of the five highest murder rates in the world in those countries. The President has proposed a significant investment in a plan in Central America to help them deal with the security situations.

What is the CSO currently doing or what might it do, if Congress sees fit to appropriate significant funds to this initiative, to help Honduras and the other countries in the Northern Triangle deal with the violence issues? I ask because I lived there 35 years ago and have a particular and personal interest in it.

Ambassador ROBINSON. Thank you, Senator.

Under the President's proposal, CSO would, in the first instance, design and then manage the monitoring and evaluation function to make sure that the proposal—that the programs—that are implemented in Honduras or in Central America—are, in fact, working as intended. As part of the monitoring and evaluation program, CSO has a commitment to developing the lessons learned that it then transfers to future planning and programs. So, it is a feedback loop that we would continue to refine the program in an intergovernmental fashion to get the best use out of it.

On the particulars of Honduras itself, CSO launched a program in conjunction with USAID to do two things, first to address the tremendous violence that made Honduras, at that time, from 2012 to 2014 when the program was running, the murder capital of the world and also to prepare to limit the damaging impact that violence would have on elections in Honduras.

So, working with local NGOs, local civil society organizations, and with our USAID partners, CSO launched a program in Honduras to bring together civil society officials and police to create early warning systems, to create fast response systems, allowing community leaders to intervene where violence would be or was beginning to become even more problematic.

In addition, working in the justice sector, it put pressure, through these civil society groups and through these NGOs, on the government and on particularly the attorneys general to perform their jobs. The result was astounding. The number of convictions increased enormously, where CSO had been working with the attorneys general.

CSO has turned that program over, as it was intended to do, has transitioned it to the local implementers, to local partners in the field, and it continues to run today. So, the program is still effective. It is still functioning, and it will expand.

CSO continues to support that. The Embassy supports it as well. And INL also supports that program.

So, it is a good example of the interagency aspect of CSO's work.

On elections violence, CSO identified the hotspots that were likely to erupt. It created, again with local implementers, the civil society groups that could respond to the kind of political dialogue that was provoking electoral violence. It mapped out the major actors—both pro and con—and gave those, of course, to the Embassy, to the Ambassador. The Ambassador made phone calls to those actors, and, in fact, the elections did occur without the eruptions of violence that were anticipated in those areas.

Following the elections, which is also a critical period to monitor violence, of course, the Ambassador actually visited those areas and talked to those people. The result was an extraordinarily strengthened regime of civil society action to take responsibility for the street violence that otherwise may have impeded the elections, and that, again, continues today.

At the end of the day, one of the benefits of the CSO action was to turn over to the Embassy, to turn over to our diplomatic mission, a new network of actors that can directly address the kind of violence that has disrupted Honduras.

Senator Kaine. It is a very important issue, not just because I live there. I am not asking just for that reason. Obviously, with the huge upturn in the unaccompanied minors coming to the southern border of the United States heavily from Honduras, El Salvador, and Guatemala, driven by violence issues, smart investments and smart CSO participation in antiviolenence strategies will have a direct benefit to the U.S. system as well. We are close partners.

Let me ask you about Syria. I recently did a codel to Syria, and I met with individuals connected with the START team under the leadership of Mark Ward. I know that a lot of work of the CSO as a new bureau initially was done dealing with the Syrian refugee crisis. But I understand that that work has now been moved primarily from the CSO division within State over to the NEA division within State.

Could you just describe why that is? I know there have been efforts to define what the CSO mission is within State, but I am curious about the reason for that transfer.

Ambassador Robinson. Yes, Senator.

Most CSO programs are designed to transition to a more sustainable platform. The purpose of CSO is to be agile, is to go in and to seek innovative, if that is what is required, or creative responses to problems, to fill in gaps that cannot be filled in, but not to substitute for capacity that can be found in country.

CSO is not designed to remain in a place to be the operator for extended periods of time.

As I mentioned in the Honduras example, CSO successfully transitioned its programs to local implementers. Obviously, Syria is a different story. The local implementers are not quite available to us at this point.

Consequently, CSO did transition its programs to the NEA Bureau. That transition is now complete. That said, CSO remains engaged, in particularly staffing General Allen's office and the counter-ISIL work and on the Liberated Areas Working Group, and we have a broad cadre of personnel in CSO with great experience in that part of the world. So, we remain deeply engaged in the planning efforts, but not in the actual implementation efforts, at this point.

Senator Kaine. Mr. Chair, can I continue with questions for the other witnesses?

Senator Perdue. Absolutely.

Senator Kaine. I have gone over my time.

Senator Perdue. No, you are in good shape.

Senator Kaine. These are important positions.

I actually would like to ask you, Mr. Nolan and Mr. Estrada, kind of the same question for Suriname and Trinidad and Tobago. You both mentioned public safety and security issues. We still continue to see major drug activity, drug transit from South America, often through Central America, through Honduras, as we were just describing, to the United States.

General Kelly has testified often before the Armed Services Committee, where I serve, and has just basically said, in the SOUTHCOM domain, the resources for interdiction are just not what he would hope. He says I watch 75 percent of drugs coming into the United States just go right by me, and he was talking in an antisequester message, but, certainly, he is also talking about cooperation between the U.S. military in the SOUTHCOM space and other U.S. partners, State and others, as well as the militaries of the nations that we are dealing with.

Talk a little bit about, in Suriname, and then in Trinidad and Tobago, the current status of mil-to-mil relationships, what you might do in your ambassadorial posts to help basically with this interdiction effort.

Mr. Estrada, you talked about sea lanes needing to be better controlled to help this issue in Trinidad and Tobago. The United States can play a role in that.

Talk a little bit about our military cooperation with each of your nations.

Mr. Nolan first.

Mr. NOLAN. Thank you, Senator. It is, certainly, an important question.

Suriname is not a drug-producing country, but it is a major transshipment country. No drug transshipments are good. They tend not to come to the U.S. from Suriname. They are largely going to Africa and to Europe. But that does not mean we do not need to take action against them.

A large problem that we have with Suriname is, even with the best of cooperation from the military, if we had that, it is just a very large and very unpopulated and difficult space to know what is moving through the country.

So what we have tried to do with our programs, through SOUTHCOM, a partnership program with South Dakota National Guard and the Surinamese military, and with INL programming, is train the trainers on how to improve their ability to deal with controlling that space. We have tried to provide some additional capacity, because a lot of the drug flow does move along rivers once it gets into the country.

To be honest, in the preelection period we had in Suriname in May, we were not getting tremendous cooperation from the government. A lot of the programs had stepped back a little bit even though training programs are still continuing.

With the new government, we do have the same President, but I always take it as an opportunity to engage with the new government. We have some new ministers and we want to try again to engage them more fully. We think there are a lot of good people in the Surinamese military who really want to cooperate. I will try, if I am confirmed, to get more central buy-in so they get the resources and support they need to take advantage of the programs that we can offer both through INL funding and SOUTHCOM.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Mr. Nolan.

Mr. Estrada, the SOUTHCOM question.

Mr. ESTRADA. Thank you, Senator Kaine.

The United States has instituted a comprehensive interagency, anticrime, and counternarcotics strategy aimed at assisting Trinidad and Tobago law enforcement agencies to detect and interdict narcotics and to develop the skills to manage the evidence needed to prosecute those crimes. Agencies that are playing a part in this effort are the Drug Enforcement Agency, which works to help disrupt the flow of narcotics to the United States. This has, in fact, resulted in seizures of large quantities of cocaine and marijuana.

There is still a lot of work to be done, working with all the different agencies. You mentioned SOUTHCOM. If confirmed as U.S. Ambassador to Trinidad and Tobago, I will focus on those areas and work with the Government of Trinidad and Tobago. They realize they have a challenge in this area, and I will do everything I can to help them address that issue.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Mr. Estrada.

Finally, Mr. Allen, a lot of the work that has been done by the EBRD initially has been with firms in Russia, so I was kind of going to ask, as you come into this post, how has the Russian dynamic with Ukraine and other European nations, how is that likely to change our trajectory of the EBRD work?

And I was basically going to ask the same question about how the arc of EBRD work will change as a result of the challenges we have been seeing in Greece. You mentioned that have developed your appreciation through earlier work about this balance of trying to protect lenders interest, but also protect the interest of the government that wants to be able to grow and not just spend all their resources repaying debt.

My layman's read of a lot of the recent Greek deal is that we are lending them more money so that they can pay off bad debts, but without necessarily being able to use that money to be able to grow the economy.

So you do not have to editorialize on that, but I am just kind of curious how the EBRD mission might address the Russia challenge and how it would address the current challenges posed by the Greek situation.

Mr. ALLEN. Thank you very much for both questions, Senator.

Let us start with Greece. Everyone wants to help Greece. The EBRD, the United States, the eurozone wants to help Greece.

EBRD is fortunate that it was not lending to Greece, so it has zero exposure. The Greek Government requested EBRD to start evaluating projects earlier this year. Clearly, there is a lot of uncertainty, a lot of event risk, a lot of economic turmoil in Greece.

Going forward, some of that uncertainty needs to be alleviated before, in my opinion, the EBRD should start lending any money in Greece. In any event, my understanding is that any financing in Greece will be short term and very targeted toward the private sector, not with the government.

In the case of Russia, a bit of history, if I may, please. The EBRD was set up in 1990. At that time, the Soviet Union was disintegrating. So the EBRD and the United States and administration at the time looked at the EBRD as a way to start developing the private sector. There were trade missions under Presidents Clinton and George W. Bush trying to do the same thing, by engaging with the private sector to increase the dynamics in the economy and through those dynamics to help prompt a political transition.

Again, from a historic perspective, when President Medvedev took over, there was a lot of optimism that this could happen. I mean, President Medvedev talked about establishing technology hubs. The EBRD, in fact, started to increase its lending around that same time. The United States was very much wanting to engage with Russia, and to see the development of the private sector, which hopefully would lead to more of a pluralistic democracy.

The second coming of Vladimir Putin threw that optimism into a tailspin. The EBRD was caught with a lot of Russian loans. There is no doubt about that. Pre-Crimea Russian exposure of EBRD versus Russian exposure now, they have worked very hard to reduce that risk. So it has been reduced by 25 percent to 30 percent. That is a step in the right direction.

Senator KAINE. Would that be from like about 30 percent down to low 20s?

Mr. ALLEN. No, the Russian share of the EBRD portfolio was around 21 percent. Now it is around a little less than 14 percent.

So the mitigation of Russian risk is happening. A lot of it is the rolloff of trade finance, but clearly there is no new business being done in Russia. The G7 has basically told the EBRD not to start any new business whatsoever post-Crimea.

EBRD is still engaged with, obviously, its Russian counterparts in order to be able to ensure the timely repayment of loans. But it is not making any new payments, and it is mitigating and trying to reduce the overall risk.

Senator KAINE. One followup and I am done.

How about in Ukraine?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, Ukraine, it was the second-largest borrower from EBRD. U.S. interests are right along with the EBRD's interests. It is a strategic priority for the EBRD and for the United States to continue to finance new business in Ukraine. The EBRD took some losses, but the commitment I think is seen in the fact that it is raising $1.25 billion in new transactions in Ukraine for 2015.

At this point in time, it is pretty safe to say that that the EBRD is probably the only, if not one of a couple, of lenders willing to put fresh capital in Ukraine. The event risks are enormous. The economy is under a lot of stress.

And if confirmed, I would encourage the EBRD to continue this course of providing new financing to the private sector, as well as in the oil and gas sector with the government, and to continue to support Ukraine, which is aligned with our interests.

Senator KAINE. Very informative answers, all of you. Thank you very much.

Senator PERDUE. That is fascinating.

I do want to follow up on one thing, Mr. Allen. With regard to the Russian exposure to the EBRD, how does that burn off? What is the duration of most of that risk?

Mr. ALLEN. Thank you very much for the question, Senator.

I have not been at the EBRD, so I do not know in detail. I suspect that some of it is trade financed, because they work very well with banks. So some of it will be trade financed. I do not know what the duration of their portfolio is and whether or not loans that came due were paid. That may have been some of the reduction in overall exposures. Whether or not there has been any disposal or sale of loan or equity stakes, I cannot comment on because I do not know.

But it is an interesting question. Clearly, the reduction in risk is good, and it needs to be accelerated whenever possible.

Senator PERDUE. If you are confirmed, I will seek you out. I would like to learn more about that. Senator Kaine and I have talked about that.

Mr. ALLEN. I look forward to that, sir.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you all very much for your testimony and your thoughtful responses. It is encouraging to see talent like you being willing to step up and do what you are about to do and what you have already done, most of you.

That will be the end of our questioning today. The record will remain open, however, until close of business Thursday for members who wish to submit questions to the record.

With that, this hearing is adjourned. Thank you very much.

[Whereupon, at 3:39 p.m., the hearing was adjourned.]

ADDITIONAL MATERIAL SUBMITTED FOR THE RECORD

RESPONSES OF EDWIN RICHARD NOLAN, JR., NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF SURINAME, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE NOLAN'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR RUBIO

Question. In May, the National Democratic Party obtained 26 of the 51 seats giving them an absolute majority. President Desire Bouterse was reelected, however some remain concerned about democratic governance and corruption in the political system.

In your testimony you stated that you "will continue the efforts of your predecessor to press the Government of Suriname for an independent judiciary capable of protecting and advancing democracy and the rule of law in Suriname."

- ♦ Can you provide more details about the efforts of your predecessor to improve the juridical system and what effects they have had? How would you continue to pursue such efforts?
- ♦ If confirmed, please detail what specific policies will you promote to increase American trade and investment in Suriname?

Answer. Ambassador Anania and Embassy Paramaribo have implemented training programs for prosecutors and judges, and additional training in complex financial crimes cases is planned for the coming months. They have advocated with senior government officials the need to establish an independent budget for the judiciary, which is currently funded via the Ministry of Justice and Police.

If confirmed, I will seek to build upon of these programs and look for additional opportunities. In addition, I will urge the Government of Suriname to respect the separation of powers and to allow the judicial system to work without political interference.

Embassy Paramaribo engages regularly with the business community, often connecting importers with U.S. producers. They provide U.S. business with investment and commercial information across sectors—including mining equipment and supplies as well as construction material and equipment. If confirmed, I will actively highlight commercial opportunities that U.S. companies can take advantage to expand their exports. I will also explore opportunities for partnerships with the Suriname Chamber of Commerce and an Embassy presence at Suriname's largest trade fair.

Question. In the 2015 Trafficking in Person report, Suriname was placed in Tier 2 Watch List.

- ♦ How do you intend to work with the Government of Suriname to encourage them to improve their efforts to combat trafficking in persons?

Answer. Suriname is a source, transit, and destination country for women and children subjected to sex trafficking and men, women, and children subjected to forced labor. Workers in mining, agriculture, and fishing are highly vulnerable to forced labor, and women and girls are subjected to sex trafficking in remote and illegal gold mining camps in Suriname's interior. Chinese migrants are also vulnerable to trafficking in the service and construction sectors.

Senior government officials have made limited antitrafficking efforts. Working-level officials—primarily police and prosecutors—continue to investigate and prosecute trafficking cases and refer victims to assistance but without sufficient resources or adequate victim assistance structures in place.

We continue to encourage the Government of Suriname to improve victim identification and to provide adequate resources for victims—including through establishment of long-term shelters for victims. We also encouraged government officials to vigorously investigate and prosecute trafficking crimes, to convict more traffickers, to provide additional resources for the police antitrafficking unit, and to improve interagency coordination on human trafficking issues.

If confirmed, I will continue to pursue combating human trafficking as a priority. Suriname is not eligible to remain on the Tier 2 Watch List next year, so failure to make meaningful progress will result in an automatic downgrade to Tier 3. I will make clear to senior officials that their failure to make significant efforts to combat trafficking would have broad policy implications and consequences, including potential restrictions on foreign assistance.

RESPONSES OF JOHN L. ESTRADA, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE ESTRADA'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR RUBIO

Question. Mr. Estrada as you are aware, there is a conflict between Venezuela and Guyana stemming over oil exploration. If confirmed, what would be your position to better address the existing dispute between two of your neighboring countries.

Answer. Any effort to resolve this situation should be through peaceful means, consistent with international law and the applicable obligations of both parties. If bilateral dialogue is not sufficient, there are a number of third-party options available to both governments in the search for a peaceful, mutually satisfactory resolution. If confirmed, I will urge the Government of Trinidad and Tobago to support the resolution of this and any territorial disputes through peaceful means of dialogue.

Question. Mr. Estrada, in your opening remarks, you stated that Trinidad and Tobago is a key player in the multifaceted citizen security initiative for the Caribbean (CBSI) and part of the initiative is "attempting to combat the drug trade and other transnational crimes that threaten regional security . . ." If confirmed, what specific measures would you take to combat drug trade and transnational crimes and preserve democratic stability in the region?

Answer. The United States works closely with Trinidad and Tobago through the Caribbean Basin Security Initiative (CBSI). If confirmed, I would continue to expand cooperation to combat transnational crimes, such as illicit drug trafficking.

Under CBSI, the U.S. Department of State supports a broad range of engagement with the Government of Trinidad and Tobago and the region to combat illicit trafficking and strengthen law enforcement capabilities. Specifically, we are working with the Government of Trinidad and Tobago to build the capacity of the Trinidad and Tobago Police Academy (TTPA). The TTPA will serve as a center to provide specialized training to both the Trinidad and Tobago Police Service and regional law enforcement agencies. In order to augment this capacity, we are increasing specialized in-service training for police and improving capacity to develop evidence-based cases. Furthermore, we are providing K-9 training support to the Trinidad and Tobago Police Service and Trinidad and Tobago Prison Service to combat drug trafficking and transnational crime.

Technical assistance for the Trinidad and Tobago Financial Investigations Unit and the Trinidad and Tobago Police Service's Financial Investigations Branch provides regulators and investigators in these units with the tools they need to succeed in combating transnational crime. In addition, U.S. support for the Trinidad and Tobago Forensics Science Unit is working to increase host nation capacity to prosecute criminal cases with forensics evidence. Trinidad, along with other CBSI countries, participates in regular maritime security exercises and workshops to enhance regional coordination and operations against drug traffickers.

Question. In the 2015 Trafficking in Persons report, Trinidad and Tobago was placed on the Tier 2 Watch List. How do you intend to work with the Government of Trinidad and Tobago to encourage them to improve their efforts to combat trafficking in persons?

Answer. This past year, the Government of Trinidad and Tobago's antitrafficking unit sustained efforts to identify trafficking victims and refer them to care. The government investigated trafficking offenses—including potentially complicit law enforcement and immigration officials—but initiated only one prosecution against a suspected trafficker under its 2011 antitrafficking law, a significant decrease compared to the 12 prosecutions during the previous reporting period. The government has yet to convict any individuals under its antitrafficking law and did not develop a national plan of action as mandated under that law. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Government of Trinidad and Tobago to improve this rate of conviction and develop a national action plan to protect trafficking victims and prosecute the traffickers.

NOMINATION

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 2015

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, DC.

Susan Coppedge, of Georgia, to be Director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking, with the rank of Ambassador at Large

The committee met, pursuant to notice, at 10:05 a.m., in room SD-419, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Hon. Bob Corker (chairman of the committee) presiding.

Present: Senators Corker, Gardner, Perdue, Isakson, Cardin, Menendez, and Murphy.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. BOB CORKER, U.S. SENATOR FROM TENNESSEE

The CHAIRMAN. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee will come to order.

Today we have before us Susan Coppedge to head the TIP Office for State. And I am thrilled that she is here.

I just came from a meeting this morning. I was over at a church here on the Hill. There were people here from all over the country to push the legislation that we unanimously passed out of the Foreign Relations Committee under your leadership as chairman, the End Modern Slavery Initiative Act. And it was pretty overwhelming. I know I try to stay out of pulpits. [Laughter.]

This was the only place from which I could speak today that had a microphone. But it was pretty overwhelming to see the numbers of people up here who care so deeply about this issue from all over the country.

And you know, the issue of trafficking in persons and slavery is something that is not a Democrat issue. It is not a Republican issue. It is not an independent issue. It is just a moral issue, and it does not take major decision memos that sit on Presidents' desks. It just takes all of us vigilantly fighting to make sure that we deal with this most abhorrent thing, and that is trafficking in persons but also the whole issue of slavery in general.

So I just want to say to our committee I am so thrilled with today's hearing. I am so appreciative and proud of our committee for what we have begun to do, and I think we have some momentum around this issue.

But Susan Coppedge's nomination could not come at a better time. I do not think there is anybody that was a part of the briefing last week that does not believe there is at least some degree of integrity that we need to challenge relative to the 2015 TIP Report. I am sorry. Something is amiss there.

I want to thank Senator Cardin and Senator Menendez and Senator Perdue and others who were there.

I am sorry. I do not think we have had an advocate at the State—I know we have not had an advocate. We have not had anybody in the position since November 2014. So to have somebody of this caliber who is absolutely first rate, who has lived a life around this issue and has been so committed just makes this a great day for our country. And I hope, after her testimony today, we will move quickly to have her confirmed. I am thrilled that she is here. And I think with her and her breeding some integrity but also some advocacy, that has been missing in this program will do a lot not just to restore, if you will, our preeminence in the world around this issue. I am sorry. I think we have lost a degree of that. That has nothing to do with our nominee.

I actually believe we are on the verge of doing something relative to slavery that is going to show real U.S. leadership. And so for that reason, I am very pleased that Susan has agreed to be nominated and to go through the process of this hearing and hopefully to assume this role, which is so important to people around the world that live in poverty and basically—let us face it—they have no access to the criminal justice system because they just do not have the ability, unlike people like us that are U.S. Senators and people in the audience that have status in the world. So many people in poverty just do not and therefore are trafficked, are abused, and live lives of complete misery. And our Nation can do something about it, and with Susan's leadership in the TIP Office to me is one of the essential building blocks to make that happen.

So I am sorry my comments were so long. I will turn it over to our esteemed ranking member and thank him for his lifelong commitment to human rights.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. BENJAMIN L. CARDIN,
U.S. SENATOR FROM MARYLAND

Senator CARDIN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I concur in everything you said.

Ms. Coppedge, thank you very much for your willingness to step forward at this very important time. This is an extremely important position. It will take a great deal of your energy and time. And we thank you for your willingness to serve our country.

I also want to thank your family because this is not easy on family. We know that. And we thank them for their willingness to share you with our country in carrying out one of our most important functions.

Senator Corker is absolutely right. Modern day slavery is something that has to end. The number of people who are victims of trafficking is staggering. It is in the tens of millions. The profit to illegal entities from trafficking is in the hundreds of billions of dollars. So we are talking about a huge area of profit for criminal activities and an incredible human rights violation. It is modern day slavery. And we need to continue to be in the forefront.

I first got engaged in this under the Helsinki Commission where we made this a U.S. priority in the OSCE. And we were successful in establishing a trafficking commitment within the OSCE. There is now a representative on trafficking in the parliamentary assembly. That person is Chris Smith, our colleague from the House of Representatives, who has been one of the great leaders on trafficking legislation. It was, I guess, about 15 years ago that we passed the trafficking in persons statute here, which set up the TIP Report, which is the gold standard for judging all countries' commitments to universal standards to end trafficking.

I have visited victim assistance centers around the world and seen firsthand those who have been victimized by traffickers. I have seen the consequences of it to families. I have seen the labor abuses that have taken place through trafficking. And it has to be our top priority.

So the position that we are looking at today, Ambassador at Large and Director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, the person who will head our TIP Office, has a critical mission to play because the United States is the global leader on this issue and the world watches what we do and how we respond. And our key person on this issue is the person we confirm for the position of Ambassador at Large and Director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. It is critically important that that person be effective in dealing with the Under Secretary for Civilian Security, Democracy, and Human Rights, the Under Secretary for Political Affairs and our regional secretaries, particularly as they review progress being made in each around the world so that when the decision is made by the Secretary of State on the TIP Report, it is the Ambassador at Large who has been effective in ensuring objectivity when it comes to countries' rankings on the TIP Report.

So I very much look forward, Ms. Coppedge, to your testimony but also to quick confirmation. You have Senator Isakson at your side. You could not have a person who we are more impressed with his opinions on other people, than Senator Isakson. So we look forward to your testimony and, more importantly, we hope that we can move this quickly and get a confirmed position as head of the office.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Senator Cardin.

We will now turn to our witness, and as Senator Cardin mentioned, Johnny Isakson, our great friend and esteemed colleague, is going to introduce her, which makes it almost a unanimous assent on the floor when he does so. Senator Isakson, I know you are on the committee, but you know the drill. If you in fact have another meeting you need to go to, there is certainly no reason for you to stay during her testimony if there is something else you need to attend to. But we thank you very much for being the kind of person you are. We are glad someone from your State, which—let us face it—embodies all those values that you do here, is willing to ascend to this job. We certainly look forward to your introduction, and thank you so much for your service.

STATEMENT OF HON. JOHNNY ISAKSON, U.S. SENATOR FROM GEORGIA

Senator ISAKSON. Well, thank you, Chairman Corker and Ranking Member Cardin and all the members of the committee with whom I have been honored to serve for a number of years.

I appreciate the privilege of doing it. This is a twofer for me. About a year ago, I had the privilege of introducing Sally Yates to the Judiciary Committee, upon her confirmation as Deputy United States Attorney. Today in front of this committee, I am getting to introduce Susan Coppedge who studied under Sally Yates to be the Ambassador at Large for Trafficking in Persons, and I am honored and privileged to be able to do so.

There are lots of things I could say about this lady, but the best thing is she has been there and she has done that. In the Northern District of Georgia in the last 15 years, she has prosecuted 21 high profile human trafficking cases. A couple of them I would like to mention.

The Cortez-Mesa case, which resulted in the conviction of 10 pimps and profiteers from the trafficking of young girls, six of them juveniles. Not only did she obtain long sentences, but she got restitution for those that were injured and trafficked, which was a great credit to her ability.

And then the U.S. v. Pipkin case, where she put away for 40 and 35 years, respectively, two of the most notorious criminals in terms of human trafficking that were coming out of Mexico into the United States of America.

The Northern District of Georgia is probably the gatepost and the center post for transited people from Latin America and Central America and Mexico, up the eastern seaboard to New York City and New England in terms of drugs, organized crime, human trafficking, and illicit activity. She has been the lead prosecutor and has prosecuted a number of high profile cases, all of which resulted not only in convictions but in recognition from the U.S. Attorney for her outstanding service.

She graduated from Stanford University with a juris doctorate, and got a magna cum laude, which I cannot even pronounce or spell, much less ever obtain, from Duke University in her undergraduate degree. And she is a very articulate, educated individual.

But I have to tell you an irony. The day that Secretary Kerry interviewed her for this job was the day that Duke won the national championship in basketball. She says that is a good omen for today and hopefully it will be a good omen for her.

It is a privilege and a pleasure for me to introduce to the committee one of Georgia's outstanding attorneys, one who studied under one of Georgia's outstanding leaders in Sally Yates, and one of which I am very proud to introduce to this committee and one who understands the sensitivity of the chairman and the ranking member on the manipulation of numbers in terms of the TIP and is going to be committed to seeing to it we have unvetted, unvarnished information and we do the right thing when it comes to those rankings every single time.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Ranking Member, members of the committee, an outstanding Georgian, Susan Coppedge.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you. Thank you so much. As usual, an outstanding job.

Our witness is Susan Coppedge, who has been nominated to serve as Director of the Office of Monitor and Combat Trafficking, with the rank of Ambassador at Large. And we look forward to your testimony. Thank you for being here.

STATEMENT OF SUSAN COPPEDGE, NOMINATED TO BE THE DIRECTOR OF THE OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING

Ms. COPPEDGE. Mr. Chairman and Senator Cardin, thank you so much for the hearing today to consider the nomination for Ambassador at Large to monitor and combat trafficking in persons.

Senator Isakson, thank you so much for that generous introduction.

I am honored by the opportunity to appear before you, as I am honored and humbled by the confidence that President Obama and Secretary Kerry have placed in me to serve our Nation in continuing the global fight against human trafficking.

I want to thank the individuals from the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons: Kari Johnstone and Carl Fox. They truly have their hearts in this fight and they stand ready to help me settle into the State Department.

I also want to thank my husband, Lorenzo Amato, who is here today. Without his support and love for me and our children, I could not do this job.

My father is here. My sister, my cousin, my brother-in-law, many of my friends from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Atlanta are here. Colleagues and friends and fellow classmates from Duke and from Stanford are also here.

Over my career, I have worked on cases that have assisted more than 90 individuals in leaving their victimization, and in many cases, those individuals participated in the process of bringing their exploiters to justice. I have worked with and trained Federal, State, and local law enforcement. I have partnered with NGOs, nongovernmental organizations, faith groups, and concerned citizens in Georgia who provide services to victims.

Finally, I have educated jurors and judges that modern slavery often does not involve locks on the doors or victims who are willing to come forward. Human trafficking involves more subtle forms of exploitation and coercion.

Our goal, everyone in this room who cares about this fight, is to ensure the dignity of all individuals. Human trafficking in all its forms, whether forced labor or sex trafficking, is modern slavery, and it is one of the greatest human rights causes of our time. We must assume our responsibility to stop this heinous crime and to address the conditions such as violent conflict, poverty, and discrimination that contribute to making individuals vulnerable.

With the leadership of President Obama, Secretary Kerry, and Under Secretary Sewall, as well as the members of this committee who I know are dedicated to this fight, I know we can raise the priority of human trafficking and strengthen the U.S. leadership on this important issue.

If confirmed, I commit to using this position passionately to advocate for the rights of individuals to be free from forced labor or sex trafficking, for victims to have access to comprehensive services, for survivors to be empowered to have a voice in policy, and for an end to the trafficking in human beings.

If confirmed, I will seek to engage every segment of the U.S. Government to integrate antitrafficking policies into our Nation's foreign policy goals.

If confirmed, I pledge to do my utmost to uphold the integrity of the annual Trafficking in Persons Report and its tier rankings, including by ensuring that facts from the field are accurately presented in the report. The report is respected around the world and used in countless countries to increase prosecutions, enhance protections, and increase prevention of the crime.

If confirmed, I pledge to work closely with the many nongovernmental organizations and stakeholders doing critical work in this arena and partner with those in the business community who seek strong policies that ensure humane labor practices.

I would like to close with the story of Carolina, a survivor I had the chance to know while I prosecuted her trafficker. Carolina was 16 when Juan Cortes Meza romanced her in Mexico, promising her a better life here in the United States. Instead, Cortes Meza smuggled Carolina across the border and gave her the most shocking news of her life. He expected her to sleep with 20 to 30 men a night in his high-volume, low-cost prostitution business. At first, he told her it would only last until her smuggling debt could be paid. Then he told her it was the only way she could make money. Then when his deception and coercion were insufficient, he beat her to force her to continue.

I had the privilege of being with Carolina as she bravely spoke to the Federal judge who heard her case, sharing her pain and describing how she cried every night. Only the walls could hear my cries is what Carolina told him. That day at trial, Atlanta heard Carolina, and today sharing the story with you, the United States hears Carolina. The indelible memory of her and of survivors like her fuels my commitment to antitrafficking work. There are many people in this room and listening today who are as passionate as I am. Each of us plays a part in this connected fight in helping survivors worldwide and in supporting governments, nongovernmental organizations, and citizens to end modern slavery. I so look forward to working with the members of this committee and others in our shared fight.

Thank you again for your consideration, and I look forward to answering any questions that you have.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Coppedge follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF SUSAN COPPEDGE

Chairman Corker, Ranking Member Cardin, and members of the committee, thank you for this hearing to consider my nomination as Ambassador at Large to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. I am honored by this opportunity to appear before you, as I am honored and humbled by the confidence President Obama and Secretary Kerry have placed in me to serve our Nation in continuing the fight against human trafficking in the world.

I want to thank Kari Johnstone, Carl Fox, and the team at the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. Kari has been Acting Director since Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, my former DOJ colleague, departed the office, and she has done a wonderful job. The entire TIP Office has their hearts in the fight against human trafficking and stands ready to help me settle into the State Department.

I want to acknowledge my husband, Lorenzo Amato, who has been so wonderfully supportive of me and whose love for me and our children enables me to undertake the awesome responsibility of the position for which I have been nominated. My father Warren Coppedge is also here; unfortunately my mother and brother could not be here and we thought it best if my daughter, Lilliana who is seven, and my son Sebastian, who is three, stayed home today. I could spend days telling you of the love, support and guidance my parents have given me and the innumerable ways that they have made me the person I am. I certainly inherited the gift of gab from both of them and also an understanding of how important it is to serve. This lesson is summarized by a bumper sticker my father has on his car: "whatever you do to the least of these, you also do to me."

My parents instilled faith and a call to service in all of their children including my sister, Elizabeth Coppedge Henley, who is a Methodist minister and who is here today with her family, as are friends and colleagues from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Atlanta, as well as friends and fellow classmates from both my undergraduate alma mater, Duke University, and my law school, Stanford University. There is also a large group back in Atlanta and my hometown of Dalton, GA, saying prayers for me and the work I hope to undertake, with the support and confirmation of the United States Senate.

I want to thank Senator Isakson for being here to introduce me to the committee today and to Senator Max Cleland who could not be here but has been a vocal supporter of mine. I hope the bipartisan support will continue through this Senate confirmation process and, hopefully, as we work together in the future.

As a federal prosecutor in the United States Attorney's Office for the Northern District of Georgia, I have been dedicated to the fight against human trafficking for 14 years. In 2002, I tried my first human trafficking case, serving as second chair to my wonderful colleague, Janis Gordon. This first case is an example of how a community can drive action on behalf of government officials. It started in 2000 with a juvenile court judge who wrote an editorial in the Atlanta Journal Constitution decrying the "alarming increase" of the commercial sexual exploitation of girls based on her experience with 14, 15, and 16 year olds coming into her court on prostitution charges. These children's bonds to get them out of jail were paid repeatedly by the same group of men, and those men did not face any criminal repercussions themselves. The judge's editorial ignited a group of citizens to take up this issue and galvanized then-U.S. Attorney Richard Deane and other dedicated law enforcement officials with the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Atlanta Police Department. Thirteen human traffickers were indicted under federal charges; 11 pled guilty and 2 went to trial and were convicted by a jury. That was my first time meeting victims of modern slavery: teenagers who at 16 had been punished in juvenile court with a fine for prostitution and then released to the very traffickers who exploited them. I am so proud to have been a part of that first federal case in Atlanta and an advocate for justice for those young girls. This case earned the two most culpable traffickers prison sentences of 30 and 40 years and set me on the path to be here in front of you today.

Since then I have indicted 49 traffickers in cases involving both American and foreign-born children and young women, victims of both sex trafficking and labor trafficking. Over my career, I have worked on cases that have assisted more than 90 people in leaving their victimization and, in many cases, those individuals participated in the process of bringing their exploiters to justice. I have worked with federal, state, and local law enforcement in the fight against human trafficking. This meant, in the early days, conducting training for law enforcement as to what human trafficking was and the warning signs they might see. It also meant partnering with nongovernmental organizations, faith groups, and concerned citizens in Georgia who provided services to victims of trafficking by helping them find safe housing, finish school or obtain their GEDs, and apply for visas provided by the U.S. Government to foreign-born victims of trafficking. Finally, it has meant educating jurors and judges that modern slavery often does not involve locks on the doors or victims who come forward, but more subtle forms of exploitation and coercion that cause victims to be deprived of their freedom, their ability to say "no, I don't want to do this work."

Even though I may sound a bit regional to those Senators not from Tennessee or Georgia, I have been engaged on the frontlines in the very antitrafficking efforts the State Department encourages foreign governments to pursue. Based on my extensive experience combating trafficking here in the United States, I have trained foreign law enforcement in Argentina, New Zealand, and Thailand. I have also worked with the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime to develop a database for tracking human trafficking prosecutions. The message I always seek to deliver, whether to foreign governments or to the Rotary Club, is that human trafficking cases are some of the most important cases that governments can undertake; these cases restore the individuals to the freedom and liberty to which all are entitled.

The U.S. goal, which I know this committee is so dedicated to supporting, is to ensure the internationally recognized right of individual freedom and the dignity of all persons. Human trafficking in all its forms—whether forced labor or sex trafficking—is modern slavery, and it is one of the greatest human rights causes of our time. We must undertake our responsibility as modern day abolitionists with energy and commitment to stop this heinous crime and to address the conditions such as conflict, poverty, and discrimination that contribute to making individuals vulnerable to enslavement.

With President Obama, Secretary Kerry, and Under Secretary Sewall, we have leaders in the executive branch deeply committed to this agenda. We also have strong leadership on this committee from Senator Corker and Senators Menendez, Cardin, Rubio, and others who have kept the fight against human trafficking a priority for the Senate. I am well aware that the strong leadership of an Ambassador at Large is more important now than ever, and we should continue our efforts to combat human trafficking and lift up those who have suffered in its grip. Not only is it simply the right thing to do, it will also enable the United States to continue to lead on this important issue.

Thus—

If confirmed, I commit to using this position passionately to advocate for the rights of individuals to be free from forced labor or sex trafficking, for victims of human trafficking to have access to comprehensive services, for survivors to be empowered to have a voice in policy, and for an end to the trafficking of human beings.

If confirmed, I will seek to engage every segment of the State Department and the rest of the U.S. Government to integrate antitrafficking policies into our Nation's foreign policy goals: promoting open, resilient, and democratic societies, advancing inclusive economic growth, and preventing and mitigating conflict and violent extremism. Fighting human trafficking should be an integral part of all our engagements with other governments to further our nation's values of freedom and liberty.

If confirmed, I pledge to do my utmost to uphold the integrity of the annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report and its tier rankings, including by ensuring the facts from the field are accurately presented in the report.

The annual TIP Report is respected around the world and used in countless countries to try to increase prosecutions of the exploiters, enhance protections for the survivors, and encourage prevention of this crime. Thanks to the hearing held by this committee in August, foreign governments will know that the United States Senate and U.S. citizens are deeply concerned about human trafficking. This will only help to encourage countries to make real progress in fighting human trafficking, as I hope to do.

If confirmed, I pledge to work closely with the many nongovernmental organizations and stakeholders already in this arena who successfully raise awareness, support prosecutions, and offer services to survivors.

If confirmed, I will partner with those in the business community who are deeply concerned with the treatment of workers in their supply chains and who seek strong legal regimes and policies that ensure humane labor practices and facilitate fair markets.

Lastly, if confirmed, I will do everything within my abilities to maintain a close working relationship with Congress and with those federal agencies engaged in the fight against human trafficking.

I would like to close with the story of Carolina. Carolina is a survivor I had the chance to know while I prosecuted her trafficker. She was 16 when Juan Cortes Meza romanced her in Mexico. He promised her that a better life awaited her in the United States, a life where he would marry her and they could make a living cleaning houses or selling clothes. Instead, Cortes Meza smuggled Carolina across the border and then gave her the most shocking news of her life—that he expected her to sleep with 20–30 men a night. He forced her into his high-volume, low-cost prostitution business. At first, Cortes Meza said it would only last until she paid back the smuggling debt. Then he told her it was the only way she could earn money in a country where law enforcement would not help her and she would end up in jail. Then, when his deception and coercion were not sufficient, he beat her to force her to continue.

I had the privilege of being with Carolina as she bravely spoke to the federal judge who heard her case. I listened as she shared her pain and described how she cried every night. “Only the walls heard my cries,” she said. That day at trial, Atlanta heard Carolina. Today, I share her story in the U.S. Senate and the United States hears Carolina. Every victim's pain is our Nation's pain as well. The indelible memory of Carolina's cries—and of survivors like her—fuels my commitment to antitrafficking work. A commitment to human dignity is a commitment to a just world. There are many people in this room and listening today who are as passionate as I am. Each of us plays a part in this connected fight in helping survivors worldwide, and in supporting governments, nongovernmental organizations, and citizens to end modern slavery. I look forward to working with the members of this committee and others in our shared fight.

Thank you again for your consideration and I look forward to answering any questions you may have.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much for your testimony and again for your commitment to this issue. I think you are aware we had a meeting last week off the Senate floor. We talked a little bit about some of our concerns with the current TIP Office. And I realize there is no one there in your position and there has not been anyone there since November 2014. But the TIP Report tier rankings are reviewed and differences adjudicated at the Under Secretary level, as we understand it, and ultimately by the Secretary of State. What is your understanding of the TIP Office Director in that process?

Ms. COPPEDGE. Well, my understanding is that the TIP Office Director, the position that I am being considered for, is the person who first marshals with the office staff all of the facts from the field, who spends the year engaging our missions, the State Department's bureaus, citizens, and nongovernmental organizations, all report in facts to that office. Then the Ambassador, the Director of the office, advocates for the role that the TIP Office believes and the rankings the TIP Office believes those facts dictate.

The CHAIRMAN. And you will commit to assuring that the integrity of that process is there. I will just put it that way.

Ms. COPPEDGE. Yes, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. What are some of the kind of things that you think can sometimes come into play to keep those TIP rankings from being what they should be?

Ms. COPPEDGE. Well, I have not been part of the process yet. So I am kind of watching from the sidelines. I do not want to be a Monday morning quarterback and critique the team on Sunday. But I can certainly can commit to you that I will do my best to ensure the integrity of the report and to let people higher up at the Department know that that report needs to be based on facts to uphold its integrity.

The CHAIRMAN. It is our understanding that over time there has been a good deal of attrition in the office, I guess possibly due to lack of focus and lack of leadership. Obviously, you will change that hugely when you assume that role. Can you tell us a little bit about what your commitment is internally in the office in assuming this position?

Ms. COPPEDGE. Senator, as part of the nomination process, I have met with the individuals who work in that office, and I am very impressed by their dedication to the fight against human trafficking. They work hard and they care deeply about the issue. And I hope to be a good leader to them and a good champion for their report, and I look forward to working with the individuals who are there.

The CHAIRMAN. One of the things we all do—I had dinner with Senator Perdue last week, and we were talking about the fact that just the experience of being in other countries over a period of time ends up creating a body of knowledge that is second to none. I mean, it is amazing I think what all of us have learned by going to other parts of the world, understanding culture, seeing what is happening there.

It is my understanding that the TIP Office has had a limited travel budget and because of constraints, many of their officers are not out doing those things. Obviously, that affects things in a big way. I just wonder what your take on that is and what your commitment to people getting out and seeing on the ground firsthand what is happening.

Ms. COPPEDGE. Well, I do think it is very important to get into countries, particularly ones that are in a position to make a difference if they have a visit from U.S. officials. And I am committed to going to countries and doing that. And I do believe that meeting people face-to-face and building those relationships, working not just with governments but with citizens and nongovernmental organizations in the country, who frequently supply information to the TIP Office, meeting those individuals so that they know they have an avenue of communication to reporting facts in the field as well is very important.

And I think I am well situated, having been on the front lines in prosecuting these cases myself, to talk to people about the hurdles and the obstacles and suggest ways that we have overcome them here in the United States. And I look forward to doing that in the field.

The CHAIRMAN. And what is your understanding of how the action plans for each country is developed?

Ms. COPPEDGE. Senator, my understanding is with the recommendations that are in the TIP Report that everyone can read, that those recommendations form the basis of the action plans for the countries. And the United States is certainly encouraging other countries to meet those goals and those suggestions in the TIP Report to increase their rankings.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you commit to working closely with us on the committee and making us aware, if at any time you feel other forces are at work which are keeping your voice from being heard and the primary reason that you are assuming this job is being mitigated because of other forces? Will you work with us in that regard and ensure that that is not the case?

Ms. COPPEDGE. Senator Corker, I look forward to working with this committee because there are so many members on it who are passionate and dedicated to the fight against trafficking. I look forward to open communications with this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, listen, before I turn to Senator Cardin, I just want to say again to have someone who, like most of us here know individuals, have met individuals, have defended individuals, have caused justice to come about for individuals, assuming this role certainly is something that is good for our country and great for those who, again, do not have today access to justice. And I hope you will take the same commitment—I think you will—relative to what you did in the case you described earlier. I hope you will maintain that and carry that with you to the State Department as you assume this position. And I want to thank you for your willingness. I want to thank your family for their willingness. I understand they may actually move to Washington if you assume this role. We thank them in particular for that.

And with that, I will turn to Ranking Member Cardin.

Ms. COPPEDGE. Thank you, Senator Corker.

Senator CARDIN. Did Senator Isakson know he might be losing some Georgians? [Laughter.]

Senator ISAKSON. We know how to deal with that. [Laughter.]

Senator CARDIN. Well, let me again welcome you.

I just really want to underscore the point that Chairman Corker made. As I understand the process on the rankings, the work that you do in your office working with missions around the world and working with NGOs and gathering the facts from every country—the initial work is done and accumulated by your office. That then works its way to determinations as to whether there is any disagreement as to the ranking for the coming year on the TIP Report. My understanding is that normally for about 80 or more percent of the countries there is no disagreement, and those rankings just routinely are accepted by the Secretary and included in the annual TIP Report.

But there are a number of countries where there are some disagreements, and the disagreements usually occur between your office and the regional Secretaries working through the various missions. That then is elevated to the Under Secretaries, and the Under Secretary for Civilian Security, Democracy, and Human Rights is advocating on behalf of your position, and the regional secretaries will usually advocate on behalf of the mission.

Your role is to take a look at the human rights issue of trafficking. The regional Secretaries may have other areas of concern and relationships with countries that they must take into consideration. Trafficking is just one of the agenda items.

So the point I just really wanted to underscore, as that process moves forward, it is critically important that the Director have input into the Under Secretary for Civilian Security, Democracy, and Human Rights so that the principal objective used in determining the rankings is progress made in trafficking. And that is where we need a strong advocate and an effective advocate.

In order to achieve that, you need to build support for the trafficking agenda. And I could not help but think as you were talking about Carolina that that is exactly what you need to do. You got to put a face on this. When I talk about tens of millions of victims, people say, okay, what else is new? But when you talk about an individual who has gone through the tragedy of being trafficked, that helps people to understand why this is important.

So I guess I would urge you to look at creative ways where you can build stronger support so that your recommendations will have stronger weight with the Under Secretaries as they make their recommendation to the Deputy Secretary and the Secretary of State. And you need to find, I hope, creative ways, working with the NGO community, to be able to personalize this. It affects all of our communities. And we can do something about it. And it starts with an objective evaluation of every countries' efforts and what they can do to improve their efforts.

So I guess my point is that—I know you are committed to this, but I want you to understand you are going to reach some barriers in getting the results that you want because we have complicated relations with countries around the world, and there are not just human rights issues, there are other issues.

We have a meeting with the Chinese head of state coming on Friday, and I would hope that human rights would be top on the agenda. But somehow I got a feeling that cybersecurity and maritime security and all those other issues are going to be talked about at greater length than some of the human rights issues that I would like to see elevated in that discussion. It is your responsibility in this position to be able to elevate the trafficking issues as these debates takes place well before the decisions on the rankings.

Just get your reaction as to how you will try to carry that out.

Ms. COPPEDGE. That was a great pep talk for me going into the job on things I need to consider and work diligently at. I know that relationships are not built just at the time the TIP Report comes out and that I want to build those relationships throughout the year at the State Department. And I want to integrate human trafficking along with those other issues that you mentioned because there are multiple parts to U.S. diplomacy, and human trafficking needs to be an integral part and one of those parts that is considered.

Senator CARDIN. And as Senator Corker said, look, you have a lot of friends on this issue. You have friends in the United States Senate. You have friends in the NGO community. Just utilize the strength we have. I am proud that this issue has gained a great deal of strength through advocacy groups around America and around the world. And you need to be the leader to focus us on where we can be the most effective in helping you. If we know where problems exist in the political structure to make progress, then we can help you in doing that. On the other hand, if you feel, well, that is not your role, we may miss an opportunity. Your independent, objective information to us becomes critically important.

Ms. COPPEDGE. Thank you, Senator.

Senator CARDIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Senator Cardin. I think what he is saying—I will say it in a little different way. Look, we are going through a period of time where this issue is—I am sorry—not a focus. In Syria, we have not done what we said we would do, and people are dead and people are leaving. In Malaysia, I do not exactly know what has happened, but I do not think the TIP Office was heard at all. I do not think the issue of trafficking in persons has even been on the radar screen in modern times. I am sorry. It is a blight on our country. And you are entering at a time when all of us want to see that change. I think that is what he just said. [Laughter.]

But with that, Senator Isakson.

Senator ISAKSON. Well, let me follow up on that, Mr. Chairman and Ranking Member, and tell you in preparing to introduce Susan, I was reading some of her history in terms of cases, and the Cortes Meza case and the face she put on that case, which you bragged about—one thing I did not say in the introduction, which I should have—and she probably would not volunteer on her own. But in her 15 years at the Northern District of Georgia, she has spent a lot of time advocating on behalf of people who are victims of trafficking. In fact, the Rotary Club of Roswell, which is the second-largest Rotary Club in Georgia, where David McCleary has heard her speech at that Rotary Club about 5 or 6 years ago I think—they adopted human trafficking as their number one issue. That Rotary Club has raised money, has traveled across the country, has worked to try and raise the awareness of that. And I think that is what you both are saying. It is out of sight and it is out of mind.

And, Susan, you have a tremendous responsibility. We are politicians and we make a lot of speeches and we can talk about these things, but sometimes they heard, sometimes they are not. But if you can tell those stories of those 21 cases you prosecuted in the Northern District of Georgia, like Pipkin and like Cortes Meza, and tell the stories about really what happens to these people, it would do a world of good to help us raise that visibility as well.

Secondly, in reading background material, you have taught, as I understand it, in New Zealand, Australia, and other countries with regard to human trafficking. Have you worked with their judiciaries or their legislatures or their prosecutors? Tell us about that.

Ms. COPPEDGE. Yes, Senator. I have worked training law enforcement both locally in Georgia, federally in the United States, and internationally in New Zealand, Thailand, and Argentina. And I was sent there probably with State Department money to talk to law enforcement about the difficulties of investigating and prosecuting these cases. Law enforcement everywhere is overwhelmed with people coming forward to them to report crimes, where human trafficking victims do not always come forward. So there is a lot more work on law enforcement's part to uncover the crime. And then the victims are often afraid of law enforcement or ashamed of what has been happening to them. And so they are fearful of coming forward and working with law enforcement.

So when I was in those countries, I was talking to law enforcement about how you move through some of the obstacles in prosecuting those cases. I was also stressing a victim-centered approach in the investigations and prosecutions. We never had a case where a victim was not willing to cooperate in the Atlanta U.S. Attorney's Office, but if a victim did not want to pursue a case, it is the victim's rights that should prevail in that instance.

Senator ISAKSON. You know, sanctuary cities have gotten a lot of publicity in the United States over the incident that took place in San Francisco. But am I correct or incorrect? There are some sanctuary countries for human traffickers that exist today on the face of the earth.

Ms. COPPEDGE. Senator, I am not aware of that. I know there are some countries that do not comply with the minimum standards, and they are reported in the Trafficking in Persons Report.

Senator ISAKSON. And that is the kind of information we want to make sure we have the very best information possible in the TIP Report so we do not mask what might be somebody actually harboring human trafficking elements.

Ms. COPPEDGE. Yes, Senator.

Senator ISAKSON. We are proud of you.

Ms. COPPEDGE. Thank you.

Senator ISAKSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Senator Isakson.

Senator Menendez.

Senator MENENDEZ. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Ms. Coppedge, congratulations on your nomination. And I must underscore that if Senator Isakson comes and vouches for you, it has an enormous weight, at least with this Senator, and I think that is true for many others. I do not think he has just done that because you come from Georgia. So that is very meaningful.

You and I had a good conversation. I just want to follow up on a couple of the things that we talked about.

First of all, while I know you were not there, I hope you have an understanding of why many members of this committee have a concern about the 2015 TIP Report as it relates to Malaysia, from my perspective as it relates to Cuba and other countries where the narrative of why a country was upgraded from a Tier 3 worst standard to a Tier 2 just does not fit the upgrade. So without commenting on whether it is right or wrong, you have an understanding as to why members have a concern about the 2015 TIP Report. Is that fair to say?

Ms. COPPEDGE. Yes, it is, Senator. I have been following all of your hearings on this matter and reading the articles as well.

Senator MENENDEZ. Okay. Hopefully it is not in the reruns at night on C-SPAN where you are—you know.

Let me ask you. Knowing that, knowing what the concerns are as it relates to the upgrade, how do you plan to appropriately but nonetheless push back?

I am looking for someone who is going to be a staunch advocate for the work that the people from the TIP Office do. They do an incredible job. I think it is difficult, when your work gets crushed from up above, to still have the passion and the commitment. It has to be diminished somewhat. And so this office needs a leader who will not only lead in the work and make sure that the information is as full and as transparent and as powerful to reflect the realities of a given country, but it also needs a leader at the table inside of the Department where, as has been said by Senator Cardin, there are competing interests. And personally, as much as I might disagree, I would be more respectful of the competing interests being said that, look, we need, for example, Malaysia in the Trans-Pacific Partnership. We think that is important to our pivot to Asia. I might disagree with that, but at least I respect that. We need this country because we have a security objective. So I can understand those. I cannot understand when we are told carte blanche that in fact there are upgrades because they did the right thing. I find that really hard to believe.

So with that as the basis, I want to get a sense of what you will do internally in the State Department in this process. When your people have come to conclusions and now it is time to advocate, how strong of an advocate will you be, understanding that you will have superiors that may have a different view. I just want to get a sense of that from you.

Ms. COPPEDGE. Thank you, Senator Menendez.

I will be a champion for the individuals in the TIP Office and the work that they do, and I will be that champion year round. Part of my job as a Federal prosecutor is to take the facts, present them to a jury of 12 people, and convince them that those facts are a violation of the law. And that is very similar to the work that the TIP Office does. They gather facts from the field. They present those to the State Department individuals who make the decision and convince them where the tier rankings should be. I view my job is to speak to truth to power, and if power does not like to hear it, then I can be outranked clearly in the State Department, but I will speak that truth.

Senator MENENDEZ. So let me ask you. One thing is presenting facts to a jury. The other thing is did you ever in your 15 years of experience at the U.S. Attorney's Office face a set of circumstances—and I do not need the specifics of it, but I just want to get a sense—face a set of circumstances in which something was taking place that you felt that you had to speak out. Look, it could have been something that should have been prosecuted, that there was a judgment maybe not to prosecute, or something that was going to be prosecuted that you felt there was a judgment that it should not be prosecuted, or anything like that that you had to face in those 15 years that was not the easy flow of saying okay, but that you actually faced a moment in which you felt you had to tell your superiors I think this is the wrong judgment.

Ms. COPPEDGE. I have told my superiors that, Senator. I am a squeaky wheel and I present the facts in the way that I see them and I argue from my position very forcefully. Luckily in the U.S. Attorney's Office in Atlanta, we have had excellent leadership that recognizes that no one case is worth tarnishing the reputation of justice in our community. So the office has been very supportive when I have spoken up and felt strongly about issues.

Senator MENENDEZ. Let me ask you. I heard your answer to Senator Corker, but I want to understand. If this committee and members ask for information, will you be willingly disposed to give that information to members of this committee as we are making decisions?

Ms. COPPEDGE. I am committed to open dialogue with this committee throughout the year not just right before the TIP Report is released, and I look forward to working with the committee.

Senator MENENDEZ. And so am I to take away from your answers that underneath that Southern genteelness that I gather from you there is an iron will to do what is right here?

Ms. COPPEDGE. There is an iron will to do what is right because of the individuals that I have met in trafficking cases. They do not have a voice. You Senators are their voice. I will remind you of that just as you have reminded me of my responsibilities.

Senator MENENDEZ. Then with that understanding, I look forward to supporting your nomination.

Ms. COPPEDGE. Thank you, Senator Menendez.

The CHAIRMAN. I might add behind that New Jersey tough accent—

[Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN [continuing]. There is a guy that actually cares about people in this type of situation.

Senator MENENDEZ. Mr. Chairman, I am glad you are an interpreter for the committee. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. You know, in her case, I need to be one.

Let me just say we did have a meeting at the end of the week—a closed meeting. We did that for the benefit of the State Department so that we would not have media there and other things. I have, since that time, asked for three specific pieces of information from them, just for you to know because I know people will be asking you that in the hallway, to really understand what has happened. Instead of it being sweeping, three very specific things that came up actually during Tony Blinken's testimony. I do hope they will provide that like now. We are asking for them to reply immediately. This should not take any time to get to us. And if not, then I would like to talk to the committee about next steps to force that to happen. I just wanted to make you all aware. I think most of us are very unsatisfied with the testimony that occurred last week.

With that, Senator Perdue.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Welcome, Ms. Coppedge. Thank you for the courtesy of our visit last week.

For the record, I want to remind those of us here that this issue could have been swept under. We could have taken that TIP Report, put it on a shelf, and let it sit there. I want to commend the ranking member, Senator Cardin, and our chairman, Senator Corker, for not letting that happen. And I think the fact that you have four of the most distinguished Senators of our time sitting here before you today—I am not one of those. These four gentlemen are very dedicated to this issue I know personally. And they have got other things to do this morning, but they are here because of this nomination and how important it is. And I applaud all of them for that.

I am honored, Mr. Chairman, that our nominee today is from Georgia. I have watched her for the last decade attack this with a vigor. I think your question, Senator Menendez, should have been directed toward her husband to see if she really has the iron will. [Laughter.]

I suspect that she does.

But I applaud the work you have been doing. You are coming on a new level now and a new stage.

And I want to clear a couple things for the record that we talked about last week. In my career in business, I have been very sensitive to this idea of taking advantage of the weak in our societies around the world. Every culture is a little different. This is a major impediment to me for international trade. And one of the things that makes us one world and a peaceful world is the fact that we do not take advantage. We do not stand for people who take advantage of the weak among us. And yet, children, for the last 50 years, have been definitely victims of global issues and power struggles around the world.

Today in this 2015 report—I am not asking for your opinion about the 2015 report, but I do want to talk to you about children soldiers. Child labor has been a topic for the last 50 years as globalization has taken root, and so a lot of progress has been made. In children soldiers, though, I am not so sure that much progress has been made. There are eight countries in this TIP Report. Countries like Burma, Congo, Nigeria, Somalia, South Sudan, Sudan, Syria, and Yemen are listed as countries who have forces that openly have children soldiers. I know you have a sensitive spot in your heart about this. This is a little bit different level than what you have been dealing with. And not all of these countries are on this year's report's worst level.

So my question is, as we look forward, will the fact that Tier 3, countries that have children soldiers—is that a major issue with regard to countries being placed on Tier 3?

Ms. COPPEDGE. Well, Senator, child soldiering is certainly a horrible issue that everyone is against in this room. And I am glad that you brought it up. And the TIP Report does list every year countries that engage children as soldiers or children as workers in their armies or armed forces, and that is required by the Child Soldier Prevention Act, which governs this area. It is listed in the TIP Report, and it is certainly one of the factors that is evaluated in the report when looking at the tier rankings.

Senator PERDUE. Are you hopeful we can eliminate that?

Ms. COPPEDGE. I am hopeful we can do lots of things, Senator. That is on the list. Yes, sir.

Senator PERDUE. Thank you.

Along with that, you have heard discussed here today—and I think one of our concerns looking at this 2015 report is the efficacy of the report. It should be the gold standard that we and others can depend on when we evaluate countries in terms of where we put businesses, how we deal with them in the State Department, and how we think about them here in Congress. But we now learn that in this report in 2015, there are several countries that just do not comply. Several years, Germany has not provided information. Now, we have no reason to suspect they are not a continuing Tier 1 operator, but the fact that they are not providing information gives me pause. The fact that India again has not provided information—they are still solidly a Tier 2 player in the report.

How will you in your role help to maintain the efficacy of this report not just to make sure it is not politicized but also to make sure that the participating countries provide the information that is so important for you to make your determination?

Ms. COPPEDGE. So one of the factors that I understand the TIP Report considers is whether the government provides information and data because that is the best source of prosecutions and support being provided to victims. And if no information is forthcoming, then the TIP Report and the office has to assume that they are not making efforts in that area. So I know that that is built into the review of the report.

I also understand that we get information from civil society in a country and NGOs as well, but certainly governments are encouraged and requested to provide information.

Senator PERDUE. You know, there is a reported tension between JTIP and the regional bureaus of State and U.S. missions overseas. They go back to JTIP's creation back in 2001. Some observers contend that while JTIP is praised for raising the policy profile of human trafficking, its ability to project its antitrafficking message as a priority is hampered by its perceived unequal footing vis-a-vis the regional bureaus at State.

How will you resolve this? I mean, this goes across all the responsibilities at State, it looks like. How will you weigh in to make sure that does not negatively affect our ability to evaluate these countries?

Ms. COPPEDGE. Senator, I will work to build relationships with regional offices and with our missions in the field. They are also a great source of information to the TIP Office about what is going on with respect to trafficking in that country. I want to get the trafficking message clearly out to the regions and the missions and just build those relationships up so that we are on equal footing with other offices there. Obviously, there are competing priorities, as Senator Cardin recognized, but JTIP and the TIP Office needs to have a loud voice at the table and someone that individuals are willing to work with, and I will strive to be that person.

Senator PERDUE. Well, thank you for your answers, and congratulations on your nomination.

Mr. Chairman, I look forward to fully supporting this nominee and her impact on this report going forward. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

I do not think there are other questions. I think people have had time to meet with you personally and very much appreciate your willingness to do this.

The record will remain open for questions through the close of business Wednesday. If you would answer those promptly, it helps in you ascending to this position. I know you will do that. And again, thank you and your family's willingness to do this.

With that, the meeting is adjourned. Thank you.

[Whereupon, at 10:50 a.m., the hearing was adjourned.]

ADDITIONAL MATERIAL SUBMITTED FOR THE RECORD

RESPONSES OF SUSAN COPPEDGE, NOMINATED TO BE DIRECTOR OF THE OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

DIRECTOR-DESIGNATE COPPEDGE'S RESPONSES TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR RUBIO

Question. Of the 20.9 million victims worldwide, the ILO estimates that 68 percent are trapped in labor trafficking. Yet, only 5 percent of the convictions reported worldwide last year were labor cases. Labor traffickers operate with near impunity across the globe, in large part because of the increased resources it takes to recognize, investigate and prosecute these cases.

♦ How can J/TIP help build this expertise globally and ensure that more labor cases are identified and prosecuted?

Answer. I am deeply concerned with the low rate of prosecutions and convictions for labor trafficking crimes around the world. If confirmed, it will be a key priority for me—including through the dedication of resources—to advocate for increased prosecutions and convictions in these cases.

Labor trafficking takes many forms including bonded labor, domestic servitude, and forced child labor, and it occurs in many industries and work environments—from formal to informal sectors, isolated mines to urban businesses, whether legal or not. One important area that I will prioritize, if confirmed, is government enactment and implementation of laws that encourage prosecution of suspected traffickers and afford sufficient protections for victims. I will also lead robust engagement efforts to press governments to implement fully their own laws and international commitments.

A TIP Office under my direction would continue to work hard to further the U.S. Government's leadership in combating human trafficking in all its forms. In addition to strong diplomacy aimed at pushing governments to increase prosecutions and convictions, I will strategically program resources and forge close relationships with international organizations and NGOs, as well as civil society groups, to address the drivers of human trafficking. If confirmed, I will also encourage business leaders to adopt codes of conduct for employees prohibiting the purchase of commercial sex and the use of unscrupulous labor practices in their supply chains. I will reach out to community leaders to foster the belief that it is everyone's responsibility to do their part to reduce the demand for human trafficking.

I am committed to combating human trafficking in all its forms and, if confirmed, I will push governments around the world to do the same.

Question. Worldwide, convictions dropped 23 percent last year from 5,776 to 4,443. With an estimated 21 million victims worldwide, yet fewer than 45,000 victims reported to law enforcement last year and fewer than 4,500 convictions worldwide, it is a crime of very low risk to the traffickers.

♦ How can J/TIP leverage its diplomatic power to increase the number of convictions over the coming year?

Answer. The low number of trafficking prosecutions and convictions is a problem that I have worked my entire career to change and is one that I am deeply committed to addressing if confirmed as Ambassador. I will also continue the Department's robust and multifaceted efforts to address global shortcomings in protecting trafficking victims and prosecuting and convicting traffickers, and I will use my position to make clear to governments around the world that it is a uniquely governmental responsibility to hold perpetrators accountable for these crimes.

The annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report is an important tool to this end. The Department publicly documents government efforts to identify and protect victims and prosecute and convict traffickers. I understand Department officials engage foreign governments year round to identify the root causes of inadequate victim protection and law enforcement efforts, and urge authorities to take appropriate action to address deficiencies. The TIP Report is used by a range of stakeholders around the world to encourage government action. If confirmed, I will ensure the TIP Report continues to be the gold standard in assessing government efforts to combat human trafficking and prompting tangible progress around the world. I will do my utmost to ensure that the report remains an effective tool in pushing governments to address their deficiencies in this regard.

Another tool is the foreign assistance administered by the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. I know firsthand that such assistance plays an important role in supporting government efforts to address this crime and the needs of victims around the world. If confirmed, I will ensure these resources are used effectively to build the capacity of government law enforcement and victim protection efforts.

Governments are ultimately responsible for holding traffickers accountable and protecting trafficking victims. If confirmed, I will use the tools at my disposal to urge all governments to fulfill this responsibility.

Question. For several years, antitrafficking activists have raised concerns about the politicization of the TIP Report—namely that countries are sometimes upgraded undeservedly when it serves other political interests for the U.S. Government. Each time this happens, it sends a strong signal overseas that politics is more important than combating trafficking.

♦ Given the widely held perception that several countries were undeservedly upgraded in this year's report for political reasons, what will be done to rebuild the credibility of the report?

Answer. I have closely followed the release of this year's Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report and the concerns expressed by members of this committee regarding the tier ranking decisions and the integrity of the report.

Congress created the TIP Report and the tier rankings to provide a means for the Secretary both to make objective assessments of government efforts to combat human trafficking and to publish the conclusions of those assessments in an effort to prompt tangible progress around the world. Since 2001, the TIP Report has helped make antitrafficking efforts an essential component of United States foreign policy. It is widely—and rightly—recognized as the “gold standard” in assessing government efforts around the world and urging improvements. I understand the Department strives to make the report as objective and accurate as possible, documenting the successes and shortcomings of government antitrafficking efforts measured against the minimum standards established under U.S. law. The power and influence of the report depends on maintaining the integrity of tier rankings and the accompanying country analyses.

If confirmed, I will be a visible and vocal champion of the Report within the Department and I commit to ensuring its impartial standards and using the full range of resources at my disposal to maintain those standards. I will also encourage the Department to continue to use the report to elevate this issue on the global stage, to guide its antitrafficking programming around the world, and to encourage foreign governments to implement recommended improvements in their efforts.

Question. In the 2008 reauthorization of the TVPRA, the State Department was authorized to suspend certain categories of U.S. visas (A-3/G-5) used for guest workers at specific diplomatic missions or international organizations that have abused or exploited such workers in the past. Despite several cases, the State Department has yet to suspend any countries A-3/G-5 visa programs for abuse.

♦ If confirmed, will you ensure that this portion of the TVPRA is enforced?

Answer. The fair treatment of domestic workers employed by members of foreign missions in the United States is a matter of particular importance to the State Department. If confirmed, I will take allegations of domestic worker abuse very seriously.

It is my understanding that an internal Department working group convenes to review allegations of domestic worker abuse and brings them to the attention of the relevant foreign chief of mission, with a requirement to review the allegations and report back to the Department promptly regarding the findings.

The Department also regularly reminds foreign chiefs of mission of their obligations toward domestic workers, as well as their obligation to comply with U.S. laws and Department requirements relating to the employment of domestic workers, including the suspension provision in the 2008 TVPRA.

If confirmed, I will do my utmost to ensure the Department continues to review every allegation of domestic worker abuse that is brought to its attention and take appropriate action. I will support Department of State efforts to work with the diplomatic community on matters related to U.S. investigations into alleged abuse and compliance with U.S. requirements relating to the employment of domestic workers. If confirmed, I will take seriously the suspension requirements of the 2008 TVPRA and make recommendations to the Secretary accordingly.

DIRECTOR-DESIGNATE COPPEDGE'S RESPONSES TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR MARKEY

Question. Trafficking in persons is a crime that has a devastating role in the fishing and maritime industry. U.S. companies should bear some responsibility to prevent goods secured through the use of human trafficking victims from accessing U.S. markets.

♦ Please describe how the State Department, in coordination with other relevant U.S. Government agencies, is conducting outreach to U.S. companies and suppliers to identify and mitigate sources of goods supplied with the use of trafficking victims, particularly in the fishing industry.

Answer. The Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (TIP Office) has long documented the risks of human trafficking in the seafood sector. In recent years, a growing body of reporting has documented forced labor on coastal and deep sea fishing vessels, as well as in shrimp farming and seafood processing. In an industry where a largely migrant workforce faces harsh conditions, isolation at sea, and environmental factors that are forcing boats to travel greater distances for longer periods of time, the risks of trafficking in persons loom large. The 2015 annual Trafficking in Persons Report noted that 54 of 188 country narratives referenced forced labor in the seafood sector.

It is my understanding that the Department is working with the business community to support companies in addressing the problem of forced labor in their supply chains, and also to leverage additional avenues of pressure on governments to establish and enforce clear antitrafficking laws and regulations that ensure respect for human rights and fair trade practices.

I also understand that the Department of State regularly meets and consults with a variety of companies—including from the fishing, electronics, and travel and tourism industries—that have expressed an interest in addressing the potential vulnerability of human trafficking in supply chains. The TIP Office convenes meetings with industry in coordination with other federal agencies, such as the Department of Labor, the Office of Management and Budget, and USAID. Specifically related to seafood, the TIP Office has convened NGOs, multinational corporations and associations, government officials, and leading academics to discuss the issue of human trafficking in the seafood sector, share model approaches to preventing such forced labor, and forge new partnerships. TIP Office staff members have also given presentations, met with seafood suppliers, and traveled with an industry coalition to Thailand to gain further insight, together with U.S. mission personnel, to examine the risks of human trafficking in the fishing industry as well as consider solutions to address concerns.

Following the release of Executive Order 13627, Strengthening Protections Against Trafficking in Persons in Federal Contracts, the Senior Policy Operating Group's Procurement and Supply Chains Committee and its members participated in a lengthy process for reviewing public comments and developing amendments to the Federal Acquisition Regulation (FAR) implementing both the EO and Title XVII (Ending Trafficking in Government Contracting) of the 2013 National Defense Authorization Act. Committee members also participated in updating training for Federal Acquisitions personnel across the U.S. Government.

I know that to support this work, the TIP Office entered into a cooperative agreement with Verité, an NGO leader in supply chain management, to gather data on the areas of greatest risk of trafficking in global supply chains and produced a report on those sectors and commodities with a history or indications of supporting trafficking or trafficking-related activities. In addition, under the agreement, Verité will develop tools for federal contractors and corporations to analyze the risks of trafficking in their supply chains and implement ethical sourcing guidelines. The initiative included outreach to corporations to solicit expertise and advice to inform the development of the tools to be used by federal contractors and businesses. Finally, the initiative includes a pilot project to engage seafood sector companies and then provide tailored guidance for those companies who wish to adopt promising practices consistent with the principles of the EO.

The State Department also chairs the Presidential Task Force on Combating Illegal, Unreported, and Unregulated Fishing and Seafood Fraud (IUU Task Force), a practice that has significant overlap with issues of human trafficking.

Question. Earlier this year, the State Department named Ghana as the first country in which to implement the Child Protection Compacts, which have a specific focus to prioritize the rescue of children in slave labor conditions and hold perpetrators of child slave labor accountable for these crimes.

♦ As the head of the Trafficking in Persons Office, what will you do to ensure that the Ghanaian Government upholds their agreement to focus on the rescue of children enslaved and the arrest and prosecution of perpetrators? Also, how will you ensure that the Child Protection Compacts continue to be implemented in other countries to build successful models for ending child slavery?

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure that the TIP Office closely monitors activities to implement the first Child Protection Compact (CPC) Partnership between the United States and the Government of Ghana. I will ask for regular reports noting any progress and obstacles toward achieving the jointly developed objectives of enhanced child protection, more effective prosecution of child traffickers, and prevention of the crime. If the Government of Ghana fails to adhere to its responsibilities under the CPC Partnership, the authorizing legislation permits the Secretary to suspend or terminate the assistance and to reinstate it after corrective action is taken. I also expect to engage the Ghanaian ministries participating in the CPC Partnership in an annual high-level bilateral dialogue to highlight accomplishments and challenges and to chart corrective action, if needed.

I look forward, if confirmed, and should funds become available for this purpose, to implementing this unique model of foreign assistance by identifying additional prospective countries for such a Partnership, conducting appropriate interagency consultations, assessing the feasibility and likelihood of success, and negotiating future CPC Partnerships. In doing so, I would build on the Office's experience and lessons learned through establishing the first CPC Partnership with Ghana.

NOMINATIONS

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 1, 2015

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, DC.

Hon. Robert Porter Jackson, of Virginia, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Republic of Ghana
Hon. Harry K. Thomas, Jr., of New York, to be Ambassador to the Republic of Zimbabwe
Julie Furuta-Toy of Wyoming, a Career Member of the Senior Foreign Service, Class of Counselor, to be Ambassador to the Republic of Equatorial Guinea
Dennis B. Hankins, of Minnesota, a Career Member of the Senior Foreign Service Class of Minister-Counselor, to be Ambassador to the Republic of Guinea
Linda I. Etim, of Wisconsin, to be an Assistant Administrator of the United States Agency for International Development

The committee met, pursuant to notice, at 2:04 p.m., in room SD-419, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Hon. Jeff Flake, presiding.

Present: Senators Flake, Gardner, Barrasso, Markey, Murphy, and Kaine.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. JEFF FLAKE, U.S. SENATOR FROM ARIZONA

Senator FLAKE. This hearing of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee will come to order.

I welcome you all to this hearing.

I was pleased to meet with all of you in my office earlier. I appreciate you making that effort to get to know you better and talk about your history and what you hope to accomplish. As you know, I have long had an interest in African affairs and had some opportunity to spend time there, including in Zimbabwe where one of the nominees is headed.

Today we will hear from nominees for Ghana, Zimbabwe, Equatorial Guinea, and Guinea, and from the nominee to serve as Assistant Administrator at AID in its Africa Bureau. We will also examine a wide variety of issues.

Ghana has embarked on its second MCC compact to address energy issues facing the country while it tries to diversify its economy away from oil.

Zimbabwe's aged dictator, Robert Mugabe, is beginning to show signs that his age may give way to succession at some point, and we will be watching that leadership struggle in that country.

Equatorial Guinea continues to struggle with human rights and developing its resources in a way to benefit all of its citizens.

Guinea, of course, is picking up the pieces from the Ebola outbreak that wrought such devastation there and is looking forward to building a post-Ebola health care system.

Lastly, we will look at how the Africa Bureau and USAID can bridge the gap from this administration to the next one while ensuring little or no disruption in the work that it is doing in sub-Saharan Africa.

I thank all of you for your time, for sharing your experiences and your expertise with us. I look forward to your testimony. We have a PAC scheduled around this today, and so I hope you do not take our desire for brevity in this hearing as anything other than we have a busy schedule and we appreciate you being here and also appreciate—I know many of you have family members sitting behind you, and hopefully you will recognize them in your testimony.

But I would like to recognize Senator Markey for his comments.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY,
U.S. SENATOR FROM MASSACHUSETTS

Senator MARKEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, very much. And thank you for your leadership on the subcommittee and for convening this hearing to consider the nomination of these distinguished public servants to serve as United States Ambassadors to countries in Africa and one to lead USAID's Africa Bureau.

And to all the nominees who are here today, thank you for dedicating your lives in service to our country. Every one of you has served with a commitment and a dedication that we appreciate and admire.

These are important nominations. Africa presents much opportunity but also many challenges.

Mr. Chairman, when you and I joined the President in Africa this summer, we saw firsthand the possibilities to spark Africa's existing entrepreneurial spirit to create unprecedented economic opportunity and growth. We can and we should spur this growth by supporting expanded access to sustainable sources of power, innovative telecommunications, and Internet connectivity. All of these are fundamental requirements for commercial and social success in this modern 21st century era.

At the same time, Africa faces tremendous challenges. We must strongly support efforts to prevent trafficking in persons, protect human rights, including the right of LGBT people, and strengthen democracy and good governance.

So I look forward to the hearing today, and again, we thank all of you for being here and your willingness to serve our country.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you, Senator Markey.

Our first nominee is Robert Porter Jackson, career member of the Senior Foreign Service, most recently at the State Department and prior to that Ambassador to the Republic of Cameroon, with previous postings in Morocco, Cote d'Ivoire, Zimbabwe, Botswana, Nigeria, Burundi. It is just about all of Africa there.

Our second nominee, Harry K. Thomas, a career member of the Senior Foreign Service, currently serving as Diplomat in Residence at Arizona State University. A smart man. [Laughter.]

I understand your wife enjoys it there as well. That is a good place to be. Everybody ends up in Arizona at some point, I should mention.

Prior to that he served as Ambassador to the Philippines, previously posted in Washington, DC, and also around the world.

Our third nominee is Julie Furuta-Toy, who is a career member of the Foreign Service as well. Her current posting is at our Embassy in Oslo, previous posts in Ghana, Washington, DC, and around the world. We talked in my office about springing from the equator up to Scandinavia and back. So that is quite a trip. I do not know what kind of clothes you pack wherever you go, but it has to be a variety.

Our fourth nominee is Dennis B. Hankins, career member of the Senior Foreign Service also. He currently serves at our consulate in Brazil, prior postings in Sudan, Mauritania, Mozambique, DRC, and elsewhere.

And also, the last as well, but Linda and I traveled in Africa recently, Linda Etim from Wisconsin, Assistant Administrator to USAID, the Africa Bureau there. I enjoyed being with you and Senator Markey as well and Kenya and Ethiopia. So I look forward to hearing your testimony.

We will start with Ambassador Jackson.

STATEMENT OF HON. ROBERT PORTER JACKSON, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF GHANA

Ambassador JACKSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Ranking Member. I am honored to appear before you today, and I am grateful for the confidence that President Obama and Secretary Kerry have placed in me as their nominee to be the Ambassador to the Republic of Ghana.

I am joined by my wife, Babs Jackson, and other friends and colleagues this afternoon.

Since I joined the Foreign Service 33 years ago, as you noted, I have served on three continents, as well as here at home. In these assignments, I have endeavored to promote human rights, strengthen civil society, foster development, and expand U.S. exports. I have repeatedly returned to Africa because I have found that in the course of 2 or 3 years, one can see what one has accomplished. I found that especially true as Ambassador to Cameroon. If confirmed as the next U.S. Ambassador to Ghana, I will draw upon these experiences to advance U.S. interests in Africa.

Ghana is a strong partner of the United States, sharing democratic values and goals of human rights, economic growth, and regional stability. If confirmed, my priorities will be to promote democracy, good governance, peace, trade, education, and health, to unlock Ghana's potential for sustained, inclusive, broad-based eco-conomic growth, and to help it graduate from traditional development assistance.

Ghana is widely considered one of the leading democracies on the African Continent, with active political parties and civil society organizations. Ghana's democracy benefits from a lively media, a history of peaceful political transitions, an apolitical military, and a good human rights record. Celebrating 58 years of independence in 2015, Ghana has held six national elections since 1992, and power has alternated between its two largest political parties. If confirmed, I look forward to witnessing Ghana achieve its seventh consecutive peaceful and transparent national democratic elections in December of 2016.

Ghana has been hit hard by low prices for its three major exports: cocoa, gold, and oil. Nonetheless, Ghana has the potential to become one of sub-Saharan Africa's leading economies and provides enormous opportunities for bilateral trade and investment. While Ghana takes advantage of the African Growth and Opportunity Act, continued assistance to increase domestic capacity and market competitiveness is needed to help Ghanaian businesses take full advantage of trade benefits provided by this legislation. The recently launched Trade Africa Expansion Initiative, along with USAID's West African Trade Hub, will play key roles in building the capacity of Ghanaian institutions and supporting Ghana's efforts to expand exports. Along with the USAID-led Feed the Future programs, the Trade Hub will also increase regional trade in agricultural products to improve food security. If confirmed, I will explore new and innovative approaches to expand commercial ties.

One of the brakes on Ghana's growth has been inadequate infrastructure, especially in the energy sector. Ghana completed a 5-year Millennium Challenge account compact in 2012 focused on agricultural and rural development, and Ghana signed a second compact during the U.S.-Africa Leaders Summit last August, this one focusing on the power sector.

The summit itself highlighted U.S. ties with Africa. People-to-people links between the United States and Ghana have grown ever stronger over the last 50-plus years, and we have enjoyed a continuous and vibrant Peace Corps presence, as well as other exchange programs. Ghana is the original Peace Corps country, and Ghanaians are proud to say that while Peace Corps was born in the United States, it learned to walk in Ghana. More than 4,000 Peace Corps Volunteers have served in Ghana since 1961, and there are currently 136 Volunteers in agriculture, education, and health projects. In fact, Ghana has made steady but uneven progress in improving health over the last decade.

Ghana and the United States share an interest in countering terrorism, securing maritime borders, and promoting regional stability. We are also working together to combat drug and human trafficking. Ghana is an important supporter of peacekeeping and law enforcement through the Kofi Annan Peacekeeping Center and a regional training center, respectively. A longtime participant in peacekeeping operations, Ghana is also a partner in the Security Governance Initiative and the African Peacekeeping Rapid Response Initiative. And its stability has contributed to peace and security in West Africa.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Ranking Member, I thank you for the opportunity to address you this afternoon, and I welcome your questions. [The prepared statement of Ambassador Jackson follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF ROBERT P. JACKSON

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Ranking Member, and other members of the committee, I am honored to appear before you today. I am grateful for the confidence that President Obama and Secretary Kerry have placed in me as their nominee for Ambassador to the Republic of Ghana. I am joined today by Babette Pollard Jackson, my wife and partner for the last 26 years.

Since I entered the Foreign Service 33 years ago, I have served in Canada, Burundi, Zimbabwe, Portugal, Cote d'Ivoire, Senegal, Morocco, and Cameroon, as well as here at home. In these assignments, I have endeavored to promote human rights, strengthen civil society, foster development, and expand U.S. exports. I have repeatedly returned to Africa because I have found that, in the course of 2 or 3 years, one can see one's accomplishments; I found that especially true as Ambassador to the Republic of Cameroon. If confirmed as the next U.S. Ambassador to the Republic of Ghana, I will draw upon these experiences to advance U.S. interests in Africa.

Ghana is a strong partner of the United States, sharing democratic values and goals of human rights, economic growth, and regional stability. If confirmed, my priorities will be to promote democracy, good governance, peace, trade, education, and health, to unlock Ghana's potential for sustained, inclusive, broad-based economic growth and to help it graduate from traditional development assistance.

Ghana is widely considered one of the leading democracies on the African Continent, with active political parties and civil society organizations. Ghana's democracy benefits from a lively media, a history of peaceful political transitions between the two main political parties, an apolitical military, and a good human rights record. Celebrating 58 years of independence in 2015, Ghana has held six national elections since 1992, and power has alternated between its two-largest political parties. If confirmed, I look forward to witnessing Ghana achieve its seventh consecutive peaceful and transparent national democratic elections in December 2016.

Ghana has been hit hard by low prices for its three major exports: cocoa, gold, and oil. Nonetheless, Ghana has the potential to become one of sub-Saharan Africa's leading economies and provides enormous opportunities for bilateral trade and investment. While Ghana takes advantage of the African Growth and Opportunity Act (AGOA), continued assistance to increase domestic capacity and market competitiveness is needed to help Ghanaian businesses take full advantage of the trade benefits provided by this legislation. The recently launched Trade Africa Expansion Initiative, along with USAID's West African Trade Hub, will play key roles in building the capacity of Ghanaian institutions and supporting Ghana's efforts to expand exports. Along with the USAID-led bilateral Feed the Future programs, the Trade Hub will also increase regional trade in agricultural products to improve food security. If confirmed, I will explore new and innovative approaches to expand commercial ties between the United States and Ghana.

One of the brakes on Ghana's growth has been inadequate infrastructure, especially in the energy sector. Ghana completed a 5-year $547 million Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC) compact in 2012 focused on agriculture and rural development. Ghana signed a second MCC compact to transform the power sector on August 5, 2014, during the U.S.-Africa Leaders summit.

The summit highlighted U.S. ties with Africa. People-to-people links between the United States and Ghana have grown ever stronger through more than 50 years of a continuous and vibrant Peace Corps presence, as well as Fulbright, Humphrey, Community College Initiative (CCI), and Kennedy-Lugar Youth Exchange and Study (YES) exchange programs. Ghana is the original Peace Corps country and is proud of the fact that while Peace Corps was born in America, it learned to walk in Ghana. More than 4,410 Peace Corps volunteers have served in Ghana since the program was established in 1961. There are currently 136 volunteers in Ghana working with their communities on projects in education, agriculture, and health.

Ghana has made significant but uneven progress in improving health over the past decade. One of the key bottlenecks across almost all health indicators is the uneven distribution of wealth between Ghana's impoverished North and the more affluent South. Many of our programs, including basic education, health, and agricultural assistance, therefore, focus on the North.

Ghana and the United States share an interest in countering terrorism, securing the maritime borders, and promoting regional stability. We are also working together to combat escalating drug and human trafficking. Ghana is an important supporter of peacekeeping through the Kofi Annan Peacekeeping Training Center and law enforcement-oriented efforts through the Regional Training Center. A long-time participant in the Africa Contingency Operations Training and Assistance (ACOTA) program, Ghana is also a partner country in the Security Governance Initiative and the African Peacekeeping Rapid Response Partnership (A-PRRP). Stability in Ghana has contributed to peace and security in West Africa, and if confirmed, I will support Ghana's efforts to promote regional and global stability. Of course, as is the case for all Ambassadors, protecting the safety and welfare of U.S. citizens will be a top priority.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, for the opportunity to address you today. I welcome your questions.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you, Mr. Jackson.
Mr. Thomas.

STATEMENT OF HON. HARRY K. THOMAS, JR., NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF ZIMBABWE

Ambassador THOMAS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am honored to appear before you today and grateful to President Obama, Secretary Kerry, and Assistant Secretary Linda Thomas-Greenfield for the confidence they have placed in me as their nominee for Ambassador to the Republic of Zimbabwe.

Permit me to thank my family for their support, especially my wife and partner, Mithi Aquino-Thomas; my sister, Nelda Canada; my cousins, Jen and Sharon Boyd; Comitrik and Leslie Smith; and my niece, Alya Thomas. We are also joined by friends from around the globe, and I very much appreciate their attendance to witness how our democracy functions.

I would like to add my sincere appreciation to my mom who is here today, Hildonia Thomas, robust at 91, and my late father, Harry Thomas, Sr., whose guidance and love gave me the opportunity to be before you today.

A special thanks to my in-laws, Colonel Aquino and Dr. Aquino, for their faith and trust in me.

Finally, our three children, Casey, Emmanuel Miguel, and Zoe are away at university but with us today in spirit.

Mr. Chairman, I will summarize my remarks as the entire testimony has been entered into the record.

Mr. Chairman, if confirmed, my top priorities will be to ensure the security and safety of American citizens and to advance the interests and values of the United States and the American people.

I am excited at the possibility of returning to Zimbabwe where I previously served our Nation during a time of relative harmony. It is the land where our daughter, Casey, learned to walk, talk, and respect the wonderful people of Zimbabwe. It is where I visited the beautiful and important game parks that must be protected, saw the great historic Zimbabwe ruins, experienced the wondrous Victoria Falls, and witnessed the excitement the entire world shared when Nelson Mandela was released from prison and paid his initial visit to Harare as an example of forgiveness, tolerance, and respect for human rights.

With full recognition of the complex challenges Zimbabwe faces, I remain optimistic about the country's future and believe that the United States has an important role to play in helping the people of Zimbabwe build a just, free, and prosperous nation. The trajectory of Zimbabwe's recent past should not obscure the nation's tremendous potential. Though battered by more than a decade of political strife, economic decline, and challenges to its health system, Zimbabwe retains a foundational human and physical infrastructure upon which it can build a strong future. It is in the interest of the United States to be a partner in that process, and if confirmed, I will continue the work of building productive and respectful relationships with all Zimbabweans of good will.

The United States has shown its deep and abiding concern for Zimbabwe through the nearly $1 billion in humanitarian relief and health-related assistance we have provided to its people just in the last decade. There is no more explicit expression of our support for the people of Zimbabwe than our standing by them through their times of greatest need. We need, however, to prepare to move beyond a relationship defined by aid.

U.S. policy in Zimbabwe is not about regime change. Only the people of Zimbabwe have the ability to change their government. Our policies support principles not parties or people. When, however, self-determination is denied, as it is in Zimbabwe through political violence, fraudulent and mismanaged elections, and restrictions on the rights and opportunity to take part in the conduct of public affairs, the United States cannot ignore such human rights violations. We have taken principled steps to demonstrate our concern about the actions of those responsible for and those who profit from miscarriages of the promise Zimbabwe offered at independence. We will consistently stand for the rights of Zimbabweans to participate fully in their nation's political process.

If confirmed, I will work to enable Zimbabwe to become a just, prosperous, and democratic state that meets the needs of its people, contributes to security and development in the region, and plays an important role in world affairs. We will not always agree with the Government of Zimbabwe, but we will always attempt to maintain a respectful and open dialogue.

The United States seeks the full implementation of the 2013 Constitution: credible, lasting democratic reforms; and respect for human rights and the rule of law. If confirmed, I will work toward those objectives which could be a trigger for the United States to open a much more dynamic relationship.

Thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today, and I would be happy to answer any questions.

[The prepared statement of Ambassador Thomas follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF HARRY K. THOMAS, JR.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am honored to appear before you today, and grateful to President Obama, Secretary Kerry, and Assistant Secretary Linda Thomas-Greenfield for the confidence they have placed in me as their nominee for Ambassador to the Republic of Zimbabwe. Please permit me to thank my family for their support especially my wife and partner Mithi Aquino-Thomas, a human resources instructor, my sister, Nelda Canada, a retired paralegal, my cousins, Ray and Jen Boyd, retired U.S. Government officials, and Sharon Boyd, who works for the Fairfax County Police. I would like to add my sincere appreciation to my mom, Hildonia Thomas, a former teacher and social worker, and my late father, Harry Thomas, Sr., whose guidance and love gave me the opportunity to be before you today. A special thanks to my in-laws, Col. Aquino and Doctor Aquino, for their faith and trust in me. Finally, our three children Casey, Emmanuel Miguel, and Zoe are away at university but with us today in spirit.

There is no more explicit expression of our support for the people of Zimbabwe than our standing by them through their times of greatest need. We need, however, to prepare to move beyond a relationship defined by aid. Zimbabweans are fully capable of feeding themselves, meeting the nation's health and education needs, building a dynamic political system, and restoring what was once one of the strongest economies in Africa. Zimbabwe can and should be a nation of economic opportunities, of respect for the rule of law and the human rights of all people. Those are values that reflect the core of what Americans share with Zimbabweans and that we should pursue together.

U.S. policy in Zimbabwe is not about regime change. Only the people of Zimbabwe have the ability to change their government. Our policies support principles, not parties or people. When, however, self-determination is denied, as it is in Zimbabwe through political violence, fraudulent and mismanaged elections, and restrictions on the right and opportunity to take part in the conduct of public affairs, the United States cannot ignore such human rights violations. If confirmed, I will work to enable Zimbabwe to become a just, prosperous, and democratic state that meets the needs of its people, contributes to security and development in the region, and plays an important role in world affairs. That was U.S. policy in 1980 when we were the first nation to recognize Zimbabwe's independence, and it continues to be our policy. We will not always agree with the Government of Zimbabwe, but we will always attempt to maintain a respectful and open dialogue.

The United States seeks the full implementation of the 2013 Constitution; credible, lasting democratic reforms; and respect for human rights and rule of law by the Government of Zimbabwe. If confirmed, I will work toward those objectives, which could be a trigger for the United States to open a much more dynamic relationship.

If confirmed, I will give special attention to the welfare and security of American citizens in Zimbabwe and to meeting with people from across the rich spectrum of Zimbabwe's society, making an assessment of the situation there and offering recommendations on the best way forward. As we continue to urge democratic development, we must also continue to invest in the people of Zimbabwe—the health, people-to-people exchanges, humanitarian aid, and business development work—to preserve the human capital needed to rebuild Zimbabwe in the years ahead. I have faith that with this support, once given the opportunity to communicate, organize, and express their will, the people of Zimbabwe will find the best path forward and pursue it successfully.

Thank you for the opportunity to appear before you and I would be happy to answer questions.

Senator FLAKE. Well, thank you, Mr. Thomas. As they say in Zimbabwe, makorokoto. Congratulations for this nomination.

And before Ms. Furuta-Toy says something, we have a home State Senator who wanted to say something.

Senator BARRASSO. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate the opportunity to congratulate all the nominees and thank you for your commitment to service.

I absolutely do want to take a moment to welcome Julie Furuta-Toy to the committee. I would love to stay. I am chairing a Public Lands Subcommittee hearing this afternoon, but I did want to come and congratulate each of you and to talk specifically about a proud resident of the great State of Wyoming. A number of years ago, Julie and her husband Steven made the wise decision to make Cody, WY, their home. As many of you know, Cody is a wonderful town, full of natural beauty. It is the gateway to Wyoming's crown jewel, Yellowstone National Park, and the home of former Wyoming U.S. Senator Alan Simpson. So if you need any advice, call Al. [Laughter.]

He will put it in terms and he will be able to make it very clear to anyone listening exactly what he has in mind.

But I will just tell you as a career member of the Senior Foreign Service, Julie Furuta-Toy has worked in many critical countries across the globe, including Mexico, the Philippines, Haiti, Russia, Ghana, India, Norway. Her 29 years of service has provided her with the knowledge, the skills, the experiences to address the many challenges and adventures ahead. I am very grateful for her willingness to serve our country and to provide strong leadership in implementing the foreign policy goals of the United States. It is clear that she will make her family, the people of Wyoming, and our Nation very proud.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator FLAKE. Well, thank you. You are right to be proud.

Mr. Hankins? Oh, I am sorry. [Laughter.]

I thought he was speaking for you.

Senator BARRASSO. She will take questions later. [Laughter.]

Senator FLAKE. I apologize. Ms. Furuta-Toy.

STATEMENT OF JULIE FURUTA-TOY, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF EQUATORIAL GUINEA

Ms. FURUTA-TOY. Thank you very much, Chairman Flake, Ranking Member Markey, Senator Barrasso, Senator Kaine. I am very pleased today to have the opportunity to testify before you. It is a great honor for me to appear this afternoon as the nominee to be the next United States Ambassador to the Republic of Equatorial Guinea. And I am grateful for the confidence that President Obama and Secretary of State Kerry have placed in me. If confirmed by the Senate, I will do my best to uphold this trust and further the U.S. national interests.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that my husband, Steve, is in Wyoming today and my daughter, Sara, is unable to be here, but I am pleased to introduce to you my son, Eliot. He was born during my first tour in the Foreign Service 27 years ago in Manila, the Philippines.

And since then, as Senator Barrasso has noted, I have served in many places around the world, a disparate group of countries that has demonstrated to me similar disparate attitudes towards the rule of law, good governance, and transparency.

While serving as the Deputy Chief of Mission in Ghana, I am proud to have implemented U.S. foreign policy focused on reducing and eliminating the worst forms of child labor and trafficking in persons. And through interagency dialogue and strong support from the Department of State and U.S. Congress, we were also able to promote important educational exchanges, target assistance towards the country's impediments to growth, and support U.S. commercial interests.

Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Markey, if confirmed, I look forward to working with you and the honorable members of this committee similarly to advance U.S. interests in Equatorial Guinea. U.S. policy priorities in Equatorial Guinea are to encourage the government there to open democratic space to the opposition, increase respect for human rights and civil liberties, strengthen our commercial ties and diversify its economy, and to increase economic, health, and educational opportunities for all its citizens.

Equatorial Guinea, with a population of about 1 million people, is located on the strategic Gulf of Guinea. Although the country is nominally a multiparty, constitutional republic, President Obiang's Democratic Party of Equatorial Guinea has been in power since a military coup in 1979. The party controls all but one seat in the Chamber of Deputies and one seat in the Senate. Opposition political parties are severely restricted, and opposition leaders have faced harassment, intimidation, and arrest.

Equatorial Guinea is the third-largest producer of oil in sub-Saharan Africa and has one of the highest per-capita income rates in Africa. Despite this, much of its population lives below the poverty level and official corruption is widespread. Should I be confirmed, I will stress and encourage the country's leadership to respect human rights and rule of law. I will also urge that government leaders pursue multi-party democracy and facilitate the growth of a strong civil society. And I will stress that promoting transparency and ending corrupt practices are key to Equatorial Guinea's long-term growth and stability.

The United States has a robust economic relationship with Equatorial Guinea and remains its largest trading partner. The U.S. Embassy plays a critical trade facilitation and promotion role for U.S. investors in Equatorial Guinea. U.S. oil companies are Equatorial Guinea's largest investors, and they have the lead role in oil and gas exploration and extraction. Moreover, last year, Equatorial Guinea was the ninth-largest African market for U.S. exports. Should I be confirmed, I will continue to work to protect the commercial interests of U.S. oil companies invested in Equatorial Guinea.

Mr. Chairman, while our bilateral dialogue and engagement pays heed to Equatorial Guinea's sovereignty and traditions, we must also be frank in discussing our concerns. If confirmed, I will continue to promote U.S. interests and encourage Equatorial Guinea's further political, economic, and social development while vigilantly protecting the safety of our Embassy personnel and their families.

And finally, if confirmed, no goal will be more important to me than protecting the lives, interests, and welfare of American citizens living and traveling in Equatorial Guinea.

I promise to work closely with you and the members of this committee in this endeavor.

I thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today, and I would be pleased to answer any questions you may have.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

Mr. Hankins.

STATEMENT OF DENNIS B. HANKINS, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF GUINEA

Mr. HANKINS. Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, I am deeply honored to appear before you today and grateful to President Obama and Secretary Kerry for the confidence they have placed in me as their nominee for Ambassador to the Republic of Guinea.

I want to recognize my wife, Mira, who is here today. She has been by my side through 31 years in the Foreign Service, and I credit her for providing support for any success I may have had. My son, Danu, cannot be here today due to his service commitments with the United States Navy.

It has been my honor to serve in 16 assignments during my Foreign Service career, with six of those assignments spanning 14 years focused on Africa. Many of my assignments have been in countries in the midst of or emerging from crisis. Despite the challenges of these postings, I have relished the opportunity to engage in diplomacy that can dramatically affect a country's future and advance American interests.

My experience in a number of young African democracies tells me that the transition from dictatorship to an open society requires constant sustained attention and commitment by national leaders and all segments of society. Guineans have made it clear that they want to see the United States working hand in hand with all three branches of the Guinean Government to reinforce Guinea's democratic architecture. Our work to strengthen media reforms and civil society is just as important. As part of our work with the executive branch, we continue to work with Guinea's security apparatus, the military and police, to strengthen its professionalism and bring it firmly under elected civilian authority. Finally, we must sustain our efforts to reduce poverty and disease in Guinea, including by strengthening the health system. Responsible management of Guinea's mineral wealth is key to Guinea's long-term poverty reduction efforts. The challenges are many and will only be overcome through true Guinean commitment, but we need to support those who wish to help their country.

The Republic of Guinea achieved a landmark election in 2010, its first free and democratic Presidential election. If confirmed, I will work hard to ensure U.S. support for Guinea's nascent democracy continues in a meaningful and impactful way. Guinea will hold its second Presidential elections in 11 days. If confirmed, my priority will be to work with the newly elected administration and opposition parties in building an inclusive and constructive political dialogue. Looking toward the new year, my focus will shift to local elections. These upcoming elections provide Guinea the concrete opportunity to further deepen its transition to democracy.

In the midst of Presidential elections, Guinea continues to battle the Ebola outbreak. If confirmed, I will remain firmly committed and fully committed to helping Guinea get to zero in its fight against Ebola. The persistent transmission of Ebola over the past 18 months highlights the fragility of primary health care facilities in the country and deep-rooted public health challenges. The United States continues to provide significant technical assistance to Guinea on restoring and improving the health care system, as well as ending the Ebola epidemic. I look forward to supporting the efforts of USAID, CDC, and NIH in Guinea.

In the long term, if confirmed, I will encourage the Guinean Government to remain a constructive regional and international actor and will work with the government and all segments of society to foster better political and economic decisionmaking at home. In the Republic of Guinea, we have a willing partner on regional and international issues, yet the government's capacity is limited. If confirmed, I will work with the Guinean Government to further strengthen its approach to regional crises. I will also work to strengthen cooperation on counternarcotics issues, as well as other forms of transnational crimes such as trafficking in persons and money laundering. I will make the safety and welfare of my staff and all U.S. citizens my highest priority and seek out commercial opportunities for U.S. companies.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, for the opportunity to address you today. If confirmed, I look forward to working with you and representing the interests of the American people in Guinea.

I am happy to answer any questions.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Hankins follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF DENNIS B. HANKINS

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am deeply honored to appear before you today, and grateful to President Obama and Secretary Kerry for the confidence they have placed in me as their nominee for Ambassador to the Republic of Guinea. I want to recognize my wife, Mira, who is here today. She has been at my side through my 31 years in the Foreign Service, and I credit her for providing support for any success I may have had. My son, Danu, cannot be here today due to his service commitments in the United States Navy.

It has been my honor to serve in 16 assignments during my Foreign Service career with 6 of those assignments—spanning 14—focused on Africa. Many of my assignments have been in countries in the midst of, or emerging from, crisis. Despite the challenges of these postings, I have relished the opportunities to engage in diplomacy that can dramatically affect a country's future and advance American interests.

My experience in a number of young African democracies tells me that the transition from dictatorship to an open society requires constant sustained attention and commitment by national leaders and all segments of society. Guineans have made it clear that they want to see the United States working hand in hand with all three branches of the Guinean Government to reinforce Guinea's democratic architecture. Our work to strengthen media freedoms and civil society is just as important. As part of our work with the executive branch, we continue to work with Guinea's security apparatus—the military and police—to strengthen its professionalism and bring it firmly under elected civilian authority. Finally, we must sustain our efforts to reduce poverty and disease in Guinea, including by strengthening the health system. Responsible management of Guinea's mineral wealth is key to Guinea's long-term poverty reduction efforts. The challenges are many and will only be overcome through true Guinean commitment, but we need to support those who wish to help their country.

The Republic of Guinea achieved a landmark election in 2010, its first free and fair democratic Presidential election. If confirmed, I will work hard to ensure U.S.

support for Guinea's nascent democracy continues in a meaningful and impactful way. Guinea will hold its second Presidential elections in 11 days. If confirmed, my priority will be to work the newly elected administration and opposition parties in building an inclusive and constructive political dialogue. Looking toward the new year, my focus will shift to local elections. These upcoming elections provide Guinea with a concrete opportunity to further deepen its transition to democracy.

In the midst of Presidential elections, Guinea continues to battle the Ebola outbreak. If confirmed, I will remain fully committed to helping Guinea "get to zero" in its fight against Ebola. The persistent transmission of Ebola over the past 18 months highlights the fragility of primary health care facilities in the country and deep-rooted public health challenges. The United States continues to provide significant technical assistance to Guinea on restoring and improving the health care system as well as ending the Ebola epidemic. I look forward to supporting the efforts of USAID and CDC in Guinea.

In the long term, if confirmed, I will encourage the Guinean Government to remain a constructive regional and international actor, and will work with the government and all segments of society to foster better political and economic decision-making at home. In the Republic of Guinea, we have a willing partner on regional and international issues, yet the government's capacity is limited. If confirmed, I will work with the Guinean Government to further strengthen its approach to regional crises. I will also work to strengthen cooperation on counternarcotics issues, as well as other forms of transnational crimes, such as trafficking in persons and money laundering. I will make the safety and welfare of my staff and all U.S. citizens my highest priority and seek out commercial opportunities for U.S. companies.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, for the opportunity to address you today. If confirmed, I look forward to working with you in representing the interests of the American people in Guinea. I am happy to answer any questions.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

Ms. Etim.

STATEMENT OF LINDA I. ETIM, NOMINATED TO BE AN ASSISTANT ADMINISTRATOR OF THE U.S. AGENCY FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Ms. ETIM. Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Markey, distinguished members of the committee, it is an honor to appear before you today as the nominee to be the next Assistant Administrator for USAID's Bureau for Africa.

I want to express my appreciation for the confidence that President Obama has placed in me with this nomination and for the strong support of Secretary Kerry and Acting Administrator Lenhardt. I would also like to take the opportunity to thank Earl Gast, the Africa Bureau's former Assistant Administrator who ably led the bureau of 3 years.

Most importantly, I would like to thank my family, my sister, Ann Etim, who is here today taking her day off of work, as well as parents and our other sister, Jennifer Etim, who recently passed away but remains a constant source of motivation and strength.

My nomination to this post is deeply personal. As the daughter of an immigrant who fled Nigeria for the United States during the Biafran war, I am intimately familiar with the pressures that a country's fragility places on its citizens. After more than a decade of working on African issues for the United States Government, I have seen development improve people's lives and their ability to take their destiny into their own hands. This is why I believe in USAID's mission to end extreme poverty, to promote democratic societies, to bolster security, and to help encourage prosperity for all.

My professional life has been devoted to supporting U.S. efforts to empower Africa's people to fulfill the promise that resides on every corner of the continent. I spent the first few years working for the U.S. Government as a security specialist in African affairs, but more recently at the White House as the National Security Director for Sudan, South Sudan, and East African Affairs. I helped to coordinate U.S. policy on security issues, governance, economic growth, and humanitarian crises. In that position, I saw firsthand the important role that development plays for efforts on the continent.

I was then honored to be appointed as Deputy Assistant Administrator to Africa for USAID, and for the past 3½ years in that position, I have stood side by side with the agency's committed men and women. Many of our staff work in difficult environment and tackle really difficult challenges throughout the world.

If confirmed, in addition to focusing on the management for the bureau, I will concentrate on three objectives. First, I believe we need to continue to invest in Africa's greatest resource, which is its people, to further development, democracy, humanitarian, and governance for this and for future generations.

Second, I will continue USAID's focus on accelerating sustainable development through African-led partnerships.

And third, I will ensure that our work is implemented effectively and that we evaluate the results and apply lessons learned going forward.

Although a number of Africa's challenges can seem intractable, I see both the challenges and the remarkable progress that the African Continent has sustained as bright lights of opportunity. With the strong bipartisan support from Congress, our initiatives across the continent have actually led to some really great results. For example, and as you know, Feed the Future has helped more than 2.5 million African farmers using improved technologies and management practices and has led to increased food security. Through Power Africa, U.S. commitments of $7 billion have mobilized more than $20 billion in private capital which is financing access to energy and will add six million new connections across the continent.

Africa is the fastest-growing continent in the world, and its population in the coming decades will double. Many of its citizens will be under the age of 18. We have the opportunity now to harness the intelligence, creativity, and drive of these young Africans who ignited growth and lead reforms throughout the region. They need enhanced skills. They need access to capital. They need jobs. They need the innovations that will help drive tomorrow's development solutions. This is why I am so supportive of the initiatives that we have here today.

There is no denying that Africa is important to the United States, both from the standpoint of our moral imperative to help solve the biggest development challenges on the planet and because of its impact on our own national security and economic growth. USAID is committed to collaborating with donors and private sector partners to amplify the impact of U.S. investments in development, and if confirmed, I am eager to advance this approach to doing business.

If confirmed, I look forward to continuing to deepen our relationship with Congress. Your long-standing and bipartisan support to the African people has provided the foundation for our programs and is the springboard for our future success.

I thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today, and I welcome any questions you might have. Thanks.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Etim follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF LINDA I. ETIM

Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Markey, distinguished members of the committee, it is an honor to appear before you today as the nominee to be the next Assistant Administrator for Africa at the United States Agency for International Development (USAID).

I want to express my appreciation for the trust and confidence President Obama has placed in me by nominating me for this important position and for the strong support of Secretary Kerry and Acting Administrator Lenhardt. I would also like to thank Earl Gast, the Africa Bureau's former Assistant Administrator who ably led the Bureau for 3 years. Most importantly, I would like to thank my family—my sister, Ann Etim, who is here today, as well as our parents and our other sister, Jennifer Etim, who, although no longer with us, remain my rocks.

My nomination to this post is deeply personal. As the daughter of an immigrant who fled Nigeria for the United States during the Biafran war, I am intimately familiar with the pressures that a country's fragility places on its citizens. After more than a decade working on African issues, I have seen development improve people's lives and help countries grow. That is why I believe USAID's mission to end extreme poverty, promote democratic societies, and bolster security and prosperity for all is essential. If confirmed, I look forward to continuing my support for USAID's new model for sustainable development, one built on partnerships with governments, businesses, universities, and civil society, as well as with the new generation of African leaders, thinkers, entrepreneurs, and innovators, who are leading the transformation of their societies.

My professional life has been devoted to empowering Africa's people to fulfill the promise that resides in every corner of the continent. Throughout my career, I have had the honor to work on some of Africa's most pressing challenges. I spent the first years of my career working for the U.S. Government as a specialist in African security affairs. More recently, as the Director for East African Affairs and Sudan, South Sudan at the National Security Council, I coordinated U.S. policy on civilian-military affairs, governance, economic growth and humanitarian crises in the Horn of Africa. In that position, I saw firsthand the important role of development in Africa and was honored to be appointed Deputy Assistant Administrator for Africa at USAID. During the past 3½ years at USAID, I have stood side by side with the Agency's committed men and women, many of whom work in difficult environments, to tackle critical development challenges. After nearly 15 years working on African affairs I am intimately familiar with the complex fabric that makes up sub-Saharan Africa's 49 countries.

If confirmed, in addition to focusing on the management of the Bureau, I will concentrate on three objectives for the Africa Bureau that I believe are critical to the sustainability, growth, and success of our development goals. First, I believe we need to continue to invest in Africa's greatest resource—its people—to further development, democracy, opportunity, rights and governance for this and future generations. Second, I will continue USAID's focus on accelerating sustainable development through African-led partnerships. Third, I will ensure that our work is implemented effectively, that we evaluate the results, and that we apply those lessons learned going forward.

Although many of Africa's challenges may seem intractable, I see both the challenges and the remarkable progress, led by our African counterparts, as bright lights across the continent. Both Zambia and Nigeria held successful elections this past year. Nigeria's elections were historic, marking the first-ever democratic transfer of power in Africa's most populous nation. With strong bipartisan support from Congress, our initiatives on the continent are bearing fruit. In fiscal year 2014, Feed the Future, the U.S. Government's global hunger and food security initiative, helped nearly 2.5 million African farmers use improved technologies and management practices while spurring $306 million in new agricultural sales on the continent. Recent data suggest that Feed the Future and other efforts contributed to a 9-percent reduction in stunting in Ethiopia between 2011 and 2014 and a 16-percent decrease in poverty in the rural areas of Uganda between 2009–2010 and 2012–2013. Through Power Africa, the United States is working with a range of partners to accelerate private-sector energy transactions, by leveraging the assistance, financing, commercial and diplomatic tools of the U.S. Government, as well as the tools and expertise of our bilateral and multilateral partners and the private sector with the aim of expanding access to electricity by 60 million new connections. Two years after Power Africa's launch, the U.S. Government's commitment of $7 billion has mobilized more than $20 billion in private capital from more than 100 private sector partners.

As the fastest-growing continent, Africa's population in the coming decades will double, and many of its people will be under 18. We have a tremendous challenge but also an opportunity to harness the intelligence, creativity, and drive of these young Africans who will introduce disruptive technologies, ignite growth, and lead reforms throughout the region. They will need enhanced skills and access to capital, jobs, and innovations to help address tomorrow's development challenges. Partnerships are key to this engagement. For example, through the Global Development Alliance agreement with USAID, as part of Feed the Future, Partners in Food Solutions (PFS) transfers technology and knowledge to African processors. PFS is a non-profit organization formed by General Mills that harnesses the global technical expertise of General Mills, Cargill, Royal DSM, and Bühler. Since its inception, PFS has linked 765 volunteers to 119 food processors in Ethiopia, Kenya, Malawi, Tanzania, and Zambia, impacting 829,000 smallholder farmers. We must also promote inclusive development that recognizes women as key drivers of economic growth. In order to end extreme poverty, feed the planet, and build vibrant economies, women and girls must gain access to capital, land, markets, training, and leadership opportunities. That is why I am so supportive of the President's Young African Leaders Initiative, which is investing in the next generation of leaders, who are eager and able to shape Africa's future.

We are building on the successes of the last generation and accounting for new realities, opportunities, and future challenges. With roughly half of the world's extreme poor residing in fragile and conflict affected states, we are remiss to discuss sustainable development gains without emphasizing the realities, needs, and capabilities of those societies in conflict and those trying to emerge from it. In fragile countries like South Sudan, we are assessing how best to help countries experiencing recurring cycles of conflict. South Sudan's peace agreement, signed in late August, while tenuous and fragile, presents an opportunity to mitigate the impact of the conflict on the people of South Sudan and support strategies for sustainable security.

There is no denying Africa's importance to the United States, both for our moral imperative to help solve the biggest development challenges on the planet and because of its impact on the United States own national security and economic growth. USAID is committed to collaborating with donors, private sector partners, and faith-based organizations to leverage our relative strengths and amplify the effect of U.S. investments in development. These efforts are already having an effect on our work in Africa, and if confirmed, I am eager to advance this new approach to doing business.

I know the road ahead is not an easy one. Nowhere does development show more promise yet pose such challenge than it does today in sub-Saharan Africa.

If confirmed, I look forward to working with my talented colleagues at USAID, our partners throughout the U.S. Government, the private sector, multilateral and nongovernmental organizations, and our counterparts in Africa to address critical development and humanitarian needs on the continent. I also look forward to continuing to deepen our relationship with Congress, whose long-time bipartisan commitment to the African people has provided the foundation for our programs and the springboard for our success.

In conclusion, I am honored to be considered for this position and to contribute to the goal of ending extreme poverty and promoting resilient, democratic societies while advancing security and prosperity for both Americans and Africans.

I am deeply committed to USAID's goals and the integrated role that it plays with the Department of State and the Department of Defense in advancing U.S. policy and national security objectives, and if confirmed, I will work diligently toward advancing these goals.

Thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today. I welcome any questions you might have.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you, Ms. Etim.

I will start with a round of questions, and if you could keep your answers as short as possible, we will get as many questions in as we can with five of you there.

Mr. Jackson, with regard to Ghana, you mentioned the challenges on the energy side. Where are most investments needed and how can that be facilitated through the programs that we have? Is it on generation or distribution, transmission, all of the above? Give us a sense of what is needed there.

Ambassador JACKSON. Senator, it is actually all of the above. The Millennium Challenge compact is focused on distribution and construction of an additional gas plant. The Overseas Private Investment Corporation has also invested in an additional gas plant. But there is much more work needed to ensure that many underserved areas of Ghana have access to electricity, and through the Power Africa program, we are attempting to supplement the gains that will be made through the compact. Thank you.

Senator FLAKE. Well, thank you.

Mr. Thomas, as we talked about in my office, I actually wrote my master's thesis on Robert Mugabe and his ability to hold onto power at the end of the 1980s. And here we are almost 30 years later with some of the same issues.

But you mentioned in my office that it will take a generation of work to turn Zimbabwe around. Where do we start? What is the place where the United States needs to start?

Ambassador THOMAS. Well, Senator, you make an excellent point. It will take time. And I think working with the business community in Zimbabwe and the United States to lower economic obstacles, to increase opportunity, to reduce corruption, to make more transparency will be an excellent start for our bilateral relationship and to increase their economic opportunity. Over 65 percent of the people of Zimbabwe are under 40 years of age. Eighty-five percent unemployment rate. So they need this opportunity through business and education, and those are the things that we would look at if I am confirmed. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

Ms. Furuta-Toy, you talked about the issues with regard to government corruption and the lack of distribution of the oil wealth that comes there. Let me turn to security for a minute, maritime security in the Gulf of Guinea. How much of an issue is that, and what contributions is Equatorial Guinea making to that? And is that a partnership with other nations, and are we doing enough in the United States to make sure that we do not have a situation there that we had in the Horn of Africa earlier on?

Ms. FURUTA-TOY. Senator, thank you for that question.

The issue of security in Equatorial Guinea is one that involves all of the nations in the Gulf of Guinea. We have encouraged the Government of Equatorial Guinea to collaborate with its neighbors on maritime security and have supported the participation of Equatorial Guinea on a self-funded, funded by the Equatorial Guinea-Guinean Government, in maritime joint practices in the region.

Beyond that, the Government of Equatorial Guinea really prides itself on being able to provide security and safety for its citizens. And we are encouraging the government to try to take that in a bigger point of view of you are providing security and safety, but you also need to be able to provide a larger democratic space for the opposition for the political process so that the future of the country is better secured.

Approximately half of the country is under the age of 19. So the future really is in the youth and in those future generations.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

Mr. Hankins, between the three countries that have the biggest issue with Ebola, Guinea has had the most difficult time I guess in stamping it out, and some worry that it will be the most likely place for it to flare up again. What can we do on the public health side that we are not doing already to ensure that that does not happen?

Mr. HANKINS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

It is correct then that Ebola started in Guinea and has passed through. We have had more than 3,200 confirmed cases in Guinea of Ebola, and even this past week, we have had four new cases. Where there has been success—and I give great credit to my colleagues from USAID, from CDC—we have helped the government build the capacity to quickly isolate and limit expansion. We are now looking—and if confirmed, I believe I will arrive at a point of transition from Ebola crisis to long-term health care, and we are looking in terms of the global health security agenda in terms of continuing to focus on Ebola but building the other parts of the health system particularly in terms of the vaccination systems. In 2013, the vaccination rate for the country was only 63 percent, putting it in the bottom 10 percent of developing countries. We saw the effect of that recently with a polio case. That carried on into Mali. So we will be looking closely at building these basic systems while not losing sight of Ebola and the risks that that poses.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

Ms. Etim, you talked in your testimony—and we talked about before the benefits of USAID's action in Africa, alleviating poverty, helping development, improving the quality of life. Those things are important, and that is the first and foremost reason that we take action there. But there are also knock-on effects and impacts from USAID with regard to the security sphere and our ability to work with countries and their willingness to work with us.

Can you talk a little bit about that? Our constituents need to know that story more. Obviously, the reason we want to help with USAID is to help development and improve the quality of life, but there are other benefits as well. Talk about those for a minute.

Ms. ETIM. Thank you, Senator. We did have that conversation. And I think that you can see very clearly with the case that Dennis just brought up with Ebola, when you have health systems that are not strengthened and when you have country governance systems that are not trusted, the possibility and the potential of starting pandemics that cannot be contained and that actually might have flared to actually affect us here in the United States is very real and present.

We are dealing with, I think, a lot of transnational trafficking issues.

I think the migration crisis that we are seeing right now in other parts of the world—Africa is home to 38 percent of the world's refugees. It is hugely expensive for the international community not only to respond but I think as we look at people moving over borders as well, addressing and dealing with a lot of the root causes becomes increasingly important.

I think I will stop there. It could go on for a really long time.
 Senator FLAKE. Address for just a second not just the migration issues and refugee issues but arrangements that we have with Kenya to battle terrorist groups, lot of those relationships helped by our other assistance through USAID.

Ms. ETIM. Absolutely. USAID works in partnership with the larger U.S. Government efforts on work on countering violent extremism. As you mentioned, Kenya is a prime example right there. There, USAID works on addressing some of the root causes and so is part of an overall interagency effort. For example, we work on combating wildlife trafficking, and through our community-based programs there and assisting communities and developing plans to work on economic growth, sustain livelihoods, we offer alternatives to moving into violent extremism. We also work in partnership there with a number of wildlife trafficking institutions and the national police services. So USAID is an integral part of that overall interagency effort.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you much.

Senator MARKEY.

Senator MARKEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, very much.

Ambassador Jackson, earlier this year, the State Department named Ghana as the first country in which to implement the child protection compacts, which have a specific focus to prioritize the rescue of children in slave labor conditions and hold perpetrators of child labor accountable for those crimes. Talk a little bit about that and what the role is of the U.S. Government in ensuring that this is a successful program.

Ambassador JACKSON. Thank you very much, Senator.

In fact, Ghana has a strong tradition of working to combat trafficking in persons and child labor. It remains a problem. The Ghanaian Government has traditionally been focused on preventing the outflow of trafficked people. We have encouraged, through this new partnership program, which is valued at $5 million, to have Ghana work more on the inside. We have provided assistance for protection, prevention, and prosecution. The prosecution part has worked reasonably well, but we need to do much more on the protection front and I am hopeful that this partnership will allow us to do so.

Senator MARKEY. Thank you.

Ambassador Thomas, the United States has sent a tremendous amount of aid to Zimbabwe to fight HIV/AIDS. Could you update us in terms of what the status is and maybe recommendations that you might make in terms of other health care assistance that we could help to provide to Zimbabwe?

Ambassador THOMAS. Well, thank you for that question, Senator.

Yes, the American taxpayer has been extremely generous in helping the people of Zimbabwe. This year, we have provided over $120 million to combat the scourge of HIV/AIDS. We are looking at not just transmission but prevention through nutrition, through education. And those are programs we have to continue. Under Ambassador Birx's leadership, we are looking at an aggressive way of auditing our program to make sure the taxpayer moneys continue to be well spent.

If confirmed, sir, I would be looking forward to working with the Senate and the House in developing new ways of assisting the people in a country where over 15 percent of the population is suffering from HIV/AIDS.

Senator MARKEY. Thank you.

Ms. Furuta-Toy, Equatorial Guinea is—and I did not know this—the third-largest producer of oil in Africa, and yet 75 percent of their people live in poverty. And unfortunately, that is an all too frequent statistic around the world with countries that have oil resources.

Do you have any recommendations as to what help we could give to Equatorial Guinea to diversify their economy to broaden a base of growth so that it affects more families positively in that country?

Ms. FURUTA-TOY. Senator, thank you for that.

The disparities between the income and the poverty levels in Equatorial Guinea are extreme, and it is something that, should I be confirmed, I would like to be able to focus a little bit of the U.S. Government attention on trying to make sure that the revenues from the oil industry and from other businesses are better distributed across the country.

One of the ways that I think we can encourage the government to move forward is by supporting it in its reapplication actually to the Extractive industries Transparency Initiative, EITI. The government announced last year that it would reapply to EITI, and this will mean that it has to bring in civil society. It has to declare its revenues. And the result of that should be that the public will better understand what actually is out there and how better they can benefit across the board.

Should I be confirmed, we will continue to support the improvement in education, health, sanitation, and other social issues that many of the U.S. companies that are in Equatorial Guinea right now are supporting through their corporate social responsibility programs.

Senator MARKEY. Good. Thank you.

Ms. FURUTA-TOY. Thank you.

Senator MARKEY. Mr. Hankins, could you take us back to the outbreak of the Ebola crisis and look at the three countries and give us a little tutorial on why it was that Guinea was so much less effective in its response, in its health care infrastructure capacity to be able to deal with this issue than the other countries?

Mr. HANKINS. Yes, Senator. It started there and it started in the area of the country in the Forestiere region, which is the part that is hardest to reach and historically has been one of those least served. In some sense, there was a basis of a health system. It is the only country of the three where we did not evacuate our personnel because we saw a basis to continue than protection of our personnel there.

It is also a country where there was a huge problem in terms of public acceptance of government response. It is a country where we saw health care workers killed by villagers who were afraid of the response. And when that happened, then the Government of Guinea, trying to figure out how to respond and initially responding with a very heavy military presence, which only exacerbated the situation.

It is also one where, frankly, we do not have and we did not have that strong a French-speaking component within our CDC and USAID. Those elements were found and eventually helped build then the response.

So it has been a country where trying to get past public distrust of facilities has been difficult. I know Peace Corps staff in the country were, in fact, very important because they had the contacts with traditional leaders, with imams, which eventually helped turn the situation in terms of having a more effective government approach to the population.

Thank you, Senator.

Senator MARKEY. Thank you.

And, Ms. Etim, when Chairman Flake and I were with the President in Ethiopia, we were part of the signing of a deal to produce 1,000 megawatts of geothermal power, which was just potentially the beginning of that incredible potential growth in electricity from indigenous sources inside of Ethiopia. Can you talk a little bit about, going forward, what you see as the biggest challenges to making it possible to unleash all of this capacity, which is latent, on that continent using USAID and other agencies as kind of the fulcrum, the lever to ensure that we telescope the time frame to ensure that that electrical generation does reach the business and consumer sectors in each of those countries?

Ms. ETIM. Thank you for raising that question.

As you mentioned, being in Ethiopia at the signing of the first phase of Corbetti's power project was very exciting.

We, I think, could only identify two major challenges going forward to the sustainability of Power Africa. One I think is the continued commitment of partners and of people's willingness to stay the course. I think that we have seen tremendous successes over the past few years of Power Africa, but we also know that governance is going to be a major issue. And so when you start coming up against these barriers and looking at where, going forward, the results are—we have a tremendous goal of tripling access to power now—we are very concerned that people will start backing away from the commitments. And I think if you look at the challenge of governance and countries not being as transparent as they need to and not being able to unlock some of the power there but also I think on our partners' and I think the general public's commitment to staying the course and making sure that we have a long-term vision for this initiative.

Senator MARKEY. Thank you.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

Senator KAINE.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Mr. Chair.

And thanks to all the witnesses. Your records individually are quite extraordinary. And I think we do a good job of always thanking especially now members of our armed services who serve repeated deployments often to places that might not have been their first choice, sometimes in high threat areas where they cannot bring their family, but I do not think we do a good enough job of thanking those like you who are in State or some of the other agencies where you are small "a" ambassadors for us every day. So thank you for your careers in this area. And congratulations on your nominations.

I am on the Armed Services Committee and I sort of have an armed services question. In the aftermath of the horrible tragedy at Benghazi, decisions were made to augment embassy security around certain high-threat posts. A number of those posts are in Africa. So we have built up a little bit of additional military capacity.

But at the same time, there have also been increasing requests from African governments for U.S. presence in joint operations or training. There is a number of special purpose Marine air-ground task forces that are assigned out of AFRICOM that are working in different countries in Africa on joint exercises and counterpoaching, countertrafficking, counterterrorism. I just am curious, especially for my four over on this side in the countries where you are going to be. I would love to know anything about the kind of current state of mil-to-mil relationships, and is U.S. military presence in these kind of exercises accepted, and is it working to our benefit.

Ambassador JACKSON. Thank you, Senator Kaine, and it is great to see you again. I hope you will visit Ghana, just as you visited Morocco when I was there.

Security cooperation in Ghana is excellent. Ghana is a member of the African contingency operations and train and assistance program. It is a member of the African Rapid Preparedness Initiative. And we have done a number of major military exercises there. We deployed about 300 marines there earlier this year as we looked at events in the region on a contingency basis, and there will be a major international exercise there next year. So I am very satisfied with our security cooperation in Ghana. And Ghana's contribution to peacekeeping has meant that our people are safe which is my highest priority.

Thank you.

Senator Kaine. Ambassador Thomas.

Ambassador THOMAS. Thank you, Senator.

Senator, we have sanctions against Zimbabwe and its military because of the pernicious use of the security forces during the elections. This is something that hailed from even the Rhodesian days when the security forces were used to intimidate people. So at this time, we do not have relations. However, if Zimbabwe's Government establishes reform in the future, has free and fair elections, transparency, reduces corruption, and endorses human rights, that is something that we would be willing to talk to the United States Senate and President Obama and the administration about.

Senator Kaine. Thank you, Mr. Ambassador.

Ms. FURUTA-TOY. Senator, thank you.

Because of the current concerns about the human rights situation in Equatorial Guinea, we do not have direct military support for the Government of Equatorial Guinea, but as I mentioned earlier to Senator Markey, we have supported the Government of Equatorial Guinea's participation in some regional exercises.

Senator Kaine. Thank you.

Mr. Hankins.

Mr. HANKINS. Senator Kaine, in Guinea, we are building a new relationship with the military. It is only in the last 5 years that the military came under civilian authority, having suffered from coups in the past. Our main emphasis right now is using Guinean troops or helping support Guinean troops for peacekeeping operations in Mali where they have accepted then one of the more difficult regions right on the border with Algeria. But we are still well aware that you have members in the military that were implicated in the September 2008 stadium massacre. So it is a careful relationship on building a democratic military and security system while still taking advantage of Guinea's willingness to participate in regional crises.

Senator KAINE. Thank you.

Ms. Etim, the United Nations adopted sustainable development goals last week, sort of setting out for the next 15 years a whole series of efforts to reduce extreme poverty, promote public health, educational opportunities, and advance other human development goals. These goals sound very similar to some of the main areas of focus for USAID. But I just wonder if you have thoughts about how in your position in Africa you and your team will work to advance the U.N.'s recently announced goals.

Ms. ETIM. As you rightly point out, Senator, it is not a coincidence that the goals reflect the newly revamped mission statement for USAID. Working in the leadup to the sustainable development goals summit over the course of the past week, USAID has been in partnership with a number of countries to actually come on line and basically say what would happen if the world focused its attention in a coordinated manner with the World Bank, other donors, private sector partners, civil society organizations to look at measuring sustainable ways in the next generation of actually ending extreme poverty. It is an extremely ambitious goal. I think that the agency, coming online with that, has changed the way it has been doing business by really looking at a lot of institutional causes of poverty from looking at food security, through Feed the Future, or looking at infrastructure, poverty, energy, poverty through Power Africa, I think looking at how we deliver relief assistance in effective ways through resiliency—this has been a major goal of ours, and it is something that we are thinking that, as you codify this worldwide, we will be able to take forward and have guiding principles and shared understandings and lessons with the rest of the world in this partnership as we go forward.

Senator KAINE. Excellent. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

Senator Murphy.

Senator MURPHY. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I wanted to stay with you, Ms. Etim. When I travel around the developed world and talk about opportunities for U.S. businesses and U.S. exports, it is rule of law, rule of law, rule of law. And so I wanted to just inquire to you as to the effect of some of the budget decisions we are making here on the ability to promote democracy and governance initiatives in Africa. The amount of money available to USAID and a larger sum to State has been declining to the point now where I think in 2015, it was about $160 million overall for DG and that is down from just 2 years ago being up above 230. The President, I think, has made a request to essentially double that number into the low 300s.

And I just wonder if you can give us a flavor as to what the difference is between having—and again, you are only accountable for a piece of this, but having twice as many resources as you do now to undergo democracy and governance initiatives, is this a matter of expanding programs in existing countries? Is this a matter of getting to countries that have fallen off the list? I mean, there are a number of critical countries that are not receiving any DG programming because of these cuts. What happens if we are successful in fulfilling the President's request?

Ms. ETIM. Thank you, Senator, for your question.

If we are successful in fulfilling the President's request, I think you mentioned that we take an all-of-the-above approach. There are a number of countries that actually have been zeroed out, do not have democracy and governance budgets, and we would look at restoring and retaining those budgets.

But I think most importantly we see Africa right now in terms of its transitioning. You had over 12 exercises, 15 African electoral exercises in 2015. We have 20 coming up in 2016. We know that the urgent needs right now are focused around how do you provide support for both those exercises but also looking at how do we look at the exercises that took place in 2015 in restoring and maintaining democracy there. You may have noticed also in the news we have a number of fragile states and fragile environments from Burkina Faso to Central African Republic to South Sudan to Burundi. We have a lot of conflicts crises there. And there I think we have a role as the United States Government in working in things like constitution strengthening, parliamentary strengthening, institution building.

Obviously, even with this increased request, we will not be able to answer all of the needs on the continent, but I think that what we really look at is being able to deepen, I think, a lot of the investments and commitments that we do have looking to forward to, I think, a lot of the volatility that is upcoming in the next several years.

Senator MURPHY. I have thrown out this comparison before. But it is stunning that we complain about the lack of influence that America has around the world, and then we spend 0.1 percent of our GDP on foreign aid compared to 1950 when we were spending 3 percent of GDP on foreign aid. It is not rocket science as to why we have a little bit less influence in some parts of the world.

Ms. Etim, how about the question of flexibility? Someone came into my office a few months back and made a case as to how we could have done a better job of watching al-Shabaab move into the northern portions of Kenya, and had we had more flexibility of funds within USAID and State, that we could have done some work up front to try to strengthen institutions, governance, economic resources so as to try to prevent this terrorist organization from getting a foothold.

Can we do more to give USAID the necessary flexibility? Are you too compartmentalized in terms of how you are forced to spend this money even as priorities and realities on the ground are shifting within fiscal years?

Ms. ETIM. You raise a very good point, and I think as all of my fellow panelists will probably point out, the increased flexibility for our missions and the embassies on the ground lead to, I think, more creative thinking and better programming.

At the same time, we are able to focus, I think, within the constraints that we have been given on the main priorities that are actually facing the African Continent. And so a lot of the different ways that our funding comes is in the very critical areas of health and education. These are areas that USAID and I think overall the U.S. Government would be focused on.

With your specific example with Kenya and the idea of how we actually deal with programs in complex crisis environments, there we require, I think, flexible sources of funding, and for that reason, typically when we make programming decisions bureaucratically we put ESF funding—the most flexible funding that USAID has available we direct at those types of countries and accounts because we know that programs are going to change. Like the South Sudans of the world and like the Somalias, these are areas that require flexibility. In more established countries like Kenya, that is where you, I think, come into some of the questions that you have just raised where you have partners over a long period of time, but you also have a lot of dynamic and changing situations. And in that environment, we look at our own programming cycle and we have made changes in the way we have done business so that we can actually work more closely with our friends on the humanitarian side to come up with more flexible ways of using—and making sure that we are using more flexible means of programming humanitarian funds and not just having stark relief to development trajectories but actually applying a resilience model that allows us to use what pots of money are necessary to address the actual challenges that are on the ground.

So, of course, we will always welcome as much flexibility as possible. That is something that I think is a given. But I also think some of the onus is on us as an agency to look at really programming, I think, in more modern ways and looking at the challenges from an entire holistic perspective.

Senator MURPHY. Well, put more of the onus on us. I think we can do more to give you that additional flexibility. I appreciate you taking ownership within the agency. But we certainly can step up to the plate and do more.

Thank you all for stepping up yourselves to this kind of laudable service. I look forward to working with you on your confirmation process.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you.

And I want to thank our witnesses today and my colleagues for being here. We had five or six members here for one of these hearings on a get-away day. That speaks well for the interest and the importance of your service.

I want to thank also your family members for being here. We are aware and appreciate the sacrifices that they make and that you make in many cases to be away from them. Mr. Hankins, you mentioned 26 years of service or 16?

Mr. HANKINS. Sixteen assignments.

Senator FLAKE. A long time. And we always find that family members—a lot of them end up serving in our military or in our diplomatic service as well or find other ways to serve based on your example. So thank you for what you are doing and thank you to the family members for the sacrifices that you put in.

The hearing record will remain open until Friday, for the benefit of the members. And if the witnesses could answer any questions that come your way promptly so they can be put as part of the hearing record, it would be appreciated.

And with the thanks of the committee, this hearing stands adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 3:07 p.m., the hearing was adjourned.]

ADDITIONAL MATERIAL SUBMITTED FOR THE RECORD

RESPONSES OF ROBERT P. JACKSON, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF GHANA, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE JACKSON'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CARDIN

Question. In what areas have President Mahama's administration's anticorruption efforts successful, and how could they be made more so? What actions, if confirmed, will you take to assist with the government's anticorruption efforts?

Answer. The Government of Ghana has repeatedly stated its commitment to combat corruption. The recent decision to suspend several High Court judges and lower court judges and magistrates as a result of an expose done by an investigative journalist underscores the Government of Ghana's commitment to this issue. Ghana's national anticorruption efforts are outlined in its National Anti-Corruption Action Plan, which came into force last year. We are supporting anticorruption efforts in Ghana through several programs, including through a grant to the Ghana Integrity Initiative, Ghana's local Transparency International Chapter. USAID supports efforts to improve civil society reporting, tracking and advocacy for stronger anticorruption work in Ghana. The project fosters the participation of civil society institutions in identifying, reporting, and tracking incidences of corruption in public agencies. USAID is also working to strengthen the institutional capacity of the Public Accounts Committee (PAC) of Ghana's Parliament to effectively scrutinize the Auditor General's reports on the financial performance of public institutions, expose malfeasance by persons in public office, and demand followup on recommendations and referrals.

If confirmed, I intend to continue these programs and ensure that anticorruption issues are a regular part of our interactions with the highest levels of the Government of Ghana.

Question. The next general elections are in December 2016, and by all accounts will be closely contested. What programs and activities is the United States funding to ensure credible peaceful elections, and what actions will you take if confirmed as Ambassador to help ensure continued the continued growth of democratic institutions?

Answer. Our assistance aims to enhance the transparency and credibility of Ghanaian Electoral Commission (EC) operations. The EC is developing a new strategic plan for electoral reforms in advance of the 2016 elections. USAID will support the implementation of reforms, with a particular focus on improving the EC's communications capabilities as well as the capacity of its field staff to properly administer elections. We will also enable the EC to develop and implement a communications strategy to more effectively engage all stakeholders on the steps it is taking to ensure a free and fair election process in 2016.

Our assistance will also strengthen civil society's role in ensuring credible and nonviolent elections. USAID will help local organizations engage the EC, political parties and other stakeholders on electoral reform, support civil society organizations or CSOs to conduct civic education programs aimed at promoting tolerance and peaceful and credible elections, and help train CSOs at the grassroots to more effectively monitor elections. We will also train political parties (especially their youth wings) on poll watching and nonviolent dispute resolution to prevent outbreaks of election-related violence.

Our assistance will also strengthen conflict resolution mechanisms around elections. Ghana's National Peace Council (NPC)—an independent government council with membership drawn from Ghana's major religious groups—has played an important role in resolving election-related conflict and defusing tensions in previous elections. Our support will enable the NPC to continue to play an integral mediation role during the pre- and post-electoral period.

As Ambassador, I will personally engage Ghanaian political leaders, the EC, civil society and the media in an effort to ensure a fair, transparent, and peaceful election. I will also ensure that after this election, our assistance to strengthen democratic institutions continues apace.

Question. What explains the government's relative failure to more aggressively counter Trafficking in Persons and what will you do if confirmed as Ambassador to encourage the Ghanaians to provide needed resources to the Anti-Human Trafficking Unit of the Ghana Police Service?

Answer. Antitrafficking efforts in Ghana are hampered by a lack of operating budgets for law enforcement and protection agencies. As a result, the Anti-Human Trafficking Unit continues to rely heavily on foreign donors and NGOs to support its efforts. The government also did not provide any funding for the human trafficking victim services or for its two shelters.

In June 2015, the Government of Ghana signed the first Child Protection Compact (CPC) Partnership with the United States, which will facilitate investment of $5 million in U.S. foreign assistance to aid the Government of Ghana to reduce child trafficking and improve child protection. The Partnership, the first of its kind globally, is a jointly developed, multiyear plan aimed at bolstering efforts of the Government of Ghana and Ghanaian civil society to address child sex trafficking and forced child labor within Ghana. The Government of Ghana stated that it intends to dedicate increasing levels of staff resources and operating budget funding to support this initiative, including funding for the Human Trafficking Fund.

If confirmed as Ambassador, I will continue to raise this issue with the highest officials in the Ghanaian Government, impressing upon them that their current budgetary constraints should not preclude the government from providing financial support and resources to all Ghanaian agencies committed to combating trafficking in persons, investigating and prosecuting trafficking cases, and supporting trafficking victims.

RESPONSES OF HARRY K. THOMAS, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF ZIMBABWE, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE THOMAS'S RESPONSE
TO A QUESTION FROM SENATOR CORKER

Question. The U.S.-Zimbabwe bilateral relationship has been poor for decades. Do you believe that a possible near-term Presidential transition in Zimbabwe is an opportunity for the growth of democracy and freedom in that country? If so, how would you advise the U.S. to engage during a Presidential transition to promote such values?

Answer. We are focused on principles of respect for the rule of law, human rights, and democratic processes. We would welcome credible, economic, and governance reforms supporting these values at any time, and do not expect a sudden departure from current policy in the near term. Dialogue and respectful engagement remain central to moving our bilateral relationship forward, consistent with our values and policies. The United States continues to support progress toward a Zimbabwe that serves the needs of the Zimbabwean people through humanitarian assistance and continued support for Zimbabwean civil society, which is often the leading independent voice critical of the Zimbabwean government's policies.

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE THOMAS'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CARDIN

Question. What U.S. democracy and governance programs are under way in Zimbabwe, and how effective have they been and what programs would be most feasible at present? What are the primary challenges facing USAID's partners? If confirmed, what activities do you plan to undertake to help Zimbabwean efforts to open political space and support civil society?

Answer. U.S. technical assistance boosts the ability of citizens and nongovernmental groups to participate in discussions on the future direction of Zimbabwe. One local USAID partner coached rural women farmers to engage for the first time with the Parliamentary Committee on Lands and Agriculture and voice challenges they face, including limited access to communal land, lack of access to markets and credit facilities, delayed payments by the Grain Marketing Board, and corruption. This activity shows that with training, rural Zimbabwean women can be compelling advocates to hold political leaders accountable. Grassroots-level programs are effective in empowering citizens to engage government and demand accountability. USAID programs create a more secure environment for communities and civil leaders to engage in political processes and affect a more democratic system of governance. Challenges for partners include long-standing government restrictions on civil society organizations, independent media, political parties, activists, and regular citizens that impede fundamental freedoms. If confirmed, I would continue U.S. support for Zimbabwean civil society to promote community development efforts and service delivery, and to retain its role as the leading independent voice calling the Zimbabwean Government to account for policies which undermine democracy and stability.

Question. Impunity for politically motivated violence remains an issue in Zimbabwe. Cases stemming from elections related violence in 2008 remain unsolved. If confirmed, what can you do to encourage the government to make progress in these cases, and end security sector impunity? Do you see a role for USAID in any future efforts to reform the security sector?

Answer. Progress toward ending security sector impunity is a critical component in assessing the status of human rights and rule of law in Zimbabwe. If confirmed, I would continue support for strengthening institutions, such as Parliament, the human rights commission, courts, and civil society to help create a Zimbabwe in which all government institutions are responsive to the needs of the people and support rule of law and just governance. I would aim to strengthen these institutions' responsiveness to constituents, and support for victims of violence and those who advocate on their behalf. I would continue to promote our human rights report to highlight abuses or areas for improvement. USAID plays a role in these efforts, lending its expertise in peaceful conflict mitigation and resolution initiatives.

RESPONSES OF JULIE FURUTA-TOY, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF EQUATORIAL GUINEA, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE FURUTA-TOY'S RESPONSE
TO A QUESTION FROM SENATOR CORKER

Question. The U.S.-Equatorial Guinea bilateral relationship has been difficult for decades. Equatorial Guinea has fabulous natural resource wealth yet its people are some of the poorest in the world. The regime denies basic freedoms to its people, and is profoundly corrupt. Is there anything the U.S. should be doing differently to try to change the status quo in that country? What opportunities are there to promote freedom and democracy?

Answer. The United States diplomatic relationship with Equatorial Guinea is frank and honest. We have repeatedly encouraged President Obiang—the longest-serving leader on the African continent—to embrace democratic reform and rule of law, and support greater political and economic transparency.

If confirmed, I will encourage the Government of the Republic of Equatorial Guinea to remove legal and practical barriers to the formation and free operation of political parties in keeping with the commitments of the November 2014 National Dialogue, and promote a free, fair, and transparent electoral process.

In the lead up to Presidential elections in 2016, I will continue to urge the government to establish an independent electoral commission and invite international observers. The 2016 Presidential elections are an opportunity for Equatorial Guinea to demonstrate its commitment to democracy and tolerance of independent opposition political parties.

I will also emphasize that the success of Equatorial Guinea's reinstatement in the Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative is largely dependent on its treatment of civil society and will underscore that for the United States to support Equatorial Guinea's candidacy, civil society organizations must be allowed to offer their views on transparency and governance issues freely and without any adverse consequences.

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE FURUTA-TOY'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CARDIN

Question. If confirmed, how do you plan to engage the government of Equatorial Guinea regarding its lack of fiscal transparency and high levels of corruption? What actions can you take as Ambassador to effectively help counter corruption and increase transparency?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to urge the Government of Equatorial Guinea to practice better governance, increase transparency and invest more in its people, particularly in education and health.

I will continue to support Equatorial Guinea's efforts to prepare for eventual re-application to the Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative (EITI) as a means to promote transparency and accountability in the receipt and use of oil and gas revenues. I will also emphasize to the Government of Equatorial Guinea that its support for the development of civil society and civil society's participation in EITI is essential to achieve membership in EITI. Setting a good example, U.S. petroleum companies in Equatorial Guinea have held workshops providing information on their operations to members of civil society, which I will continue to encourage.

Question. If confirmed, how will you help improve political, civil and human rights?

Answer. The Department considers human rights promotion the top priority in our bilateral relationship with Equatorial Guinea. If confirmed, I will continue to document human rights abuses in the annual human rights report, press the Government of Equatorial Guinea to fully respect international human rights law, and encourage the implementation of Equatorial Guinea's law concerning human trafficking.

If confirmed, I will encourage the government to allow the political opposition to operate freely, in keeping with the commitments of the 2014 National Dialogue, and promote a free, fair and transparent electoral process that includes input from civil society organizations. I will urge the government to implement an independent electoral commission and invite international observers. The 2016 Presidential elections are an opportunity for Equatorial Guinea to demonstrate its commitment to democracy and tolerance of independent opposition political parties.

RESPONSES OF DENNIS B. HANKINS, NOMINATED TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF GUINEA, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE HANKINS'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CORKER

Question. Based on his past willingness to use all available means to gain and keep power, there is every indication that President Alpha Conde will be reelected President in the upcoming election. What policies would you recommend as U.S. Ambassador to demonstrate the U.S. Government's negative reaction to the elections which are already showing signs of fraud?

Answer. The United States has supported Guinea's transition to democracy since 2010, when Alpha Conde became Guinea's first democratically elected President. The United States is working closely with the international community to encourage a free and fair Presidential election. Our engagement includes sustained dialogue with the government, political party leaders, the press, and civil society; technical support to the electoral commission; and support for civic and voter education, justice and security sector reform, and journalist training. We also focus on the people-to-people aspects, including sending members of the U.S. mission in Conakry around the country to conduct townhall meetings for political parties, NGOs and the media, and partner with alumni of official U.S. exchange and training programs to hear directly from them and carry our message of peaceful, free, and fair elections. In addition, the United States is also deploying an electoral monitoring mission with an unprecedented 120 observers throughout Guinea during the election period. While Guinea's democratic trajectory is generally positive, the United States continues to discuss concerns about electoral processes and broader democratic trends with the government. If confirmed, I plan to continue these important discussions at every opportunity and to seek creative ways to partner with nongovernment actors to amplify these efforts.

AMBASSADOR-DESIGNATE HANKINS'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CARDIN

Question. Guinea does not comply with the minimum standards on trafficking, but granted a waiver from an automatic downgrade to Tier 3, and remains on the Trafficking in Person's Tier 2 Watch List for the third year in a row.

- ♦ (a) What steps, if confirmed, do you plan to take to encourage the government to investigate and prosecute trafficking cases?
- ♦ (b) Are there specific programs and activities that we should undertake with law enforcement to assist Guinea's efforts?
- ♦ (c) What steps will you take to encourage the government to increase penalties for forced prostitution?

Answer. The Government of Guinea does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant progress. If confirmed, I will encourage the Government of Guinea to strengthen its antitrafficking law enforcement efforts and similarly increase measures in place to better protect victims and prevent people from becoming victims of trafficking. My team and I will continue to raise our concerns with the Government of Guinea at all levels.

In September 2015, with funding from the Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, the International Organization for Migration (IOM) trained law enforcement officials and members of the Guinean National Trafficking in Persons Committee in order to enhance their capacity and coordination efforts to combat trafficking. Our training built upon a similar program in Senegal that in 2014 led to the successful discovery and release of minors destined for forced labor. If confirmed, I will encourage the government to undertake similar training to build the capacity of the authorities to detect, interdict, and prosecute such criminal offenses.

The 2015 Trafficking in Persons Report states that penalties for forced prostitution are sufficiently stringent, but not commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape. If confirmed, I will encourage the Government of Guinea to increase penalties for forced prostitution. I will work to ensure the Government of Guinea comes into compliance with this minimum standard of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, and continues efforts to battle the horrible scourge that is human trafficking.

RESPONSES OF LINDA ETIM, NOMINATED TO BE ASSISTANT ADMINISTRATOR OF THE U.S. AGENCY FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT, TO QUESTIONS FROM MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE

ASSISTANT ADMINISTRATOR-DESIGNATE ETIM'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CORKER

Question. African leaders across the continent are maneuvering to extend their terms past constitutional limits. A number of African countries have also enacted security and NGO laws that are being used against civil society and the political opposition. Do you believe the democratic gains made since the 1990s are eroding? What effort is USAID play to reverse this trend in light of a constrained fiscal environment?

Answer. This is a difficult time for democracy—in Africa and around the world. Academic and think tank data, as well as the U.S. Government's own monitoring, points to a trend in recent years of backsliding in both the less democratic countries and the stronger democracies of Africa. Of great concern are the actions by governments in some countries to restrict the freedom of expression and association, and by some leaders to cling to power despite constitutional term limits.

Efforts to remove constitutionally mandated term limits by sitting Presidents are a symptom of deeper democratic deficits, including concentration of power in the executive branch, weak rule of law, lack of political space for opposition political parties and civil society, and limited media freedoms. Although some countries in sub-Saharan Africa may be backsliding, others are reinforcing democratic norms, as evidenced by recent electoral exercises in Nigeria and Zambia. In addition, the USAID-supported Afrobarometer public opinion data confirms that across the continent, democracy continues to be the preferred path.

I understand the challenges of the current budget environment and am confident that USAID can achieve considerable progress within the budget constraints. As an agency, we have made efforts to locate additional resources for some of the highest priority needs on the continent in FY 2015, including in Kenya and Nigeria. In Nigeria, for example, sustained, long-term U.S. Government investment in the development of civil society networks and institutions like the Independent National Electoral Commission contributed to the historic transfer of political power witnessed in 2015. Continued investment is necessary to consolidate those gains.

Additionally recognizing the importance of prioritizing democracy, rights and governance (DRG) investments, USAID's FY 2016 request for democracy, rights and governance programming reflects an increase over recent years. The request represents a 10 percent increase over the FY 2015 request and a 100 percent increase over the FY 2014 actual level. USAID is also better integrating DRG principles into other development sectors, working with fellow U.S. Government colleagues in health, education, water and economic growth, to ensure that core human rights and governance principles are embedded in other sectors.

USAID is committed to ensuring it remains a leader in the DRG sector. Guided by government policies, Presidential directives, and agency strategies, USAID supports numerous programs that foster good governance, promote access to justice, strengthen civil society, and reinforce effective and accountable institutions at all levels. As such, in 2013, USAID issued a new strategy on democracy, human rights, and governance, codifying a more holistic approach to DRG sector programming. This policy framework focuses on participation, inclusion, and accountability, while elevating human rights and integration of democratic governance approaches across economic and social sectors. The DRG strategy informs USAID's overall approach to DRG sector programming in Africa and provides guidance to missions appropriate for the context.

For example, in countries making progress on democratization and where the government is generally supportive of human rights, the DRG strategy is designed to consolidate gains, prevent backsliding, and strengthen or create effective democratic institutions and culture that are self-correcting in the face of crisis. Although countries within this category are making progress, they may still be vulnerable to reversals.

In countries where progress on democratic and political development is uneven, with some civil and political freedoms but with no genuine foundation for democratic governance and institutions, USAID programs generally promote political pluralism and citizen participation. Programs often focus on expanding the space for meaningful participation, as well as promoting genuine and fair political competition, through electoral reforms and monitoring and/or political party assistance. In these contexts, support to civil society, including nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and independent media groups, helps to elevate citizen voice in, and oversight of, political processes and government practices. Strengthening and protecting an enabling legal and regulatory environment for civil society and media is also critical. Programs may also address the promotion of human rights and issues of inclusion, as well as increased government transparency and accountability through the integration of DRG approaches to social sector and economic growth programming.

Finally, in countries where governments do not maintain democratic systems, respect human rights, or tolerate independent civic action, DRG programming emphasize support for democracy and human rights activists by working with NGOs, watchdog groups, independent media and political parties that are committed to democratic principles and value fundamental freedoms. Although additional precautions must be taken, DRG programming is still possible in these countries. Supporting citizens' access to independent information sources is critical in these environments since it can bolster free expression and strengthen impartial channels of information to citizens in spite of government dominance over official media channels.

If confirmed, I look forward to continuing to work with and seek the committee's guidance as we address these critically important issues.

ASSISTANT ADMINISTRATOR-DESIGNATE ETIM'S RESPONSES
TO QUESTIONS FROM SENATOR CARDIN

Question. Corruption is a considerable impediment to development across the world, including in Africa. Endemic corruption has hindered growth in Nigeria, the continent's largest economy. It has significantly undermined development in South Sudan, and is a chronic problem in Angola and Kenya, to name just a few countries.

- ♦ (a) What actions can the U.S. take to help African partners address corruption, and will you commit to working with your counterparts in the interagency to develop a comprehensive action plan to help Africans combat corruption?

Answer (a). The United States, through numerous assistance programs, works closely with countries around the world to build transparent and accountable financial and legal systems. The Department of State and the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID) devote approximately $1 billion per year to anticorruption and related good governance programs.

USAID's work to combat corruption in sub-Saharan Africa focuses on improving transparency and availability of information and increasing accountability between and among citizens and government institutions. As one of the commitments from the U.S.-Africa Leaders Summit, the United States and leaders of partner governments formed the Partnership on Illicit Finance (PIF), an initiative that brings African partners and the United States together to jointly address the generation and movement of proceeds from corruption and other financial crimes. The PIF has two main objectives: (1) examine illicit financial flows from Africa, and (2) develop national action plans to improve transparency and accountability in public and private sectors. Current members are Burkina Faso, Kenya, Mauritius, Liberia, Niger, and Senegal.

Building on that commitment, during President Obama's trip to Africa in July 2015, the United States and the Government of Kenya signed a Joint Commitment to Promote Good Governance and Anti-Corruption Efforts in Kenya to improve ethics, end money laundering and expand anticorruption legislation. The Joint Commitment will also leverage technology to reduce or eradicate opportunities for corruption, using tools such as citizen portals and eProcurement systems.

This approach is consistent with the principles outlined in the post-2015 Development Agenda, which focuses on the need to build developing countries' capacity to mobilize domestic resources and attract private sector financing flows and assistance.

In Nigeria, for example, USAID's approach to strengthen institutions of accountability and improve public financial management while increasing the involvement of the private sector and civil society in governance has yielded results. Starting in 2006, USAID support helped civil society, government and the private sector to come together and establish the Nigerian Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative (NEITI). In 2013, NEITI, working in collaboration with relevant government agencies, recovered $2 billion in taxes owed by oil and gas companies.

Government reform alone is not enough to be successful—support for government reformers must be complemented by support for the work of civil society organizations. Across Africa, USAID is building the capacity of civil society networks and coalitions to promote transparency and accountability. These coalitions engage with civil society organizations to increase oversight of the budget process, raise the level of public discourse on issues of transparency and accountability, and increase participation of the citizenry in governance for equitable growth. In Tanzania, for example, USAID is increasing the capacity of civil society to monitor transparency in local government by engaging citizens in local budgeting, planning and public expenditure tracking.

As a founding member of the Open Government Partnership (OGP), the United States partners with governments and civil society leaders around the world to promote the more transparent, effective, and accountable governance and institutions that are necessary for development gains to be sustained. OGP was launched in 2011 with 8 members and has grown to include 65 participating countries that together have made over 2,000 commitments to make government more open, accountable and responsive to citizens. In sub-Saharan Africa, Cape Verde, Ghana, Kenya, Liberia, Malawi, Sierra Leone, South Africa, and Tanzania are OGP members and continue to make good on their commitments to open government. Over the last 3 years, USAID has provided just under $1 million to the OGP Support Unit (approximately $300–$350 thousand per year, 2012–15). USAID Missions in Africa have also supported OGP in a variety of ways, from sponsoring government/citizen consultations to implementing OGP-related commitments.

USAID's work in this area is guided by our strategy on democracy, human rights, and governance, which focuses on the principles of accountability and citizen engagement to offer a framework for addressing issues such as corruption more effectively. Our work in these areas is fully complementary of the work of other U.S. Government agencies on combating financial crimes and strengthening the rule of law. The 2015 Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review (QDDR) calls upon the entire U.S. Government to use the OGP as a tool to advance transparent, accountable, and participatory governance. If confirmed, I will continue to work with partners in the interagency to address corruption in Africa through mechanisms such as OGP, NEITI, and PIF, as well as engagement with civil society.

- ♦ (b) Funds for democracy and governance programs and activities in FY 2015 (approximately $160 million) are much lower than allocations in FY 2013 ($231 million), FY 2012 ($266 million), and FY 2011 ($244 million). What will you do to prioritize democracy and governance programs and activities and advocate for additional funding levels if confirmed?

Answer (b). The U.S. Government cannot effectively achieve sustainable outcomes in health, food security and climate change in Africa without simultaneously investing in good governance, transparency, accountability, and inclusion. Decreased or inconsistent funding levels for democracy, rights, and governance (DRG) make it more difficult for USAID to make strategic investments for long-term change in the African countries in which we work.

To ease the impact of reduced DRG funding levels in the immediate term, in my role as Deputy Assistant Administrator for Africa, I successfully advocated for the allocation of additional USAID FY 2015 DRG resources for some of the highest priority needs on the continent in countries such as Kenya, Uganda, Ethiopia, and Nigeria. In Nigeria, for example, sustained, long-term U.S. Government investment in the development of civil society networks and institutions like the Independent National Electoral Commission contributed to the historic transfer of political power witnessed in 2015. Continued investment is necessary to consolidate those gains.

Recognizing the importance of prioritizing DRG investments, USAID's FY 2016 request for DRG programming ($301 million) reflects an increase over recent years. The request represents a 10-percent increase over the FY 2015 request and a 100-percent increase over the FY 2014 actual level. If confirmed, I will continue to advocate for a robust budget for DRG programs in Africa to ensure our program needs are met and that USAID remains a leader in the DRG sector on the continent.
